

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. Supreme Court of Judicature.

COURT OF APPEAL.

SITTINGS AT WESTMINSTER.

Reported by G. G. KENNEDY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Monday, Nov. 8, 1875.

PENDLEBURY v. GREENHALGH.

Liability of surveyor — Altering highway — Dangerous place unprotected — Accident.

The defendant, surveyor of highways, was ordered by the vestry to raise the level of the highway. The vestry supplied the materials, the defendant set out the work, determined the levels, superintended and contracted with G. to do the work at 3½d. per yard. The plaintiff, who was driving along the highway in the dark, was upset by some repairs that were insufficiently lighted and fenced.

Held (upon these facts, reversing the decision of the Queen's Bench), that the defendant was responsible for the due performance of the work, that he might have divested himself of such responsibility by contracting for the whole work to be done, but that, as he only contracted for the mere labour, he remained responsible for the lighting and fencing.

This was substantially an appeal from the Court of Queen's Bench, in the case of Taylor v. Greenhalgh (ante, vol. ix., p. 201). In the present case the accident arose out of the same state of facts, but the action was brought by a different plaintiff, and the findings in the case were slightly different, as appears by the following facts.

The defendant was appointed surveyor of highways by the vestry of Tottington Lower-end, Lancashire, at a salary of 20l. a year. The vestry had by resolution ordered that part of the road leading from Tottington to Bury should be raised, and the defendant was ordered to employ men to do it. The vestry supplied the materials, and the defendant contracted with his brother, John Greenhalgh to do the work at 3½d. per yard. The defendant determined the levels and set out the work, but had nothing to do with the paving himself, except superintending on behalf of the vestry. The plaintiff, who was driving along the road in the dark, came to that part which was being repaired. Half of the road had been raised and the other half was left at the old level. The difference in level was about a foot, and there was neither light, fence, nor protection. The plaintiff with his horse and cart were upset.

Ambrose, Q.C., for the appellant, Pendlebury.—First, the judgment below proceeds upon the assumption that the defendant was a mere instrument acting under responsible authority. By the Highways Act, 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 6, the surveyor is to be elected annually, and is to keep the roads in repair. By sect. 13 there is power to appoint a board, but there is no authority giving the vestry power to order the surveyor to execute repairs. [The LORD CHANCELLOR.—Has an action ever been successfully maintained against a surveyor where he has not been personally negligent?] There has not. Young v. Davies (2 H. & C. 197; 9 L. T. Rep. 146) is a case for mere omission on the part of the surveyor to repair. The vestry had no right to raise the road; there is no authority to that effect. [The LORD CHANCELLOR.—Do you mean to say parishes may not raise the road?] They must have an order from justices to do so. The local government may do so, but the surveyor or highway board may not. Secondly, as to the point of leaving the road in this state. The jury have found somebody is liable, and that defendant did not personally interfere. The defendant employed John Greenhalgh as a workman; the defendant himself sets out the level, he does not lose control of the highway, and he himself superintends the work. It would be entirely different if he contracted with John Greenhalgh. John Greenhalgh was merely a workman under him, and it cannot be said that the labourer employed by John Greenhalgh should be joined as a tortfeasor. As to the lighting, he gave no directions. To leave a heap of stones or alter a level, and then not fence, is a complex action. First, he makes the heap; that may be law-

ELLIOT (app.) v. THOMPSON AND OTHERS (resps.).

[Q.B. Div.]

ful or not, but the leaving it unfenced makes the whole act wrong: (Newton v. Ellis, 24 L. J., 337, Q.B.). [BRETT, J.—In that case the surveyor was contractor, as John Greenhalgh was in this case. The LORD CHANCELLOR.—Was the contract in writing?] No, it was not. Thirdly, the defendant acted without any authority from anyone. He set out the levels and authorised John Greenhalgh to do the work. Foreman v. Mayor of Canterbury (L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 214) is an authority for the proposition that the Board of Health, when surveyors of highways, are not relieved from responsibility for the negligence of their servants. Couch v. Steel (3 E. & B. 402), and Atkinson v. Newcastle Waterworks Company (L. Rep. 6 Ex. 404), were referred to.

Edwards, Q.C. (Pope, Q.C. and Ridley with him), for the respondent, the surveyor.—This is an attempt to render a surveyor for the first time liable when he has not interfered personally. This surveyor, though paid by salary, is precisely in the same position as a surveyor appointed under sect. 6 of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50. This was not an unauthorised interference with the highway, and the duty of the surveyor is to ascertain what is to be done, and he sets it out. [The LORD CHANCELLOR.—Assuming here that the lighting should be done, if the contract shows that the defendant contracted with John Greenhalgh to light the place, John Greenhalgh would be liable. You must, therefore, show that defendant did so contract with John Greenhalgh.]

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Cairns).—In this case, although the conclusion at which I have arrived, and I believe the rest of the court have arrived, does not agree with the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, yet I am not sure there is any difference in point of law between our decision and theirs. The first question here is, as it generally is, one of fact. What were the steps taken by the defendant for the performance of this work? I will assume that this alteration of the highway was a perfectly lawful act, if done in a proper way. It is found in the case that, by a resolution of the committee of management for the highways appointed by the vestry, it had been ordered that a part of the road about 150 yards in length should be raised, and the defendant, as such surveyor, was directed to carry out such resolution. I will assume that, if the defendant could not carry out this resolution by himself, it was perfectly lawful for him to contract in a proper manner with any third party for the execution of the work, and that if he had contracted in a proper manner to have this work, with all its incidents, properly performed, he would not have been responsible for any negligence on the part of the person who contracted to perform the work. Did he then contract in proper manner with anyone for the performance of this work? For the performance of the whole work he certainly did not contract; he contracted only for a performance of a part of the work. What was the part he contracted for? The case finds as follows: "The defendant stated that he set out the work and determined the levels, but had nothing to do with the paving himself, except superintending on behalf of the committee." It has been very properly admitted in argument that, for the safety of the public during the night, this part of the road should be fenced off and lighted, and otherwise protected. This work was then of a complex kind, involving four component portions—the materials to be provided for the work; the superintendence of the work; the labour; and the fencing and lighting during the night. I have looked with considerable anxiety to see what was contracted for; I cannot find anything was contracted for except the mere labour. The materials were provided by the vestry, the superintendence was provided by the vestry. By whom was the lighting and fencing to be provided? It might have been reasonable to have stipulated that the party who supplied the labour should also supply the lighting and fencing; but it does not appear that this was done. It seems that the surveyor did not contract for the lighting and fencing, and it seems to me that this part of the work remained with him, to provide for it as a part of the work to be done, from which not having divested himself, he therefore remains liable. On this short ground, without laying down any principle of law, and without interfering with any of the decisions, I am of opinion that the defendant continued responsible, and that, therefore, the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench should be reversed.

LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., BRAMWELL, B., and BRETT, J. concurred.

Solicitors for appellant, Shaw and Tremellen, for P. and J. Watson, Bury.

Solicitors for respondent, Clarke, Woodcock, and Rylands, for J. A. and J. Grundy and Co., Manchester.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Barristers-at-Law.

ELLIOT (app.) v. THOMPSON AND OTHERS (resps.).

Certiorari—Time—Quashing of order subject to special case—At what date time runs—13 Geo. 2, c. 18, s. 5.

By 13 Geo. 2, c. 18, s. 5, "no writ of certiorari shall be granted to remove any conviction, judgment, order, or other proceedings before any justices of the peace or quarter sessions, unless such certiorari be applied for within six calendar months next after such conviction, judgment, order, or other proceedings shall be had."

On 31st Oct. 1874, certain justices of the peace made an order that the appellant should pay a sum of money to the Middlesborough Local Board.

On 6th Jan. 1875, the order was quashed by the court of quarter sessions subject to a special case, which was signed by the chairman on the 1st July 1875.

Held, that an application on the part of the Middlesborough Local Board to bring up the proceeding on certiorari was out of time.

This was an application to bring up on certiorari all proceedings consequent upon a certain order of three of the respondents, being justices of the borough of Middlesborough, in the county of York, for the payment by the appellant to the Middlesborough Urban Sanitary authority of the sum of 57l., or thereabouts, for the paving, &c., of a certain street in the said borough. The appellant had refused to pay the above sum, the works having been required to be done by him by notice given under the 69th section of the Public Health Act 1848, and having been executed by the said sanitary authority on his failing to comply with such notice. On appeal to the court of quarter sessions, that court, on the 6th Jan. 1875, quashed the order of the justices, subject to the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench upon a special case, which was signed on the 1st July 1875.

The order of the respondent justices bore date 31st Oct. 1874.

A. Glen for the Middlesborough Sanitary Authority (who had been made respondents to the appeal, as well as the justices) now moved for a certiorari to bring up the order of the justices, and the whole proceedings consequent thereupon. The order was quashed, subject to a case which was not signed until 1st July, so that the six months limit has not yet elapsed. The six months begin to run from the time at which the order becomes operative. [COCKBURN, C.J.—The ultimate decision is nunc pro tunc. MELLOR, J.—I do not see how you can get out of the words of the statute.] In Oke's Magisterial Synopsis, vol. 1, p. 47, it is said that the period of six months begins to run from the time when the order becomes operative, though more than six months may have elapsed since the actual making of the order, as where it has been the subject of an appeal, in which case the time would commence running from its determination. ETHELSTANE (app.) v. THE JUSTICES OF OSWESTRY (resps.).

Permitting drunkenness—Evidence—Licensing Act 1872, s. 13.

A licensed person may be convicted for permitting drunkenness on his premises upon evidence that a person who had been drinking on such premises was found drunk at some distance from them.

THIS was an application for a rule calling upon the respondents to show cause why they should not state a case for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

It appeared from the affidavit of the appellant's solicitor, that the appellant, being a licensed person, had been convicted by the respondents of permitting drunkenness on his premises within the meaning of the Licensing Act 1872, s. 13. The evidence in support of the information was this: A police constable found a labouring man drunk in a ditch, distant about 100 yards from the appellant's premises. The man himself was called as a witness, and admitted that he had visited three or four public houses upon the night in question, the appellant's house, where he had partaken of two or more glasses of whisky, being the last in order visited. The appellant was sworn, and admitted that he had served the man with liquor, but stated that he left the house, to all appearance sober, about three quarters of an hour previous to the time (11.30 p.m.) at which he was found drunk in the ditch. Upon these facts the justices convicted the appellant, recorded the conviction upon the licence, and refused to state a case.

Willoughby, for the appellant, contended that the fact that a man was found drunk after having been on licensed premises was no evidence of his having been in a state of drunkenness on such premises, much less of the licensed person having "permitted" the drunkenness within the meaning of the statute. It might be that the man had quitted the premises before the drunkenness occurred. It was for the prosecution to prove affirmatively that drunkenness had been permitted. [COCKBURN, C.J.—If a man goes into a public house sober and comes out drunk, surely that is some evidence that he got drunk within the house, and that his drunkenness was permitted by the publican.] The case was no doubt a suspicious one; but there is a broad distinction between suspicion and legal evidence.

The Court (Cockburn, C.J., and Mellor and Quain, JJ.) were of opinion that the question was one of fact and not of law. It could not be said that there was no evidence of drunkenness having been permitted by the appellant.

Rule refused.

COULBERT (app.) v. TROKE (resp.)

Licensing Act 1874, s. 10—Bonâ fide traveller—Three mile distance—"Nearest public thoroughfare"—Ferry.

By sect. 3 of the Licensing Act 1874, no licensed person may open his premises on Good Friday before 12.30 p.m., and by sect. 9, any person who sells intoxicating liquors during prohibited hours is liable to a penalty. By sect. 10, nothing in the Act contained "shall preclude a person licensed" as therein mentioned "from selling liquor at any time to bonâ fide travellers;" and "a person shall not be deemed to be a bonâ fide traveller unless the place where he lodged during the preceding night is at least three miles distant from the place where he demanded to be supplied with liquor," the distance "to be calculated by the nearest public thoroughfare."

C. being a licensed person within the meaning of sect. 10, supplied certain persons with liquor before 12.30 p.m. on Good Friday. Such persons had in their own boats crossed an arm of the sea, about one mile broad, to reach C.'s premises. If they had come by land they would have had to walk eight miles. The arm of the sea was usually crossed by an ancient ferry, worked by C., who took toll from all persons crossing it, whether in their own boats or in his.

Held, upon a case stated by justices that the arm of the sea was the "nearest public thoroughfare," and a conviction of C. under the Licensing Act 1874, affirmed.

THIS was a case stated under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, by two justices of the county of Southampton.

The respondent had laid an information against the appellant under sect. 9 of the Licensing Act 1874 (a), for that the appellant being licensed to sell exciseable liquors by retail in the Ship Inn, at Eling, in the county of Southampton, did upon Good Friday, unlawfully open his house for the sale of intoxicating liquors before 12.30 p.m. to wit, at 11.15 a.m., the same not being for refreshment to any traveller, or to any lodger in the said house.

(a) Licensing Act 1874, s. 10, "Nothing in this Act or in the principal Act (the Licensing Act 1872) contained shall preclude a person licensed to sell any intoxicating liquor to be consumed on the premises from

The following facts were either proved or admitted:

1. The persons to whom the refreshment was supplied resided and had slept the previous night in the town of Southampton.

2. The appellant's licensed house is situate at Crackmore Hard, on the western shore of the Southampton Water, and on the opposite shore to Southampton, and is distant from the town of Southampton, by water, rather over a mile, and by the nearest road, eight miles.

3. From Southampton to Crackmore Hard is an ancient ferry, appurtenant to and held with the appellant's house, plied at irregular intervals by his boats, and a toll is claimed by him from all passengers landing at the Hard from boats belonging to him.

4. All persons landing at the Hard in other than the ferry boats have to pay a toll to the appellant.

5. All persons walking, driving, or riding, from the town of Southampton to Crackmore Hard, must go round by road, a distance of eight miles.

6. The persons found in the appellant's house and supplied by him with refreshments on the Good Friday in question, had crossed the water from Southampton to the said house in their own boats.

On the part of the appellant it was contended that the persons to whom refreshment was supplied were bond fide travellers, as, unless by crossing the Southampton water, an estuary of the sea, the distance between the two places by the nearest public thoroughfare would very considerably exceed three miles. But the justices being of opinion that the persons supplied with refreshment by the appellant, having crossed the water and landed at a ferry at which the public were entitled to land on payment of a toll, had used a public thoroughfare for the purpose of reaching the appellant's house, convicted the appellant in the mitigated penalty of ten shillings and costs.

The question of law, therefore, is, whether persons crossing the Southampton water in their own private boats, and landing at a ferry, at which the public are entitled to land on payment of a toll, have come by a public thoroughfare within the meaning of sect. 10 of the Licensing Act 1874, the appellant's house being also accessible by a public highway. If the court be of opinion that the said conviction was legally and properly made, then the selling such liquor at any time to bond fide travellers, or to persons lodging in his house. . . . A person for the purposes of this Act and the principal Act shall not be deemed to be a bond fide traveller unless the place where he lodged during the preceding night is at least three miles distant from the place where he demands to be supplied with liquor, such distance to be calculated by the nearest public thoroughfare." Sect. 8 of the Act fixes the closing hours for licensed premises, and sect 9 imposes a maximum penalty on any person selling liquor during such hours. It appears to be still law that the rejection of a bond fide traveller by an innkeeper is both actionable and indictable: (See R. v. Juellin, 12 Mod. 225; R. v. Ivens, 7 C. & P. 213; Kirkmon v. Shaucross, 5 T. B. 17; Thompson v. Lacy, 3 B. & Ald. 283; Davies v. S. race, L. Rep. 4 C. P. 172.)

said conviction is to stand, but if the court should be of opinion otherwise, then the said conviction is to be dismissed.

Bullen, for the appellant.—The "nearest public thoroughfare" in sect. 10 of the Licensing Act 1874, must mean the nearest available public thoroughfare—the nearest way open to all the public without payment, in the same manner as a public highway is. [QUAIN, J.—It cannot be said that the sea is not a public highway; and to cross the sea in a boat is just like driving along a road in a carriage]. If this conviction be affirmed, it will follow that persons who, not being able to afford to go by the ferry, have walked eight miles, will be deprived of refreshment.

No counsel appeared for the respondents.

The COURT (Mellor and Quain, JJ.) affirmed the conviction. The persons supplied with refreshment had come less than three miles by a public thoroughfare, so that they could not be deemed "bond fide travellers" within the meaning of the statute.

Conviction affirmed.

OXFORD GUARDIANS (apps.) v. BARTON (resp.)

Liability for wife's maintenance—Protection order under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 21—13 & 14 Vict. c. 101, s. 5.

Justices at petty sessions refused an application by the appellants to make an order, under 13 & 14 Vict. c. 101, s. 5, upon the respondent to maintain or contribute toward the maintenance of his wife, who was a lunatic chargeable to the appellants' Union, on the ground that a protection order, which she had obtained under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 21, and which had not been discharged, absolved him from such liability.

Held, upon a case stated, that, under the circumstances, the respondent was liable, and that the justices were wrong.

THIS was a case stated by two justices of the peace in and for the City of Oxford, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court on questions of law which arose before the said justices, as hereinafter stated.

At a petty sessions, holden at the Police Court, Town Hall, in the City of Oxford, on the 5th Jan. 1875, a complaint was preferred by the guardians of the poor within the city of Oxford, by Walter Thompson, their clerk, duly empowered by them in that behalf (the said guardians being hereinafter called the appellants), against Edward Barton (hereinafter called the respondent), under sect. 5 of the statute 13 & 14 Vict. c. 101, charging that, on the 1st. Dec. 1874, one Harriet Barton, the wife of the said Edward Barton, of Friars Entry, in the parish of St. Mary Magdalen, in the city of Oxford, being a lunatic, and being then chargeable to the united parishes within the said city of Oxford, by a certain order in that behalf of Robert Pike, Esq., one of her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said city, bearing date the same 1st. Dec., was on the same 1st Dec. conveyed and removed to the lunatic asylum, situate at Littlemore, in the county of Oxford, being an asylum for the maintenance of the pauper lunatics of the county of Oxford and city of Oxford, where she had been confined as a pauper lunatic from thence to the date of the said complaint; that she was then insane; and that the sum of 10s. 3d. was the weekly charge for her maintenance in the said asylum; and applying to the justices to make an order upon the respondent to maintain or contribute towards the maintenance of his said wife in such asylum.

The said complaint was heard and determined by the said justices, being then present, and upon such hearing the application was dismissed.

And the said justices, in compliance with an application of the appellants, and the provisions of sect. 2 of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, stated and signed the following case:

Upon the hearing of the said complaint, it was proved on the part of the appellants, and found as a fact, that the said Harriet Barton was, on the 1st Dec. 1874 removed to the said asylum, under an order of the said Robert Pike in that behalf, and that she was still an inmate of such asylum and chargeable to the united parishes within the said city of Oxford. It was also proved that the cost of maintenance of the said Harriet Barton, since her removal to the said asylum, had been at the rate of 10s. 3d. per week.

It was admitted, on the part of the appellants, that by an order under the hands and seals of two of her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said city of Oxford, dated the 23rd Dec. 1873, and made under sect. 21 of the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, after reciting that it had been proved to the said justices, upon oath and otherwise, that on the 12th Oct. 1861, the said Harriet Barton was duly married to the respondent, and that afterwards, on the 17th Aug. 1871, the respondent without reasonable cause deserted her, and that she was then maintaining herself by her own industry and property, it was ordered that the earnings and property of the said Harriet Barton, acquired or to be acquired by her since the commencement of such desertion as aforesaid, should thereafter be protected from the respondent, and from all creditors and persons claiming, or who might thereafter claim under him, and that all such earnings and property should belong and should be deemed to belong to the said Harriet Barton as if she were a feme sole. And it was further admitted on the part of the appellants that the said desertion had not ceased at the date of the removal of the said Harriet Barton to the said asylum, and that the said protection order had not been discharged.

It was admitted on the part of the respondent that the said Harriet Barton was his wife, but it was contended by him that the procurement by the said Harriet Barton of the recited order absolved him from all liability to maintain or to contribute towards the maintenance of the said Harriet Barton so long as the said order continued in force.

The justices were of opinion that the contention of the respondent was well founded, and they, therefore, dismissed the application of the appellants for the following, amongst other reasons:

First. That by sect. 21 of the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, in the case of any such order as that hereinbefore recited being made, "the wife shall, during the continuance thereof, be and be deemed to have been, during such desertion of her, in the like position in all respects, with regard to property and contracts, and suing and being sued, as she would be under this Act if she obtained a decree of judicial separation;" and that by sect. 28 of the same statute, "in every case of a judicial separation the wife shall, whilst so separated, be considered as a feme sole for the purposes of contract, and wrongs and injuries, and suing or being sued in any civil proceeding; and her husband shall not be liable in respect of any engagement or contract she may have entered into, or for any wrongful act or omission by her." That these provisions of the said 21st section could not be intended exclusively for the benefit of the wife, leaving the husband's liabilities intact; for then he might be liable for the trade debts of his wife. That the wife's status generally was intended to be that of a married woman under a judicial separation, so long as the order continued, because the 21st section would not otherwise take away the husband's ordinary marital rights, such as cohabitation. That this right was intended to be taken away appears clear, for otherwise the provisions of the 21st section for the protection to the wife would be left to the husband's discretion, and could be put an end to at any time at his option, whereas there is provision expressly made for his applying for a discharge of the order by the justices. The words used are that the wife's position in all respects shall be that of a wife judicially separated, with regard to property and contracts, and suing and being sued; thus not limiting the protection to her property and contracts, or to her "suing and being sued." But the wife could hardly be in this position unless the husband was also, for otherwise the wife's creditors would be the parties benefited, for their rights would be doubled. They would have their old rights against the husband, in addition to their new ones against the wife as a feme sole. But if the Act renders this contention inapplicable to any creditors, it does so to all creditors; and if trade creditors could only sue her as a feme sole, creditors also who supplied her with necessaries would be in the same position. In other words, the usual common law as to the wife being the husband's agent for obtaining necessaries, does not apply to a wife with a protection order, living as a feme sole. And provision is expressly made that the protection order shall only be made in case "the wife is maintaining herself by her own industry or property." This provision would be unnecessary if the husband's liability continued; and if these continued he might be prosecuted as a rogue and vagabond for being of sufficient ability to support his wife, and yet not actually maintaining her. But this criminal liability was hardly intended to apply whilst the wife was living apart from her husband as a feme sole.

Secondly. That the equitable maxim that a man cannot take advantage of his own wrong does not prevent this interpretation, because it would apply even more strongly in cases of judicial separation, and would apply most strongly in cases of absolute divorce, where the liability of the husband would admittedly cease.

Thirdly. That on a judicial separation the husband is not liable to support his wife, or supply her with necessaries. In sect. 26 of the above Act it is provided, "That where, upon any judicial separation, alimony has been decreed or ordered to be paid to the wife, and the same shall not be duly paid by the husband, he shall be liable for necessaries supplied for her use;" clearly implying that unless alimony had been decreed or ordered,

Q.B. Div.]

MUNDAY (app.) v. MAIDEN (resp.).

and was left unpaid, the husband would not be liable for necessities.

Fourthly. That the justices, under 13 & 14 Vict. c. 101, s. 5, having considered the circumstances of the present case, including their previous order for the protection of the wife's property, had power to decline, so long as such order continued, to make the husband pay any sum towards the maintenance of his wife, notwithstanding that his pecuniary position of itself might have justified such an order.

The question of law upon which this case is stated for the opinion of the court, therefore, is whether the justices had the power, so long as their previous protection order to the wife continued in force, to decline to make an order under 13 & 14 Vict. c. 101, s. 5, upon the husband, notwithstanding that his pecuniary position of itself might have justified such an order, and the court is humbly solicited, according to the power vested in it by statute, to remit the case to the justices, with the opinion of the court thereon, or to make such other order as to the court may seem fit.

This case came to be heard on the 8th June, before Lush and Quain, JJ.

Haselfoot argued for appellants, the guardians. —It has been held in Ramsden v. Brearley (32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 24; L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 147), that the 21st and 26th sections of this Act are to be read together, and that, for all purposes, a woman with an order of protection is in the same position as if she were judicially separated from her husband; but it does not follow that a husband, although not liable for his wife's necessities after a judicial separation, should be absolved from this liability, which is a question between the parish and the husband, and not between the wife and the husband or his creditors. [QUAIN, J.—It would be strange if the desertion by the husband could give him protection from liability for his wife's chargeability.] The wife, with a protection order, is in the position of a feme sole only, with respect to the matters mentioned in the statutes, viz., for the purposes of property and contract, wrongs and injuries, and suing or being sued in any civil proceeding. This is an application on behalf of the ratepayers, and is not touched by the statute concerning the position of protected and separated wives. Thus it appears from Thomas v. Alsop (L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 151), which was a decision upon 31 & 32 Vict. c. 122, s. 33, containing almost the same words as 13 & 14 Vict. c. 101, s. 5.

No one appeared for the respondent, but in consequence of some doubts expressed by Lush, J., the case was directed to be re-argued before the full court.

Nov. 6.—Haselfoot again appeared for the guardians; but, after reading the special case, and the sections of the statute upon which it depends, he was stopped by the court (Cockburn, C.J., Mellor and Quain, JJ.), who said the matter seemed too clear to be argued, and directed that the justices should make the order of maintenance upon the respondent.

Common assault—Subsequent indecency—Aggravated nature—24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 43.

The appellant placed a girl of eight years old on his knee and kissed her. About a quarter of an hour afterwards, without asking her to do anything or again touching her, he exposed his person and abused himself in her presence. The justices sentenced him to six months' hard labour for an assault of an aggravated nature on a female, under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 43.

Held, upon a case stated, that what took place after the assault was over could not be said to render the assault one of an aggravated nature within the words of this section, and that the conviction must be quashed.

THIS was a case stated by two justices of the peace for the borough of Hanley, in the county of Stafford, under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court upon the question of law which arose before them as herein-after stated.

At a petty session of the peace, holden in and for the said borough of Hanley, on the 14th Nov. 1874, one Robert Munday, the above-named defendant, was brought before the said justices in custody, and charged upon the information of one Eliza Maiden, the informant, with having on the 12th of the same month of Nov., at the borough of Hanley, unlawfully assaulted one Martha Maiden, a child in the eighth year of her age; and the said parties respectively being then present, the said charge was duly heard by the said justices, and upon such hearing the said Robert Munday was duly convicted of the said offence; and they adjudged that the said Robert Munday, for his said offence, should be imprisoned in the House of Correction at Stafford, in and for the said county, and there kept to hard labour for six calendar months.

And the said justices, upon the request in writing of the said Robert Munday, who was dissatisfied with the said determination as being erroneous in point of law, and in pursuance of the said statute, stated and signed the following case:

At the hearing of the said information the following facts were proved:

The said Robert Munday was a lodger in the house of the said Eliza Maiden. The said Martha Maiden is her daughter, and is not quite eight years old. On Thursday, the said 12th Nov., the said Eliza Maiden left her house in the said borough about one o'clock in the afternoon, and remained away therefrom for two or three hours. She left the said Martha Maiden and the said Robert Munday together alone in the house, and the said Robert Munday knew that the said Eliza Maiden had gone out. When the said Eliza Maiden went out the said Robert Munday and Martha Maiden were in the sitting room of the house on the ground floor having their dinner. The said Robert Munday first finished his dinner; and when he had done so he sat down in an arm chair in the sitting room in front of the fire. Soon afterwards the said Martha Maiden finished her dinner, and then the said Robert Munday called her to him. She went to him and he cleaned her finger nails and had her on his knee. He kissed her four or five times, and she then got off his knee. About a quarter of an hour afterwards, the said Robert

Munday, still continuing to sit in the said chair, and the said Martha Maiden standing by a table, the said Robert Munday unbuttoned his trousers, pulled out his person, and abused himself in the presence of the said Martha Maiden. Whilst doing so he called her attention to it, but he did not ask her to do anything, nor was it alleged that he again touched her. She stated that she told the said Robert Munday that what he did was naughty. When Eliza Maiden came home Martha Maiden made a communication to her, Robert Munday having left the house before Eliza Maiden's return.

The evidence of the said Martha Maiden was not in any way corroborated. In cross-examination by the attorney of the said Robert Munday, she stated that the said Robert Munday had never kissed her before, and had never cleaned her finger nails before.

It was contended on behalf of the said Robert Munday, that to constitute an assault there must have been either a hostile intention or some actual corporal injury towards the complainant; and that there was no evidence of such hostile intention as to justify a conviction, and that there was no assault in law.

The said justices, however, being of opinion that the conduct of the said Robert Munday in taking the said Martha Maiden on his knee, in cleaning her finger nails, and in kissing her, amounted in law, under the circumstances before stated, to an assault, and they, therefore, convicted the said Robert Munday as aforesaid.

The questions of law arising on the above statement for the opinion of this court, therefore, were, whether the said acts of the said Robert Munday, or any of them, constituted, under the circumstances aforesaid, an assault in law. If the court should be of opinion that the said conviction was legally and properly made, and the said Robert Munday is liable as aforesaid, then the said conviction was to stand; but if the court should be of opinion otherwise, then the said information was to be dismissed.

Bealey argued for the appellant.—There are two objections to this conviction, either of which, if valid, must be conclusive in favour of the appellant. First, this was not a common assault; and, secondly, even if by reason of the child's tender age her consent did not alter the legal effect of what might have been an assault, had she been kissed and placed on defendant's knee against her will, yet the sentence of six months' imprisonment with hard labour, being the utmost penalty for an assault of an aggravated nature, could not be applicable to the circumstances of this case; and in either event the conviction must be quashed. But, for what subsequently took place, which was considered, apparently, by the justices to show the indecent motive which prompted the defendant, there was certainly no assault in his first proceedings, so long as they were without any further intention. If their nature appeared to be different in consequence of what followed, the acts must constitute either an indecent assault or an indecent exposure of the person; both of which are punishable only by indictment. The justices cannot give themselves jurisdiction by holding an indictable offence to be a mere common assault. The sentence was imposed under sect. 43 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100: "When any person shall be charged before two justices of the peace with an assault or battery upon any male child, whose age shall not in the opinion of such justices exceed fourteen years, or upon any female, either upon the complaint of the party aggrieved or otherwise, the said justices, if the assault or battery is of such an aggravated nature that it cannot in their opinion be sufficiently punished under the provisions hereinbefore contained as to common assaults and batteries, may proceed to hear and determine the same in a summary way; and if the same be proved, may convict the person accused; and every such offender shall be liable to be imprisoned in the common gaol or house of correction, with or without hard labour, for any period not exceeding six months, or to pay a fine." The previous section limits the imprisonment by justices for a common assault or battery to two months. This last point is concluded by the case of Re Thompson (6 H. & N. 193), which, although before this Act, was decided upon a provision totidem verbis in 16 & 17 Vict. c. 30, s. 1. It was there held by the whole court that the section applied only to common assaults, and not to an assault accompanied by any circumstances which make it a distinct offence recognised by the law as something more than a mere assault. [COCKBURN, C.J.—In that case the facts proved constituted a rape, which it was said was an offence of a different class from an assault. The difficulty here, as it seems to me, is to hold that what took place after the assault was entirely concluded, could possibly aggravate the previous assault.] That objection is quite sufficient for my purpose.

Latham appeared for the respondent.

COCKBURN, C.J.—It does not appear from the facts stated that the defendant's indecent behaviour a quarter of an hour after the assault proved, was connected with the assault. It could not, therefore, render the assault proved one of an aggravated nature.

FIELD, J., concurred.

Poor rate—Race course—Actual profits—Admissible evidence.

The appellants, at the hearing by quarter sessions of their appeal against the rate made upon their racecourse, proved the rent they paid, but were called upon to produce their books of account, showing their receipts and expenditure; and the respondents tendered other affirmative evidence of the profits made thereby. The quarter sessions refused to receive this evidence.

Held, upon a case stated, that the actual profits might be material in fixing the assessable value, and this evidence was therefore admissible.

THIS was an appeal by John Frederick Verrall and Henry Wright to the Easter Quarter Sessions for the County of Surrey, against a poor rate made by the Guardians of the Croydon Union, and affirmed by the Union Assessment Committee.

The court of quarter sessions gave judgment for the appellants, subject to the following case:

The appellants are the occupiers of certain land in the parish of Croydon, in the county of Surrey, in the Croydon Union. The respondents are the Guardians of the Croydon Union and the Union Assessment Committee.

The land occupied by the appellants in respect of the occupation of which the rate appealed against was made, consisted of 119a. 3r. 27p., of which 101a. 3r. 30p. were used by the appellants as a racecourse, and the residue for agricultural purposes.

The part of the land in question occupied as a racecourse is railed off from the other land, and there are erected thereon several stands for the use of persons coming to see the races, to wit, a grand stand having accommodation for 2000 persons, and a small stand for 600 persons. The appellants charge prices varying from 7s. 6d. to 3s. 6d. to each person using the stands, and the appellants also on days on which races are held let off at varying rentals portions of the land to be occupied by refreshment booths, &c. The appellants give stakes and cups to be run for at the race meetings, at some of which the added money amounts to 500*l.*, which is paid by the appellants.

The appellants occupy the whole of the land in question as tenants of Mr. Lewis Lloyd, under a lease for ten years, from Christmas 1868, at a rental of 86*l.* 10s. Before Christmas 1868 the appellants had occupied the same land in the same manner, and with similar buildings on it, as tenants of the trustees of Archbishop Whitgift's Hospital at Croydon, under a lease which had not expired before Christmas 1868, at a rent of about 32*l.* per annum; this lease the appellants surrendered to Mr. Lewis Lloyd, who sometime in the year 1868 purchased the freehold of the land in question, and who thereupon granted the above-mentioned lease for ten years, at an annual rental of 86*l.* 10s. This surrender was in pursuance of an arrangement made at the time the said Mr. Lewis Lloyd purchased, that the appellants should surrender and take a lease at a per centage on the purchase-money.

The following is the entry in the valuation list and in the rate book of the rate appealed against:

		Estimated extent.	Gross estimated rental.	Rateable value.
J. F. Verrall and others	Land occupied as a race- course, grand stand, refreshment rooms, &c., Woodside	...	£ 2200	£ 2000

On the hearing before the court of quarter sessions, the appellants called two land surveyors and auctioneers as witnesses, who put the rateable value of the land at 61*l.* These witnesses arrived at the estimated value of 61*l.* as follows: 81 acres at 3*l.* 10s. per acre, 257*l.*; 20 acres at 1*l.* 10s. per acre, 30*l.*; 14 acres at 2*l.* 5s. per acre, 32*l.*; 2 acres 12 perches, 2*l.*; homestead and two cottages, 60*l.*; total, 411*l.*; and 200*l.* in addition, being 10 per cent. on the estimated cost of construction of grand and other stands. These witnesses also stated that neither of them had ever before valued a racecourse, and that they had no information as to the receipts of this course, and no idea of its profits.

The respondents called for the production of the appellants' books of accounts, showing the receipts and expenditure in respect of the racecourse, which books the appellants had received notice to produce. The respondents also proposed to give affirmative evidence of the profits derived from the land in question used as a racecourse, as being material in ascertaining its present rateable value.

The court of quarter sessions decided that the respondents were not entitled to call for the production of the said books of account, nor to give the said affirmative evidence.

The court of quarter sessions being of opinion that the above-mentioned evidence tendered by the respondents was inadmissible, gave judgment for the appellants, disallowing the rate appealed against, and made an order reducing the rate to 1000*l.* gross estimated rental, and 850*l.* rateable value, subject to the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench as to the admissibility of the above-mentioned evidence.

If the Court of Queen's Bench shall be of opinion that the above-mentioned evidence, or any part thereof, was admissible, then the judgment of the court of quarter sessions and the order based thereon shall be void and of no effect, and the appeal remitted to the said court of quarter sessions in order that such evidence as aforesaid may be taken. Otherwise the judgment of the said court of quarter sessions to be affirmed, and their said order to stand.

Thesiger, Q.C. and Oppenheim, argued for the appellants.—The question here is, whether the rate is to be fixed by the profit of a particular tenant or by the rent which may be obtained generally for the land and premises. [COCKBURN, C.J.—Is not the best information as to the rent which the hypothetical tenant would pay to be obtained from the actual tenant's books?] It has been held over and over again in analogous cases, that the profits of a trade are no test of the rateable value of the premises upon which the trade is carried on. [COCKBURN, C.J.—Here the profits are derived from the possession of the land] The renting of a race course cannot be said to be property suu generis, so as to necessitate an inquiry into the actual profits in order to arrive at the assessment. The appellants are in a position similar to that of the lessee of a theatre who should not be assessed according to the run of a particular play, but at the amount any person would pay in order to perform any dramatic pieces. [COCKBURN, C.J.—We have to say whether this evidence would be material in arriving at the rateable value.] If admitted, it would not establish the rent at which another tenant would take it. Surely the best test is the rent actually paid.

Edward Clarke, contra, was not heard.

FIELD, J.—I desire it to be understood that I decide for the respondents only on the ground that this information, which the quarter sessions refused to admit, may be material to the proper assessment of the appellants. It does not follow that the rate is to be determined by the amount of the appellants' receipts.

COURT OF APPEAL.

SITTINGS AT WESTMINSTER.

APPEAL FROM THE COMMON PLEAS.

Reported by GILBERT G. KENNEDY, Barrister-at-Law.

Monday, Nov. 22, 1875.

Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Cairns), KELLY, C.B., BRAMWELL, B., and BLACKBURN, J.)

ABBOTT v. BATES.

Apprentice—Necessaries—Evidence of custom to explain the terms of a deed.Where in a deed of apprenticeship the master covenanted to find meat, drink, lodging, and all other necessities, and certain wages:Held, that he was not entitled to set-off the cost of clothes and washing supplied to the apprentice against the wages due to him, and a custom among masters to deduct the cost of clothes and washing from the wages paid to the apprentice could not be supported on the ground that clothes and washing being necessities in the ordinary sense of the word, such a custom would contravene the terms of the deed.

THIS was an action brought on an indenture of apprenticeship to recover wages payable under it. The defendant pleaded by way of set-off a claim for clothes and washing supplied to the apprentice during the service.

The action was tried before Quain, J., at the summer assizes held at Manchester, in 1873, when a verdict was given for the defendant. A rule was obtained, pursuant to leave reserved, to enter the verdict for the plaintiff for 30*l.*, or for a new trial, on the ground, that evidence as to custom was inadmissible, and that there was no evidence to go to the jury thereof; and that, upon the evidence given with regard to the alleged custom, the judge ought to have directed a verdict for the plaintiff; and on the ground of misdirection in admitting evidence as to custom, and leaving the same to the jury, and in directing them that such custom would control the contract; and also on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence. This rule came on to be argued in the Common Pleas on 5th Feb. 1874, before Keating, Grove, and Honyman, JJ., and was made absolute (see the case reported 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 99; 43 L. J. 99, C. P.); the defendant appealed against that decision.

The defendant was a horse trainer, and the plaintiff, Thomas Abbott, was bound to him as apprentice for five years from 31st Dec. 1867. By the apprenticeship deed the plaintiff put himself apprentice to the defendant to learn the defendant's trade and business of a horse trainer, and with him, after the manner of an apprentice to serve from the 31st Dec. 1867, until the full end and term of five years from thence next following, in the art of a horse trainer; and the defendant thereby covenanted with the plaintiff that he would among other things, find the under-mentioned yearly wages, lodgings, and all other necessities during the said term, that is to say, for the first year the sum of 4*l.*, for the second year the sum of 5*l.*, for the third year the sum of 6*l.*, for the fourth year the sum of 7*l.*, and for the fifth year the sum of 8*l.*

When the boy had served his time, there was due to him according to the rate mentioned in the deed, 30*l.* for wages, but the master refused to pay him anything, alleging that he had supplied him with clothes to the amount of 35*l.*, and that he was therefore entitled to retain the wages to recoup himself.

At the trial, the defendant, to explain the word "necessaries," under which the plaintiff contended he had a right to be found in clothes and washing by the master, called a number of other trainers, who all said that it was the custom for the boys to pay for their clothes and washing. It was admitted that ordinarily "necessaries" would include clothing, but contended that in the special trade of a trainer, it was by universal custom otherwise. The defendant objected to the admission of this evidence, but the judge received it, reserving leave to move as above stated.

Russell, Q.C. and Baylis Q.C. for the defendant, the present appellant.—The question is how far extrinsic evidence of a custom would be admitted to control what prima facie would be the meaning of the word "necessaries" in this indenture. [KELLY, C.B.—What is the custom?] To set-off from wages the washing and clothing supplied. By the usage it was customary to supply the clothes and washing, but the custom was to deduct the price of the clothes and washing from the wages. [BRAMWELL, B.—It is setting up a custom to alter the indenture.] But all the cases go to that extent, see Wigglesworth v. Dallison (1 Smith's Leading Cases 539), and cases there cited. It puts on the trainer the obligation to supply these necessities, but gives the boy the right to get them for himself. [The LORD CHANCELLOR.—If the word "necessaries" has the ordinary meaning, it includes clothing, can you escape that?] The clothing and washing are not "necessaries" in the sense in which meat and drink are "necessaries" in this indenture. The necessity for these necessities arises before any wages are due; the effect of the indenture is, that the master is bound to supply clothing and washing; the wages may never become due. Where general words are used an incident may be annexed which would control those general words:

Grant v. Maddox, 15 M. & W. 787;Brown v. Byrne, 3 E. & B. 703; 23 L. T. Rep. 154.

Herschell, Q.C. and Grantham, contra, were not called upon.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Cairns).—I am anxious, in expressing my opinion, to put aside all technical difficulties which may be in the way of the appellants, and to decide this case upon what is the real question and the question upon which the contest at the trial took place. The plaintiff is a boy who is apprenticed to the defendant, a horse trainer, and who in this action sues for the wages which are due to him under the apprenticeship, amounting to 30*l.* The defence raised against this claim is, that the master has supplied him with clothes and washing to the amount of 35*l.*, and that the master is entitled to deduct this from the boy's wages. Now that could only be supported by one of two points. The first, which was raised at the trial, is, that though this is a contract for necessities, "the master finding unto the apprentice sufficient meat, drink, certain yearly wages, lodgings, and all other necessities during the term," yet that the word "necessaries" has a limited meaning in that trade, and has not the general meaning which law and common understanding would give it. That would be a perfectly legitimate defence, and would go to establish that the master had not supplied the clothing and washing under this deed. But how does this now stand? The point is virtually given up, and, I think, rightly, since there was no evidence that in the trade the word "necessaries" has acquired that limited meaning. On the first point, therefore, I am of opinion there is no evidence to show that the word bears the restricted meaning which the defendant seeks to put upon it. Passing from that, I come to the second point on which the appellant claims to rest his case. It is next contended that under this contract there is an obligation on the master to supply the apprentice with clothing and washing, but that there is a custom which has grown up of deducting or stopping out, of the wages of the apprentice, the value of the clothes and the washing. Now it appears to me that, even if this had been proved to the letter, it would not have availed the defendant, as it would have been a custom in direct violation of the terms of the deed, and therefore invalid. The deed runs thus: "And the defendant thereby covenanted with the plaintiff that he would, amongst other things, find the undermentioned yearly wages, lodgings, and all other necessities during the said term, that is to say, for the first year the sum of 4*l.*," and so on. Now if these words mean anything, they mean a covenant by the master to supply meat, drink, lodgings, and other necessities gratis; and when in opposition to that, the custom says that the cost of some of the necessities supplied is to be deducted from the wages, it appears to me to be a custom at variance with the deed, and not in accordance with the cases which have been cited showing that a custom may be introduced into a contract.

HARGREAVES (app.) v. HOPPER (resp.).

[C.P. Div.]

REGISTRATION CASE.

Tuesday, Nov. 16, 1875.

HARGREAVES (app.) v. HOPPER (resp.).

Parliamentary voter — County voter — Infant — 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, s. 6—6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, s. 40.

H. came of age between the last day of July and the day for the revision of the lists of county voters. The revising barrister struck his name off.

Held by the Court (Lord Coleridge, C.J. and Archibald, J., Grove, J., dubitante) that though H. was otherwise qualified to vote, his name was properly struck off, on the ground that he was not of full age on the last day of July.

This was an appeal from the decision of the revising barrister appointed to revise the lists of Parliamentary voters for the north-eastern division of the county of Lancaster. The case stated for the opinion of the court was as follows:—

John Hopper, of, &c., duly objected to the name of Joseph Hargreaves, of, &c., being retained in the list of voters for, &c.

The name of the said Joseph Hargreaves was inserted by the overseer in the list of persons entitled to vote in the election of a knight or knights of the shire for, &c., in respect of his occupation as tenant of a house and shop at, &c., of the rateable value of 12*l.* or upwards.

It appeared by the evidence that the said Joseph Hargreaves had occupied the said shop for two years, or thereabouts, but that he only attained the age of 21 after the expiration of the qualifying year, namely, on the 16th Sept.

It was contended on behalf of the said John Hopper, that the said Joseph Hargreaves was not entitled to have his name retained in the said list under the 6th section of the Representation of the People Act 1867, because he had not as a person of full age occupied the said premises during the whole or any part of the qualifying year.

I concurred in this view, and struck off the name of the said John Hargreaves from the, &c.

If the court be of opinion that my decision was wrong, the register to be amended by restoring the name of the said Joseph Hargreaves on the list."

Gorst, Q.C., appeared for the appellant.—The appellant was an infant on the 31st July, but at the time of revision he was of full age. The qualification for a vote is defined in 30 & 31 Vict., c. 102, sect. 6 (the Representation of the People Act). This Act has to be construed together with the Registration Acts, to one of which, viz., 6 Vict. c. 18, it is necessary to refer. Sect. 40 of the Act, 6 Vict. c. 18 enacts: That after the objector has proved that he has given proper notice of objection "every" revising "barrister shall then require it to be proved that the person so objected to was entitled on the last day of July, then next preceding to have his name inserted in the list of voters in respect of the qualification described in such list; and in case the same shall not be proved to the satisfaction of such barrister, or in case it shall be proved that such person was then incapacitated by any law or statute from voting," such barrister shall expunge the name. By this section the claimant has to prove his property qualification, and then the objector has to prove that the claimant "was then" incapacitated. This does not refer to his capacity on the 31st July, but to his capacity at the time of the holding of the revision. If it were not so the words of the 6th section of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102 would have to be treated as inoperative. The words are: "Every man shall be entitled to be registered as a voter, and when registered, to vote, who is qualified, as follows: 1. Is of full age, and not subject to any legal incapacity." Then follow certain property qualifications for all of which the 31st July is the time from which to reckon by reason of express words to that effect, whilst for the personal qualification of "full age," nothing is said as to the 31st July, but the word "is" is used, so that if a man is of full age when the revision takes place it is enough. The point, however, is governed by authority, in the case of Powell v. Bradley (11 L. T. Rep. N.S. 602; Hop. & Phil. 159; 18 C.B., N. S., 65; 34 L. J. 67, C. P.) Erle, C.J., says: "That it is sufficient if the claimant is of full age at the time of claiming his vote," and "that the question for the revising barrister is, whether at the time of the claim before him to be put upon the register, the claimant would, if an election was at that moment being held, be a party qualified to vote." "Really and truly," he says, "the revising

WOOD (app.) v. HOPPER (resp.).

barrister's court is substituted for a discussion at the polling booth." This case of Powell v. Bradley is mentioned without disapproval, and is to a certain extent relied on by the court in Lord Rendlesham v. Howard (2 Hop & Colt. 175, 184; 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 679; L. Rep. 9 C. P. 252, 256.), and the principle that the revising barrister's court is substituted for a discussion at the polling booth is expressly affirmed in that case. If my construction is incorrect the franchise is given by one Act and taken away by another, and persons of full age must be struck off the register, because at some anterior time when there was no election they were minors.

LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—The revising barrister's decision must be affirmed. The short point is that the appellant was not a person of full age on the 31st July preceding the revision. The words of the Registration Act, 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, sect. 40, are perfectly clear, "was entitled" and "was not then incapacitated;" the difficulty, however, is caused by the wording of the Representation of the People Act (30 & 31 Vict. c. 102). There it is plain that the word "is" in the second clause of sect. 6, must be read "was," for the revision is always some weeks later than the last day of July. This, therefore, affords assistance in construing the word "is" in the first clause of that section. I regard the section as standing thus: "Every man shall, &c., who is qualified as follows, is of full age according to the Registration Acts." We were properly pressed by Mr. Gorst with the dicta of Erle, C.J., in the case of Powell v. Bradley. The decision of the court there was not upon the present point, otherwise we might have felt some difficulty in departing from what had been decided. All that was there actually decided was that it was unnecessary that the claimant should have been of full age throughout the whole of the qualifying year, and in that I most fully concur. The claimant there was of full age on the 31st July, the claimant here was not. Erle, C.J., certainly thought, though it was unnecessary for the decision of the case before him to come to any conclusion on the question, that the revising barrister had only to study the age of the claimant on the day of the revision. I do not agree with him in that opinion, though I fully endorse the actual judgment in that case. The rest of the court do not, so far as I have seen, express any concurrence in these opinions of the Chief Justice; though agreeing in the actual decision come to. I was pressed, too, by the case of Lord Rendlesham v. Howard. It was the first judgment which I pronounced in this court, and though I do not for a moment desire to withdraw from that judgment, yet the observations which I am reported in 2 Hop. & Colt. 189, as making upon Powell v. Bradley are quite obiter, and do not carry that case any further.

GROVE, J.—I entertain the greatest doubt upon this matter. I hesitate to alter the words of Acts of Parliament. If it were possible to fulfil literally both Acts of Parliament, I could not concur in any decision which reads into either of the Acts words which are not there, but the second clause of the Representation of the People Act cannot be read as it stands; "is," must so far be construed as "was." I have not an opinion on the point sufficiently strong to induce me to differ from the rest of the court, but it is with the greatest doubt that I concur.

ARCHIBALD, J.—I think that when the two sections, section 6 of the Representation of the People Act, and section 40 of the Registration Act (6 & 7 Vict. c. 18) are read together as by section 59 of the Representation of the People Act they are to be, the conclusion to be arrived at is, that the word "is" in the Representation of the People Act must be construed to mean "is according to the Registration Act," and that consequently the decision of the revising barrister is correct.

REGISTRATION CASE.

Tuesday, Nov. 16, 1875.

WOOD (app.) v. HOPPER (resp.).

County voter—Parliamentary voter—40s. freehold—8 Hen. 6.

The appellant claimed to vote for the county in respect of two freehold rentcharges, each of which was less than 40s. a year, but which together were more than 40s. a year.

Held by the Court (Lord Coleridge, C.J., Archibald, and Grove, JJ.) that he was entitled to vote.

THIS was an appeal from the decision of the revising barrister for the North Eastern Division of the county of Lancaster.

The facts as stated in the case were as follows:

Wood (the appellant) was seised in fee of two separate rentcharges arising from different plots of land and created at different times; one was of the yearly value of 1l. 5s., the other of the yearly value of 1l. 3s. 7d.

It was contended on behalf of the objector (the now respondent) before the revising barrister that Wood was not entitled to have his name retained on the said list of voters, inasmuch as neither of the said rentcharges was of the value of 40s. a year, whilst the language of the statute 8 Hen. 6, as to who shall be choosers says, "Whereof every one of them shall have free land or tenement of the value of 40s. by the year," from which it was argued that a rentcharge being a tenement, and the word tenement being used in the statute in the singular number, it was impossible to add two rentcharges or two tenements together to make up the requisite sum. That a rentcharge was so called because of the power of distress in the deed creating the same, and in each of the above cases the power of distress was confined to the particular plot from which the rentcharges issued respectively. The revising barrister expunged the name of the appellant from the list of Parliamentary voters, being of opinion the objections raised were valid; and the question for the Court was as to the correctness of this decision.

Gorst, Q.C. for the appellant.—The qualification by 8 Hen. 6 is that the elector shall have "frank tenement to the value of 40s. by year at least, above all charges," and then the Act goes on, "such as have the greatest number of them that may expend 40s. by the year" shall be returned. Thus showing that it was perfectly immaterial whether the money came from two plots or one, or whether the distresses would have to be separate or not.

J. Edwards, Q.C. for the respondent, submitted that the words in the original, "frank tenement," being in the singular number, could not be read as covering two separate tenements.

LORD COLBRIDGE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the decision of the revising barrister was wrong. The question is whether it makes any difference that the qualification in respect of which the appellant claimed to vote as a county voter arose from two separate tenements, instead of from one single tenement. I place my opinion upon the statute 8 Hen. 6. It enacts that the knights of the shire shall be chosen by people, "whereof every one of them shall have free tenement to the value of 40s. by the year." This is explained by the next clause, by saying that the knight who is voted for by the greatest number of those "who may expend 40s. by the year and above as aforesaid," is to be deemed elected. Thus making it clear that all that is requisite is that the electors should have the value mentioned in freehold.

GROVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. There is nothing in the statute to render it necessary that the whole qualification should be from one single holding, and there is certainly nothing in reason to render it so.

ARCHIBALD, J.—I am of the same opinion.

M'HOLE v. DAVIES.

Market Act, contravention of—Sale otherwise than in vendor's dwelling place or shop—Swansea Corporation Act, 1863, s. 38—Market and Fairs Clauses Act, 1847, s. 13.

By sect. 38 of the Swansea Corporation Act, 1863, every person exposing for sale in any place within the Borough, "except in his own dwelling place or shop," any articles in respect of which tolls are by the Act authorised to be taken in the market is liable to a penalty.

M. exposed for sale 200 sheep in an open yard, separated from his house by a small covered space, and extending about 160ft. from the street doors. The communication between the house and the yards was by stairs leading down into the covered space, the ceiling of which was partly formed by the floor of the house.

Held, upon a case stated under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, that M. was rightly convicted of a contravention of the Swansea Corporation Act.

THIS was a case stated for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench, under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, by the stipendiary magistrate for the Borough of Swansea.

1. (a) The information was laid by Mr. Evan Davies, who is the manager of the Cattle Market, and is in the employ of Mr. James Perry, the lessee and farmer of the tolls thereof under the Corporation of Swansea, and he is also one of the sureties of the said James Perry in a bond given by him to the Corporation as security for the due payment of rent and performance of the stipulations in the lease. The information was laid by the authority of the said lessee and farmer of tolls.

2. It was contended on the part of the appellant, as a preliminary objection, that it was not competent for the said Evan Davies to lay such information, on the ground that he is not an officer appointed by the corporation, or authorised by them in writing to do so. The statute under which the information was laid contains no enactment as to the mode of procedure in such cases, but it is incorporated with the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act, 1847, except sections 12, 13, 19, and 50; also the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, and the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act Amendment Act 1860. Again, the 32nd section of the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act incorporates with it the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, as to the recovery of penalties, and provides for the recovery thereof in the same manner as the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act above referred to, that is to say, under sect. 45. Every penalty or forfeiture may be recovered by summary proceeding before two justices, and on complaint made to any justice, he shall issue a summons requiring the party complained against to appear.

3. Having regard to these enactments and to the evidence, the magistrate overruled the above objection on the grounds that it was not necessary that the information should be laid by a party aggrieved; secondly, that if it were necessary, the said Evan Davies had a sufficient, though not a direct, interest in the market tolls, by reason of the said bond and suretyship to constitute him a party aggrieved by the alleged act of defendant; and thirdly, that the appearance of the defendant cured any defect in the summons and information.

4. The summons was as follows, omitting formal portions:

For that you, the said William M'Hole, on the 13th day of April instant, at the town of Swansea, did then and there unlawfully expose for sale 200 sheep in a certain place other than out of the Swansea Market there situate, that is to say, in a shed situate in Back-street, in the town of Swansea aforesaid, the said place not being a dwelling-house or shop in your occupation, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

5. The information and summons were founded on the 38th section of The Swansea Municipal Corporation Act 1863, which is as follows:

After the passing of this Act every person other than a licensed hawk, who shall sell, or expose for sale, in any place within the borough, except in his own dwelling place or shop, any articles in respect of which tolls are by this Act authorised to be taken in the market, shall for every such offence be liable to a penalty not exceeding 40s. Provided always that nothing in this Act contained shall subject any person to a penalty for exposing for sale any horse, mare, or gelding, at any stable within the borough, or for exhibiting any horse, mare, or gelding within a distance of 200 yards from any stable at which the same may be exposed for sale as aforesaid. (a)

6. It was admitted that the defendant resides in Back-street in the said borough, and that he occupies a large yard adjoining his residence, in which there are sheds and other places for sale of

(a) The case as stated by the stipendiary magistrate was not divided into paragraphs. Upon observing this, the court was about to decline to hear the case, but, as it appeared that the appellant was not in fault, consented to do so.

(a) The Market and Fairs Clauses Act 1847, sect. 13, is mutatis mutandis, and with the exception of the proviso, identical with this section.

cattle and sheep, and that on the day named in the summons he did expose for sale 200 sheep.

7. The entrance to the yard and sheds is from Back-street, through double wooden doors. After passing through the doors a person first enters a place about 30ft. by 20ft., covered in by beams and flooring. The defendant resides in a small house, supported by pillars on either side of this place, the floor of his house forming the ceiling of this underspace. The yard then extends further without a ceiling to the length altogether of about 158ft. from the street doors, and this part is filled with sheds for the accommodation of a considerable number of cattle and sheep. There is no communication between the dwelling house above and the sheds in the yard by covered way or through the house. In order to enter the yard and shed, the defendant descends stairs from his dwelling house above into the said covered spaces, and thence passes into the open yard and sheds.

Upon the facts admitted, and after a personal view, the magistrate convicted the defendant, and fined him 1s., together with 1l. 9s. 6d. for costs. The opinion of the court was requested as to whether the conviction was correct or wrong.

Forbes for the appellant, cited

Fearn v. Mitchell, 41 L. J. 170 M. C.

No counsel appeared for the respondent.

COCKBURN, C.J.—This is rather a doubtful case, and there is much in the contention that the yard was part and parcel of the appellant's house. But, looking to the purpose of the Act, there can be no doubt that that purpose was to prevent persons from selling elsewhere than in the legitimate market—to prevent, in fact, the setting up of a rival market. Now, although in one sense this yard might be said to be part of the house, it could not be said to be so with reference to the true construction of the Act. The exceptions allowed by the section were meant to take in small and occasional sales; as, for instance, if a man should sell one horse or one calf in his own yard. The sales by the appellant were not of this character, and we should be neutralising the Act by allowing a rival market to be set up, if we did not affirm the conviction.

MELLOR, J.—I also think that the stipendiary magistrate was right. If we allowed the exception to extend in the manner claimed, the very object of the Market Act would be frustrated. Perhaps in a conveyance of the house the yard might pass, but a different construction is obviously the correct one as regards this particular statute.

QUAIN, J.—I am of the same opinion. This is not a case of a man selling in his own dwelling-place or shop within the meaning of the statute, but it practically amounts to the setting up a rival market.

THE SCHOOL BOARD OF LONDON (apps.), THE VESTRY OF ST. MARY, ISLINGTON (resps.)

Paving rate—Contribution from frontagers—Houses "forming part of street"—Whether buildings standing back from street are—Metropolis Management Act 1855 sect. 105, and Metropolis Management Amendment Act 1862, sect. 77.

By the Metropolis Management Act 1855, sect. 105 the parish vestry is, in certain cases, empowered to "well and sufficiently pave" any street within their district, and "the owners of the houses forming such street" are bound to pay to the vestry "the estimated expenses of providing and laying the pavement."

By the Metropolis Management Amendment Act 1862, where the powers of the above section are exercised "the owners of the land bounding or abutting on such street" are liable to contribute to the paving expenses as well as the owners of houses therein.

Cottenham-road was a new street within the meaning of, and was paved by the respondents under the powers of the Metropolis Management Act 1855.

The appellants were the owners of about 30,000 square yards and of school buildings thereupon, the access to which was by a narrow passage about 70ft. long, leading out of Cottenham-road. Along the whole of the frontage of the appellants' land were houses, of which the appellants owned one only, abutting on the road.

The appellants having refused to pay towards the paving expenses,

Held, upon a case stated by justices under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, that access to the new street was the essence of liability, that the school buildings of the appellants "formed the street" for all practical purposes, and that judgment ought to be for the respondents.

This was a case stated by two justices for the county of Middlesex, under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

A complaint had been made by the respondents against the appellants, that the appellants being the owners of the house No. 127 and of the schools in Cottenham-road, which said house and road abut on and form part of the said Cottenham-road, in the parish of the respondents, being a new street within the meaning of 18 & 19 Vict., c. 120 (the Metropolis Management Act 1855), and several Acts amending the same (i.e. 19 & 20 Vict. c. 112; 21 & 22 Vict. c. 104, and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), and within the jurisdiction of the respondents, which had been laid out by the orders of the respondents, had not paid to the respondents the sum of 261l. 1s., being the proportion of the estimated expense, as determined by the surveyor of the respondents, to be paid by the appellants as such owners as aforesaid.

The justices had ordered that the appellants should pay to the respondents the sum of 18l. 16s. 9d. in respect of the house and the sum of 250l. 6s. 3d. in respect of the school buildings. The following is the material part of the case thereupon stated upon the application of the appellants:

1. The complaint was made under the Metropolis Management Act 1855, s. 105, and the Metropolis Management Amendment Act 1862, s. 77. (a)

(a) Act of 1855, s. 105:—"In case owners of the houses forming the greater part of any new street laid out or made, or hereafter to be laid out or made, which is not paved to the satisfaction of the vestry or district board of the parish or district in which such street is situate be desirous of having the same paved as hereinafter mentioned, or if such vestry or board deem it necessary or expedient that the same should be so paved, then and in either of such cases such vestry or board shall well and sufficiently pave the same either throughout the whole breadth of the carriage way and footpaths thereof, or any part of such breadth, and from time to time keep such pavement in good and sufficient repair; and the owners of the houses forming such street shall on demand pay to such vestry or board the amount

It was admitted that the appellants are the owners of the house No. 127, Cottenham-road, and land and school buildings, in the rear of the said house and other houses in that road. The house No. 127 is let to a tenant, and has connection with the school buildings.

[From a plan annexed to the case it appeared that the site of the school buildings covered an area of 29,500 square feet, and that the distance of the same from the street along the passage was about 70ft.]

4. In Dec. 1873, the respondents resolved that Cottenham-road should be laid out as a new street under the provisions of the said Acts, and the amount of the estimated cost thereof, as apportioned on the appellants, was 10*l.* 14*s.* 9*d.*, as the owners of the house No. 127 in that street, and 250*l.* 6*s.* 3*d.* as the owners of the land and school buildings in the rear, and the land forming the passage or entrance from the street to the school, as forming part of and abutting on the said street.

5. It was also admitted on both sides that the owners of the houses in Cottenham-road, Nos. 129, 131, 133, 135, 137, 139, 141, 143, 145, and 147, which are situated in the front of a portion of the school premises, have been assessed on the rateable value in similar proportions to the assessment on the house No. 127, belonging to the appellants, towards the cost of making the said street.

6. It was stated on behalf of the respondents, and admitted by the appellants, that the school building and land in question is assessed to the parochial rate as being in Cottenham-road, and that no appeal has been made against such assessment. It was contended on behalf of the respondents that, under the authority of sect. 105 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855, it was in the discretion of the surveyor of the vestry for the time being to determine the amount of the estimated expenses of making any new street, and in the discretion of the vestry to determine how the proportion into which such expense should be assessed on the owners of the different houses of the estimated expenses of providing and laying such pavement (such amount to be determined by the surveyor for the time being of the vestry or board), and in case such estimated expenses exceed the actual expense of such paving, then the difference between such estimated expense and such actual expense shall be repaid by the said vestry or board to the owners of the houses by whom the said sum of money has been paid; and in case the said estimated expense be less than the actual expense of such paving, then the owners of the said houses shall on demand pay to the said vestry or board such further sum of money, as together with the sum already paid, amounts to such actual expenses."

Act of 1862, s. 77:—"Where any vestry or district board shall, under the powers given [by sect. 105 of the Act of 1855], have paved any new street, the owners of the land bounding or abutting on such street shall be liable to contribute to the expenses or estimated expenses of paving the same as well as the owners of houses therein, provided that it shall be lawful for the vestry or district board to charge the owners of land in a less proportion than the owners of house property, should they deem it just and expedient so to do."

By sect. 250 of the Act of 1855 the word "owner" shall mean the person for the time being receiving the rack-rent of the lands or premises in connection with which the said word is used, whether on his own account or as agent or trustee for any other person, or who would so receive the same if such lands or premises were let at a rack-rent."

By sect. 110 of the Act of 1862, the two Acts are to be construed as one.

forming such street, or of the land abutting thereon shall be calculated, by resolving that the proportions in which each such owner should be assessed should be fixed, either by the amount of the assessment to the parochial rates, or by the length of frontage to the street of each house or piece of land, or by any other method that may appear equitable to the said vestry, according to the circumstances of each particular case, and that it was not within the power of the justices to interfere with or review the acts of the vestry or surveyor in that behalf.

7. It was admitted by both parties that, in the calculation of the proportion of the cost of making the said street, the same was made not on the length of the frontages to the street, but on the assessment of the respective properties to the parochial rates.

8. On the other hand, it was contended by the appellants that they were not liable for the rate levied on the said schools and land, as they were not, as owners of the said schools and land, owners of the houses "forming" the said street within the meaning of sect. 105 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855, and that if they were liable at all, they were only liable for a rate levied in respect of frontage.

9. Under these circumstances the justices considered that the appellants came within the provisions of the several sections above quoted, and that the respondents were entitled at their discretion to apportion the cost either in proportion to the assessment of the properties or according to frontage. They therefore made an order, as prayed, upon the appellants for the payment of the sum of 261*l.* 1*s.*, as the proportion of the estimated expense of providing and laying the pavement and making the road in the said new street in respect of the said house and schools.

10. The question for the court is whether the appellants, as owners of the land and school buildings, are, as owners of a house forming such new street within the meaning of sect. 105 of the Act of 1855, or, under sect. 77 of the Act of 1862, as owners of land abutting on such new street, liable to be rated for the making of the said new street; and if they are, whether the said rate or amount should be assessed at the discretion of the respondents upon the amount of the frontage or upon the rateable value of the land and school buildings.

11. If the court shall decide in the affirmative, the order made for the payment of the whole amount claimed by the respondents is to be carried into effect.

12. If the court shall decide otherwise, an order is to be made for payment of the sums offered to be paid by the appellants; that is to say, 10*l.* 14*s.* 9*d.* in respect of No. 127, Cottenham-road, and the sum of 10*l.* 14*s.* 9*d.* in respect of the adjoining piece of land or passage way, or such other to be made as directed by the court.

Sir H. James, Q.C., and Murriott, for the appellants, relied chiefly on The Plumstead Board of Works v. The British Land Company (L. Rep. 10 Q.B. 16 reversed on appeal, ib. 203). In that case the defendants, being owners of certain lands, had laid them out for building purposes, and made roads across them which were dedicated to the public as far as any act of the defendants was concerned. The plaintiffs, from time to time, paved the new streets formed by the houses on the estate, and apportioned the costs among the owners of houses forming the streets, and the owners of land bounding and abutting on the streets; and in so doing they assessed the defendants in respect of the new streets and roads where bounding or abutting on the sides or ends of the streets paved, as being "lands abutting" on those streets under sect. 77 of the Metropolis Management Amendment Act 1862. It was held by the Exchequer Chamber, reversing the judgment of the Queen's Bench, that the defendants were not "owners." He also argued that the area occupied by the appellants was not land within the meaning of sect. 77 of the Act of 1862, and that the school buildings did not form part of the street within the meaning of sect. 105 of the Act of 1855. And he further referred to Angel v. Paddington Vestry, L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 714, and the remarks thereon of Lord Coleridge, C. J., in the Exchequer Chamber, in the Plumstead case (ubi sup.)

Thesiger, Q.C., Besley with him, for the respondents.—The true construction of sect. 105 of the Act of 1855 is strongly in favour of the respondents. The liability to the rate depends upon the advantage derived from the paving, and that advantage is not confined to houses actually looking over the street, but extends to all buildings which have their access from the street (Baddeley v. Giggell, 1 Ex. 319). That case is precisely in point. The case itself was decided upon the construction of The Metropolis Paving Act (57 Geo. 3, c. 29), s. 24. That section enacted that paving rates should be laid "upon all persons who shall inhabit, hold, occupy, be in possession, or enjoy any messuages, tenements, . . . or other buildings or hereditaments, situate or being within any of the streets or places within the parochial or other district." Communicating with the street by means of a covered gateway, there was a yard, around which were several dwelling houses, warehouses, and other buildings. The yard (with the exception of the width of the gateway) and all the dwelling houses, &c., round the same, were situate at the back of several houses which fronted the street. The entrance into the yard was through carriage gates, and along a covered gateway. It was held that the occupiers of the yard and houses therein were liable to the paving rate, such premises being for that purpose "within the street," inasmuch as they had a frontage on the street, and their sole communication was with the street. "The Act," said Pollock, C.B., "might have been more clear if the Legislature had used the words 'communicating therewith and abutting thereupon,' but I think the meaning is ascertained by viewing the question thus: was it the intention of the framers of this Act that a person like the defendant should wholly escape the rate? He clearly derives some benefit from the Act; as one of the public in the immediate neighbourhood he shares in the public advantage. . . . For every popular purpose these premises are 'within the street.' The meaning of the Act is, that the person whose premises directly communicate with the street shall be liable to pay." He also cited

Nesbit v. Greenwich Board of Works, L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 465;

Mayor of Manchester v. Chapman, 37 L. J. 73, M. C.; and, as conclusive of the ownership of the appellants, Bowditch v. Wakefield Board of Health, L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 567.

Marriott, in reply, contended that the actual frontage of a street was for calculating the advantages to be derived from paving the essential part of it, and that it was upon the occupiers of the actual frontage that the paving expenses would equitably fall.

COCKBURN, C.J.—On the whole, I am of opinion that judgment ought to be for the respondents. I own that my mind has fluctuated much during the argument, and I do not mean to say that I am altogether free from doubt even now, but the conclusion which I have come to is that the reasons given for upholding this rate are good. The words of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, s. 105, are: "The owners of the houses forming such street shall pay to such vestry or board the amount of the estimated expenses of providing and laying such pavement." Now, it cannot be said that we have before us the case of a house forming, physically, part of a street. But, looking at what I cannot help thinking was the intention of the Legislature amid all this varying legislation, I must say that I think that, constructively, the house formed part of a street within the meaning of the statute. Baddeley v. Giggell (ubi sup.) is not directly in point, inasmuch as the statute on which that case was decided used the words "in the street." Still, "in the street" and "forming part of the street" are expressions substantially identical. And, looking to the justice of the case, and to the proper incidence of contributions to this paving rate, I observe that although the house does not front the street, it has access to it. Access, in fact, is the foundation of liability, and it is essential to access that a street should be well paved. If the street be well paved, and the owner of a particular house has access to it, then it matters little where the house is. A large and liberal construction should be put upon the statute. It is to be observed that for all practical purposes, such as postal purposes, the house forms part of the street. I was, I confess, much staggered by the argument that, upon the construction I now give to the statute, old courts which are distinct from the street, but to which the access is from the street, would come within the section, and be liable to be rated. But the answer to this argument seems to be that such courts are public property, whereas the house with which we are now dealing is private property. Upon all principles of equity and justice the rate ought to be allowed.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think myself that this case is à fortiori to Baddeley v. Giggell (ubi sup.), but independently of that case, I should have come to the same conclusion as my Lord has done. Many of the arguments which have been urged before us might be considered by the vestry in estimating the amount of the rate, but there is no reason why the appellants should escape from payment of the paving expenses altogether. The appellants have the benefit of an open space between their school buildings and the street, and are practically in the same position as frontagers. As for the varying phraseology of the Acts, I think that only shows that the Legislature intended that different constructions should obtain according to the differences of the subject matter. It is reasonable and just that the rate should not fall upon frontagers only.

QUAIN, J.—I am of the same opinion. Unless this case be distinguishable from Baddeley v.

SHILLITO v. THOMPSON—ATWOOD (app.) v. CASE (resp.).

[Q.B. Div.]

Gingell (ubi sup.), that case is almost conclusive. "Forming the line" of a street means constituting a street in the ordinary sense of the term. The appellants have direct access to the street, and that is the vital point.

SHILLITO v. THOMPSON.

Sale of cheese unfit for food—Municipal Corporation Act 1835, s. 90, and bye-law made thereunder—Whether bye-law within powers of section—Whether sale a "nuisance."

A borough town council as such may make a bye-law for the punishment of persons selling provisions unfit for food.

By sect. 90 of the Municipal Corporation Act 1835, "It shall be lawful for the council of any borough to make such bye-laws as to them shall seem meet for the good rule and government of the borough, and for the prevention and suppression of all such nuisances as are not already punishable in a summary manner by virtue of any Act in force throughout such borough."

Under the above section the Town Council of D. made a bye-law by which "any butcher, dealer in meat, or other person," exposing for sale "any meat, fish, poultry, or other provisions" unfit for food or deleterious to health, was adjudged to pay a fine of forty shillings.

S. was convicted by justices under the bye-law of having in his possession cheese which the justices found as a fact to be decomposed and unfit for food.

Held, upon a case stated under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, that the bye law was legally made, and that the conviction ought to be affirmed.

This was a case stated under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, by two justices of the peace for the Borough of Doncaster for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench.

The respondent was inspector of nuisances for the borough, and as such inspector, laid an information against the appellant, being a grocer in the borough, for that he unlawfully had in his possession, with intent to sell, certain unwholesome victuals or provisions, to wit, cheese, unfit for the food of man, contrary to the bye-laws of the said borough.

By the Municipal Corporations Act 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76) sect. 90, it is enacted as follows:

It shall be lawful for the council of any borough to make such bye-laws as to them shall seem meet for the good rule and government of the borough, and for the prevention and suppression of all such nuisances as are not already punishable in a summary manner by virtue of any Act in force throughout such borough; and to appoint by such bye-laws such fines as they shall deem necessary for the prevention and suppression of such offences.....

Among certain bye-laws made under the above section, was bye-law No. 35, under which the information was laid. Such bye-law is as follows:

35. Exposing meat for sale.—If any butcher or dealer in meat, or any fishmonger, poulterer, or other person, shall expose or offer for sale in or upon his shop, stall, warehouse, or in any part of his premises, or otherwise, within the said borough, or have in his possession, with intent to sell or expose for sale, the flesh of any diseased animal, or any unsound, putrid, or unwholesome meat, fish, poultry, or other victuals or provisions, unfit for the food of man, or which would be deleterious to the health of persons who might feed thereon (the unfitness or deleteriousness whereof shall be in the decision of the justices adjudicating on the complaint thereof), or shall kill any diseased animal for the purpose of sale for human food, every person so respectively offending shall for such offence forfeit and pay the fine or sum of forty shillings.

Under the above bye-law the appellant was convicted for selling cheese which the justices found as a fact was decomposed and unfit for human food. [The case set out the evidence in full, and such evidence was conflicting upon this point.] The points of law, as raised by the case, were these:—

1. Whether the Doncaster Town Council had power under the Municipal Corporations Act, sect. 90, to make bye-law No. 35, so as to give it the force of law within the borough of Doncaster.

2. Whether the Sanitary Acts subsequently passed had not virtually repealed the bye-law, if it ever had the force of law?

3. Whether cheese was an article of food within the meaning of the bye-law?

If the court should be of opinion that the bye law was legally and properly made, the conviction was to stand; if the court should be of opinion otherwise, the complaint was to be dismissed.

Lockwood, for the appellant.—It must be conceded that the sale of the cheese was within the words of the bye-law, but it is submitted that the bye-law is ultra vires. It cannot be said that the appellant's having the cheese in his possession amounted to a nuisance within the meaning of sect. 90 of the Municipal Corporations Act. A nuisance to be indictable must be a nuisance in fact (R. v. Davey, 5 Esp. 217). [BLACKBURN, J. referred to Reg. v. Stephenson, 3 F. & F. 106. In that case it was held that a meat salesman can be indicted and convicted at common law for knowingly exposing meat for sale in a public market as fit for human food, which, in fact, is not so. For Willes, J. asked the jury, "Did the defendant know when he sent up the meat that it was unfit for human food? and did he send it up to be sold for human food?"]

No counsel appeared for the respondent.

Per CURIAM (Blackburn, Mellor, and Quain, JJ.)—This conviction must be affirmed.

ATWOOD (app.) v. CASE (resp.).

Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 237, construction of—Going on board newly arriving ship, "before actual arrival."

By sect. 237 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, every person (except as therein accepted) who "goes on board any ship about to arrive at the place of her destination before her actual arrival in dock, or at the place of her discharge, without the permission of the master," incurs a penalty as therein mentioned.

O., without leave of the master, went on board a ship bound from a foreign port to Bristol, as she lay in the Cumberland Basin of Bristol Harbour.

Q.B. Div.]

ATWOOD (app.) v. CASE (resp.).

[Q.B. Div.]

The ship (which the crew soon afterwards left) remained in the basin all night, but did not, nor was it intended that she should, discharge her cargo there. The next morning she was moored further into the harbour, and discharged her cargo at another quay in the port of Bristol.

An information having been preferred before justices against O. for contravening sect. 237 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, the justices dismissed the same. The informant having appealed, under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, Held, that the ship had actually arrived in dock, and that judgment ought to be for the respondent.

THIS was a case stated for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench, under 20 & 21 Vict., c. 43, by two justices of the peace for the town and county of Bristol.

1. Upon the hearing of a certain information preferred by the appellant, a police officer and a person employed in the service of Her Majesty's Board of Trade, against the respondent, a sailor's boarding-house keeper, for that he, not being in Her Majesty's service, and not being duly authorised by law for the purpose, unlawfully did go on board a certain British ship, to wit, the Lord Duncan, about to arrive at her place of destination before her actual arrival in dock or at the place of her discharge, without the permission of the master of the said ship, contrary to the 237th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, we dismissed the case.

2. The section referred to is as follows:

Every person who, not being in Her Majesty's service, and not being duly authorised by law for the purpose, goes on board any ship about to arrive at the place of her destination, before her actual arrival in dock or at the place of her discharge, without the permission of the master, shall for every such offence incur a penalty not exceeding £20; and the master or person in charge of such ship may take any such person so going on board as aforesaid into custody, and deliver him up forthwith to any constable or peace officer, to be by him taken before a justice or justices, and to be dealt with according to the provisions of this Act.

3. The said ship arrived from a foreign port on Sunday, the 4th July 1875, and passed through the gate of the Cumberland Basin in the port of Bristol, in the city and county of Bristol, about seven o'clock in the evening.

4. Immediately after the ship had entered the basin the appellant, who is specially employed by the Board of Trade for the purpose, went on board, introduced himself to the master, and remained on board with his permission. Very shortly afterwards, and while the ship was being moored, the respondent went on board her, his alleged object being to see one of the crew. He spoke to the master, but did not obtain permission to remain on board, the master telling him that he was not wanted. The respondent went away from the ship and returned on board again shortly afterwards, and he then refused to leave when requested by the appellant so to do.

5. The crew left the ship on arriving in the basin, which is usual, and the ship remained there all night.

6. The next morning she was moored further into the floating harbour, and afterwards discharged her cargo at another quay in the port of Bristol.

7. Cumberland Basin is divided from the river Avon by dock gates, and is a complete dock forming part of, but divided by other dock gates from the rest of the docks formed under and governed by the Bristol Dock Act 1868, and other local Acts. There are quays on each side of the basin at which ships frequently discharge cargoes, but the Lord Duncan did not discharge, and it was not intended that she should discharge any of her cargo there.

8. On behalf of the respondent it was contended that the section, being penal, must be read strictly, and that the words were alternative, so that it was enough to take his actions out of the provisions of the statute if the vessel could be said to have arrived: (1) "At her place of destination," or (2) "In Dock," or (3) "At the place of her discharge."

But in this case, as to all three phrases, it was agreed, as a fact, that she had arrived at her place of destination, that she was in dock, and that she had also arrived at the place of her discharge.

9. On behalf of the appellant, it was contended that it was not sufficient that the vessel had arrived in port to exempt a person acting as the respondent had acted, from being amenable to the statute, that so long as she had not arrived "at the place of her discharge," he could not board without permission from the master, and that it was not until Monday the 5th July last that the Lord Duncan arrived at the place of her discharge.

The justices decided as follows:—(1) That the ship was not "about to arrive at the place of her destination" (which, having regard to the section, they considered a condition precedent to bringing the respondent within its words) as she had actually arrived there, that is to say, she had arrived at Bristol; (2) That she was in dock, that is to say, in the Cumberland Basin; and (3) That she had arrived at the place of her discharge, which was Bristol, although she was not then actually at the quay at which she was afterwards unloaded, inasmuch as that precise locality as to all ships depends more or less upon the Bristol Quay wardens' arrangements, and upon various circumstances over which owners and masters of ships have no control or foreknowledge.

A plan accompanied the case.

Bowen for the appellant argued that great stress was to be laid upon the word "actual" in the section. The arrival in the present case was only a constructive arrival. [QUAIN, J.—This is a penal statute and must, as such, be construed strictly.]

Cole, Q.C., for the respondent, was not called upon.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of opinion that our judgment ought to be for the respondent, and that upon the second of the grounds mentioned by the justices. Neither the first or third grounds are supportable. It is idle to say that the port of Bristol was the place of destination of this ship. She was in dock when she was in Cumberland Basin, and that is enough. There was an actual arrival of the ship within the meaning of the section.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion and for the same reason.

QUAIN, J.—A strict construction should be put upon the statute. The ship had arrived in dock. The words "other place of her discharge" were, I think, put in to embrace the cases which might arise of a ship discharging elsewhere than in dock. On the other two grounds the justices were wrong.

REG. v. CHORLTON-UPON-MEDLOCK.

Disallowance by Poor Law auditor—Charge for making a valuation—Consent of vestry—27 & 28 Vict. c. 39, s. 7.

An assessment committee required the overseers of one of their townships to make out and copy a valuation list under 25 & 26 Vict. c. 103, s. 26. The board of overseers passed a resolution that their clerks and collectors had no time to do the work required, and that certain persons should be employed for the purpose. The overseers obtained a resolution of the vestry that the expense of this employment, which had then been defrayed, should be charged upon the poor rates. The Poor Law auditor disallowed this charge on the ground that the overseers' ordinary clerks and collectors ought to have done the work themselves.

Held, upon a rule for a writ of certiorari to bring up this disallowance, that by 27 & 28 Vict. c. 39, s. 7, when a vestry consents to such a charge, even after the expense has been defrayed, the auditor has no power to disallow it.

THIS was a rule nisi granted on behalf of the defendants, the overseers of the poor of the township of Chorlton-upon-Medlock, upon an application for a writ of certiorari, calling upon the prosecutor, W. Roberts, auditor of the South Lancashire and Cheshire Audit District, which comprises the above-named township, to show cause why a certain item of disallowance of the sum of 14*l.* 10*s.* made by him in the accounts of the defendants for the half year ended 29th Sept. 1874 should not be quashed.

The said item of the accounts was:—

Account of expenses incurred by the board of overseers of the township of Chorlton-upon-Medlock, in revising the rateable hereditaments of the township, and in making out a new valuation list, and copy of the rateable hereditaments in the township as required by an order of the Chorlton Union Assessment Committee, dated 14th May, 1874, viz.:

Disallowed £14 10 0

The items disallowed are the 2nd, 3rd, and 4th, in the above account.

The following were the reasons for this disallowance signed by the said W. Roberts, the district auditor:

My reasons for disallowing the above sum of 14*l.* 10*s.* paid by the overseers of the township of Chorlton-upon-Medlock for writing a valuation list and a copy for Union Assessment Committee are: First, because there being in this township collecting clerks appointed under a local Act of Parliament to collect the rates for the relief of the poor in this township, it was in my opinion the duty of such collectors, without any additional charge upon the poor rates, to have discharged the duties for which the payments were made, having reference to Articles 6 and 60 of the general order for accounts of the Poor Law Board, dated 14th Jan. 1867, in force in the Chorlton Union and in the townships therein comprised, and which includes the township of Chorlton-upon-Medlock. Secondly, because in disallowing these payments I followed the decision of the Local Government Board on an appeal to them respecting a disallowance of a similar payment in the accounts of the overseers of the poor of the township of Hulme in the same union (and to which township the said local Act also applied, as expressed in a letter from the Local Government Board, dated 16th June 1874, No. 1514 C., and addressed to the then late overseers of the said township of Hulme, disposing of an appeal against such disallowance. Thirdly, it was stated before me by the collecting clerks above referred to that at the particular time when this valuation list was required they were fully occupied either with the preparation of a new rate or some other ordinary and accustomed duties of their office, but as I understand the law of the Local Government Board to be that when officers are appointed they undertake, in consideration of their specified salaries or other remuneration, to perform or cause to be performed all the legal duties appertaining to their office, I was, therefore, of opinion that it was the duty of these officers to have made all requisite arrangements and discharged their duties as far as related to the copying of such valuation list without any additional charge upon the poor rates, and that the overseers of the poor of this township, in employing additional persons to perform this duty incurred unnecessary and improper expenses; and, fourthly, because the collecting and other clerks appointed in any township to which the above local Act relates being appointed at salaries or other remuneration sanctioned by the Local Government Board, I was also of opinion that on this ground it is not within the discretion of the overseers to relieve such officers from the performance of any duties that they have undertaken in consideration of their salaries by appointing other persons to discharge any of such duties, and thereby increase the burden upon the poor rate.

Dated the 6th day of Jan. 1875.

It appeared from the affidavits of the several overseers and collectors of the township of Chorlton-on-Medlock that on the 21st May 1874 the board of overseers received a letter from the Clerk of the Chorlton Union Assessment Committee requiring a new or supplemental valuation list to be made for the said township, within three months from the 14th May, the date of the said letter; that during the period within which the said valuation list had to be made the clerks and collectors forming the ordinary staff in the employ of the board were fully occupied from day to day during the business hours of the day and frequently until late at night, upon the business of the said board; that it was deemed by the board inexpedient, and it would certainly have been in the highest degree inconvenient to take those officers from the business upon which they were engaged in order to write out and copy the valuation lists, for the performance of other duties of the utmost importance would have been thereby interfered with and prevented from being carried out; that under these circumstances the board of overseers did not direct the collectors or other officials to write out the valuation list and copy thereof, but they authorised the clerk to the board to employ writers to write out the list and copy; and a formal resolution employing two writers named therein was passed and put upon the minutes of the board.

It was also stated on affidavit by the several clerks and collectors of the overseers of Chorlton-upon-Medlock that they all commenced their said employments before the date of the order of the Poor Law Board of 1867; that it formed no part of the duties they undertook to make out or copy such valuation list as that required by the assessment committee; and that they had no time to accomplish that work as well as their regular duties.

The account of expenses incurred in making out the said list and copy as aforesaid, with vouchers of payment, were laid before a vestry meeting convened by the overseers of the said township after due notice in accordance with the requirement of the 27 & 28 Vict. c. 39, s. 7, and held on the 24th Sept. 1874, and the same was allowed by such meeting; and the said overseers were authorised by the vestry by express resolution to charge the said sum of 35*l.* 9*s.* upon the poor rate of the said township, as follows:—

Resolved, that the overseers, having incurred the expense of 35*l.* 9*s.*, in making out a valuation list and copy under the provisions of the Union Assessment Committee Act 1862, this vestry, under the powers and provisions of the Union Assessment Committee Act Amendment Act 1864, consents unto and allows such sum of 35*l.* 9*s.*, and certifies the same to be due to the overseers, and authorises them to charge the said sum of 35*l.* 9*s.* upon the poor rate of this township.

Herschell, Q.C. and Forbes showed cause on behalf of the auditor.—This is an application under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 35, the following section (the 36th) providing another remedy under similar circumstances by application to the Poor Law Commissioners. These Commissioners have given a decision on this very point directly in favour of the auditor's disallowance in this case. [COCKBURN, C.J.—That does not prevent our considering the matter on its merits.] By sect. 46 of 4 & 5 Will. c. 76, the Poor Law Commissioners were empowered to issue orders and rules regulating the duties of overseers and their clerks and collecting officers, and by Article 6 of the orders dated the 14th Jan. 1867, and issued in pursuance of that section, "Every collector appointed for a parish shall enter up so much of any books or forms of the overseers relating to the valuation list, or to the collection of the poor rates, as he may be directed to enter up by the overseers for the time being, and shall enter in the rates' book all such particulars of every assessment as he shall be directed by such overseers to enter therein; and every such collector shall attend before the auditor at the same time as the overseers of the parish for which he acts." And by Article 60, "The term 'collector' in the construing of this order shall be taken to apply to any person appointed under any Act of Parliament, or any order of the Poor Law Board, to collect the rates for the relief of the poor in any parish or parishes, whether such person shall be designated collector of poor rates or assistant overseer, or be called by any other name whatever, or the collector of the guardians, as the context shall require." Before these orders, however, by the Manchester Overseers' Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. lxiii., s. 6) the overseers of each township in Manchester were incorporated separately to a qualified extent, and the section concludes: "Such overseers may, from time to time, appoint such clerks, surveyors, and servants to aid them in the discharge of their duty, with such salaries as the Poor Law Board shall, from time to time sanction, and pay the same out of the poor rate, all such clerks, surveyor, and servants being liable to the same responsibility as officers appointed under the Act of 4 & 5 Wm. 4 c. 76." The work here required by the assessment committee is authorised by sect. 26 of the Union Assessment Committee Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 103); but any extra expense incurred in completing it can only be paid out of the rates, if the vestry authorise the work to be done at extra expense. The words of 27 & 28 Vict. c. 39, s. 7, are: "When the overseers of any parish incur any expense in making out any valuation list or supplemental list, or in revising or valuing any of the rateable hereditaments of such parish, under the provisions of the Union Assessment Committee Act 1862, with the consent of the vestry given by express resolution, after due notice, they may charge such expense as far as the same may be authorised by the vestry, upon the poor rate; and if no vestry meeting be held, or no decision arrived at on the subject, then to the extent which the assessment committee shall allow. Provided that, as regards the valuation of the property, no expense shall be so charged upon the poor rate, unless the consent of such committee to the procuring of such valuation by the overseers shall have been given previously to the same being made." Here the authority of the vestry was not obtained till after the expense was incurred.

Maule, Q.C. and Lumley supported the rule.—The effect of that 7th section of the Act of 1864 is not to require any consent of the committee previously to the copying of valuation lists: the words "with the consent of the vestry given by express resolution" refer to the power to charge the expenses upon the poor rate, not to the right to incur the expense. [COCKBURN, C.J.—There is little in the language of the provision to show which way it is intended to be read.] It cannot mean that the previous consent of the vestry is to be obtained before the overseers incur any expense. [Stopped by the court.]

COCKBURN, C.J.—There is a duty imposed upon the overseers by the Legislature to make or copy a valuation whenever the assessment committee requires it. No provision is made as to how this duty should be carried out, nor as to the payment of any expense it may require, except by the 7th section of the Union Assessment Committee Act Amendment Act 1864. The words of that section are ambiguous, but I think Mr. Maule's interpretation is right. The effect of it is that, if the vestry are of opinion that any expense of this kind incurred by the overseers should be paid out of the rates, a resolution to that effect may be passed, and the overseers then have a right to charge such expenses upon the rates. I do not think the auditor is competent to interfere with the due exercise of the power of a vestry.

BOSLEY (app.) v. DAVIES (resp.).

Saturday, Nov. 20, 1875.

BOSLEY (app.) v. DAVIES (resp.)

Gaming on licensed premises—Knowledge of licensed person—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), s. 17.

A party of gentlemen were playing cards for money in a room of the appellant's licensed premises, and were disturbed by a police constable who had heard them from outside. The appellant's manager knew nothing about it, and it did not appear that any waiter came into the room whilst they were playing. The justices convicted the appellant under the Licensing Act, 1872, s. 17, for suffering gaming to be carried on on his premises.

Held, upon a case stated, that, although no actual knowledge on the appellant's part was necessary, it must appear that there was gross negligence or wilful ignorance on the part of the persons who had authority to prevent the gaming before he could be convicted. The case was remitted accordingly.

THIS was a case stated by three justices of the peace, acting in and for the city of Hereford, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the Court on a question of law which arose before them as hereinafter stated.

At a petty sessions holden at the Guildhall in and for the said city of Hereford, on the 29th July, 1875, an information preferred by John Davis, superintendent of police for the said city (hereinafter called the respondent) against John Bosley, a person duly licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquors by retail under The Licensing Acts 1872 and 1874, as the managing director of the Green Dragon Hotel Co., Hereford (hereinafter called the appellant), under sect. 17 of the Licensing Act, 1872, charging for that he the said John Bosley on the 1st July then instant, at the parish of St. John Baptist, in the said city of Hereford, then being a person duly licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquors by retail, did unlawfully suffer gaming on his licensed premises, was heard and determined by the said justices, and upon such hearing the appellant was convicted before them of the said offence, and they adjudged him to pay a penalty of 1l. and 10s. 6d. costs, or in default of payment to be imprisoned for fourteen days.

And whereas the appellant, being dissatisfied with their determination upon the hearing of the said information as being erroneous in point of law, had, pursuant to sect. 2 of the said statute, 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, duly applied to them in writing to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and grounds of such their determination as aforesaid for the opinion of this Court, and had duly entered into a recognisance as required by the said statute.

The said justices, in compliance with the said application and the provisions of the said statute, stated and signed the following case:—

Upon the hearing of the information it was proved on the part of the respondent that George Barroll, a police constable, about half-past twelve in the morning of the 1st July, was on duty in Broad-street, Hereford (in which street the appellant's licensed premises called the Green Dragon Hotel are situate) and heard laughing and shouting proceeding from the Green Dragon Hotel; he then went opposite the Green Dragon and heard noises and voices in a room with three windows facing the street. Two of the windows had the blinds up a part of the way so that the constable saw three of the gentlemen who faced the street, and from what he heard knew that there were several gentlemen playing at cards. He waited about a quarter of an hour, when the front door was opened by one of the waiters who came out, and the constable entered and went upstairs direct into the room where the gentlemen were, and he there found six gentlemen round a table playing at cards, with a lot of money on the table, and also drink. He asked them for their names; some of them refused, but at length they all gave their names. When the constable came downstairs he met Miss Clarke, the manageress, who, he stated, was angry with him, and told him he had no right to go upstairs without first coming to her, and took his number, and said she should report him. She said she did not know they were playing at cards, and that they did not have the cards of her. The constable said they were making a great noise, and it could be distinctly heard in the street that they were playing at cards.

Mr. Gwillim, the appellant's attorney, admitted that the gentlemen were playing at cards, and that they were playing for money, but contended that it was necessary that the gaming should be carried on with the knowledge of the appellant, or the manageress, or other persons employed in the hotel, and quoted the case of Avardo v. Dances (26 J. P. 437). The respondent, however, drew the attention of the justices to the circumstance that the 17th section of the Licensing Act 1872, did not include the word "knowingly," as did the repealed statute, and as do some of the sections of the present statute with reference to other offences. Mr. Gwillim afterwards called in defence two witnesses: First, Mr. Beaumont Thomas Featherstone, of Warwick, one of the gentlemen in question, who stated that he and the other gentlemen were staying at the Green Dragon Hotel, having come to Hereford engaged in a game of cricket, and they had a private room and dined there that evening; that cards were produced by a Mr. Walker, one of the gentlemen; and that they played for money, and that he did not think that anybody in the house knew they were playing at cards; but in cross-examination he said as follows: "I did not see the waiter come in. I never saw a waiter. I will not swear that he did not come in. We had all our drinkables. He came in just after the police constable came in. I fancy it was a short waiter. I don't recollect that any brandies were brought in. Just before we commenced playing our brandies and sodas came in." Secondly, Miss Elizabeth Clarke, the manageress, was called, and proved that she did not supply the cards, and that she had no knowledge of the card playing until she saw the policeman.

No waiter was called nor the gentleman who produced the cards, nor any other person who might have had access to the room, and on the above facts the justices convicted the appellant.

The question of law arising on the above statement is whether under the 17th sect. of the Licensing Act 1872 it was incumbent on the part of the respondent to prove actual knowledge on the part of the appellant, or some authority of the hotel, of the fact of gaming, so as to render the appellant liable under that section.

PREST v. ROYSTON UNION.

[Q.B. Div.]

If the court should be of opinion that proof of such knowledge was not necessary, then the said conviction is to stand; but if the court should be of opinion that proof of such knowledge was necessary, then the said information is to be dismissed.

Poland argued for the appellant.—By the 17th section of the Licensing Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), "if any licensed person (1) suffers any gaming or any unlawful game to be carried on on his premises; or (2), opens, keeps, or uses, or suffers his house to be opened, kept, or used in contravention of the Act, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119, intituled 'an Act for the Suppression of Betting Houses,' he shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding for the first offence 10*l*., and not exceeding for the second and any subsequent offence 20*l*.. Any conviction for an offence under this section, shall, unless the convicting magistrates shall otherwise direct, be recorded on the licence of the person convicted." [QUAIN, J.—Has not the necessity for the actual knowledge of the licensed person in offences under this Act been determined by Mullins v. Collins (L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 292)?] That was a decision under the 16th, the previous section, the effect of which was that a licensed person, without knowledge on his part, was liable for the act of his servant in knowingly supplying liquor to a constable on duty. Here there is no knowledge on the part of anybody connected with the hotel.

Sawyer, for the respondent.—The only question reserved for the court is whether actual knowledge on the part of some authority of the hotel is requisite for a conviction. The distinction between offences against the tenor of the licence, under 9 Geo. 4, c. 64, s. 21, which must all be committed "knowingly," and some of the offences against public order which in the Licensing Act of 1872 are described without that word, was discussed in Mullins v. Collins. It was held that it could not be implied in those clauses of the 16th section where it is not expressly used, and it follows that in this 17th section, where it does not appear, that the offence is complete if gaming be carried on on the premises, even without the knowledge of the authorities. It is not unreasonable that the Legislature should exact from every licensed person the duty to prevent gaming on his premises, and should inflict a penalty upon any omission to carry out that duty. In Mullins v. Collins, Archibald, J., said that the series of clauses, of which the 16th and 17th are both a part, must "be construed in the way most effective for maintaining public order." Here there was undoubtedly a breach of public order. [COCKBURN, C.J.—All the judges in that case guard themselves from expressing an opinion that the liability would attach if the servant were ignorant of the constable being on duty. The servant's knowledge might be constructively that of the licensed person, but here there is no evidence even of constructive knowledge.] Similarly under the Adulteration Act of 1872, it was held in Fitzpatrick v. Kelly (L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 337), that under the 2nd section no actual representation that an article was unadulterated was necessary to constitute an offence.

Poland in reply.—There is nothing in that case of Fitzpatrick v. Kelly which can assist us in the solution of this difficulty. I admit that if a constructive knowledge in the licensed person of such acts as these could be proved it would be sufficient ground for a conviction, but such knowledge cannot be inferred from the facts stated in the case. [COCKBURN, C.J.—There must be, to justify a conviction, either actual knowledge by the licensed person or somebody authorised to manage the licensed premises, or constructive knowledge to such an extent that there was manifest negligence or intentional blindness as to what was going on in the house.] The effect of the justices' decision is that if any gaming takes place under any circumstances, the licensed person is liable to be convicted.

COCKBURN, C.J.—We can direct the magistrates to convict only if they are satisfied that there was gross absence of care or wilful abstinence from knowledge on the part of the persons managing the hotel. I think the conviction, as it stands, is very unsatisfactory, although I cannot say, in answer to the question reserved for us, that actual knowledge is necessary. The effect of the statute will be carried out if we convey to the magistrates this expression of our opinion, in order that they may inquire if anything occurred from which it must be necessarily inferred that the authorities knew, or ought to have known, of this gambling. We cannot say that there was no evidence on which to base such an inference, but as the case is stated I cannot come to that conclusion myself.

MELLOR, J.—My impression is that a licensed person may be liable under this section, even without knowledge of any gaming going on in the house, if the waiters or persons whose duty it is to enter these rooms and to attend to the wants of the guests occupying them omit to report their knowledge to the managers of the premises. A constructive knowledge on the part of the managers might justify a conviction, but in our opinion this case as it stands does not establish such a constructive knowledge.

QUAIN, J.—I am of the same opinion.

The following was the order of the Court: "It is ordered that this case be remitted to the justices who stated and signed the same with the opinion of this court that actual knowledge on the part of the licensed person is not necessary, but that constructive knowledge on his part must be proved. That although the word "knowingly" is not in sect. 17 of the Licensing Act, 1872, it is not sufficient merely to prove that persons gambled in the hotel, but that proof must be given that the manageress or servants in attendance on the guests in the room knew of the gambling. That wilful ignorance of the persons in authority at the hotel would not be an excuse. That this court is of opinion that the evidence set out in the case is not sufficient to justify a conviction; but the said case is hereby remitted with the opinion of this court as to the law."

treasurer within the seven days required by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 32. The plaintiff applied, as required by that section, to the justices for a distress warrant, but as the overseer had by that time paid part of the certified deficiency, the justices declined to issue a warrant for more than the unpaid part. The plaintiff refused to accept this, and applied without success to this court for a mandamus. Upon appeal by the overseer, the Local Government Board under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 91, s. 4, consented to remit the disallowance on condition that the overseer would pay the plaintiff's costs incurred before the justices and this court. The plaintiff having failed to obtain the performance of this condition by the overseer, brought this action for his costs against the defendants.

Held that under the circumstances the defendants were liable.

This was an action brought to recover the sum of 59l. 2s. 2d., the amount of the plaintiff's taxed costs, charges and expenses in endeavouring to enforce a certain surcharge made by him on the 8th Jan. 1873 when auditing the accounts of the overseers of the parish of Ashwell. The plaintiff also, pursuant to the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, s. 68, claimed a writ of mandamus commanding the defendants to pay to the plaintiff the said sum of 59l. 2s. 2d., and to make a rate if necessary for the purpose of repaying it. In pursuance of an order dated the 17th July 1874, the facts have been stated in the form of the following special case for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench:

The plaintiff is the poor law auditor of the Cambridge and Huntingdonshire poor law audit district. The defendants are the guardians of the Royston Poor Law Union.

John Goffage was at the times hereinafter mentioned, and at the date of the commencement of this action, the assistant overseer of the parish of Ashwell.

The parish of Ashwell is comprised in the Royston Union, and the said union is comprised in the Cambridge and Huntingdon Audit District.

On the 8th Jan. 1873, the plaintiff duly held his audit for the Royston Union, and the parishes comprised therein, of the accounts for the half year ending Michaelmas 1872. On auditing the accounts of the parish of Ashwell he surcharged the said assistant overseer of the said parish, John Goffage, with the sum of 139l. 9s. 10½d., which sum was made up of two sums of 36l. 2s. 2d. and 103l. 7s. 8½d.

The plaintiff duly certified this surcharge on the face of the accounts, and forthwith reported to the Local Government Board that he had so certified.

The amount surcharged was not paid within seven days from the date of the certificate, and the plaintiff, under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 32 proceeded to enforce the payment of the same.

For this purpose the plaintiff caused an information to be laid on the 17th Jan. 1873 before the Justices of the Odsey Division, in the county of Hertford, against the said John Goffage, charging him with not paying to the treasurer of the guardians of the union of Royston the sum so certified within seven days after the same had been certified by the auditor to be due, nor within three clear days of the laying of the information.

At the hearing of the information it was proved, as required by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 91, s. 9, that the plaintiff was the auditor and duly held his audit. The entry of the certificate at the time of the audit by the plaintiff and the non-payment of the amount, except as hereinafter mentioned, were also proved. The justices before whom the case was heard admitted evidence on the part of John Goffage of a payment 84l. 18s. 1d. made by him on 16th Oct. 1872, that is seventeen days after the date on which the half yearly account was closed, and to which date the certificate referred, but before the certificate was made, and declined to issue their distress warrant against his goods to levy the amount certified to be due as aforesaid except to the extent of 54l. 11s. 9½d., for which sum they were willing and offered to issue a distress warrant, but this the plaintiff declined to do, and made no application to the justices for costs.

The plaintiff was dissatisfied with the said decision of the said justices, and applied to the Court of Queen's Bench for a rule calling upon the justices to show cause why they should not issue their distress warrant, as aforesaid, for the full amount surcharged by him.

A rule nisi was granted on the 9th May 1873, which was argued on the 16th June 1873, and the rule was discharged. The case is reported under the name of Reg. v. Fordham (L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 501).

After the granting of the said rule nisi and before the argument thereon the said John Goffage appealed to the Local Government Board under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 36; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 91, s. 4, against the disallowance of the sum of 103l. 7s. 8½d. The plaintiff being desirous that the said appeal should be considered by the Local Government Board before the argument of the rule before-mentioned, moved the Court of Queen's Bench to enlarge the said rule, but the said court refused to enlarge the same. The decision of the said Local Government Board upon the said appeal was as stated in the following letter from the secretary of the said Local Government Board to the said John Goffage:

Local Government Board,
Whitehall, S.W.,
21st Nov. 1873.

SIR,—I am directed by the Local Government Board to inform you that they have considered your appeal against the disallowance of the sum of 103l. 7s. 8½d., which was made by Mr. Prest, district auditor, at his audit for the half year ending at Michaelmas 1872 of your accounts as assistant overseer of the parish of Ashwell, together with his reason for making such disallowance, and the correspondence which has taken place in reference to the appeal.

The Board find that the auditor has stated his reason for this disallowance in the following memorandum:

"103l. 7s. 8½d. taken credit for as paid to overseer on 28th Sept. disallowed because such deposit is not vouched by the initials of the overseer entered against the sum stated to have been so deposited."

It appears that in your collecting and deposit book you took credit for the sum in question as paid to the overseer on 28th Sept. 1872, but on reference to the book the Board find that the overseer has not placed his initials against the entry as vouching for the payment, although the initials are placed against an entry under the same date of an amount paid to the treasurer. It further appears that no such sum of 103l. 7s. 8½d. was, in fact, paid to the overseer on the date above-mentioned, but that the overseers having refused to receive it on the 10th Oct., you paid it to the treasurer of the union on the 16th of the same month as part payment of the next order for contribution to the funds of the union.

Under these circumstances the Board are of opinion that the auditor's decision with respect to the disallowance of the sum of 103*l.* 7*s.* 8*d.* was lawful. They will be prepared to remit the disallowance in the exercise of the equitable jurisdiction conferred upon them by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 91, s. 4. They learn, however, that the auditor has incurred law costs in taking proceedings before the justices, and in the Court of Queen's Bench, with a view to recover the amount which he certified to be due from you, and as under sect. 4 of the statute referred to they can only exercise their equitable jurisdiction upon payment of the costs, if any, which may have been incurred by the auditor, or other competent authority, in the enforcing of such disallowance, it will be necessary that the costs incurred by the auditor in the present case, after they have been duly taxed, should be paid by you before the Board issue their certificate in pursuance of 29 & 30 Vict. c. 113, s. 5, directing the remission of the disallowance in question.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant, (Signed) JOHN T. HIBBERT, secretary.

To Mr. J. Goffage, assistant overseer of the parish of Ashwell, Ashwell-Baldock.

The said John Goffage although applied to by the plaintiff did not pay the amount of the plaintiff's said costs or any part thereof.

The plaintiff in thus endeavouring to enforce payment of the money so certified by him to be due as aforesaid incurred costs and expenses which were subsequently taxed by a master of this court at the sum of 59*l.* 2*s.* 2*d.*, consisting of 12*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.* costs of the proceedings before the justices, and 46*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.* costs of the proceedings in this court.

By 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 33 the expenses attending proceedings to enforce a sum certified by an auditor to be due shall (except so far as the same may be paid by the person against whom the proceedings have been taken) be repaid to such auditor by the guardians of the parish or union to which the proceedings may respectively relate. No part of the expenses incurred by the plaintiff, as above-mentioned, were paid by the said John Goffage, and application was made by the plaintiff to the defendants, as guardians of the Royston Poor Law Union, to pay to the plaintiff these expenses.

The clerk to the defendants thereupon wrote to the secretary of the Local Government Board the following letter:

Royston, 23rd April 1874.

SIR,—I am directed by the Board of Guardians of this union to forward to you a bill of costs by E. B. Prest, Esq., the auditor, for proceedings taken by him against Mr. Goffage, the assistant overseer of Ashwell, and certain justices of Herts, together with copies of Mr. Prest's letter and a resolution passed at their last meeting. The circumstances of the case were as follows: At his audit held on 8th Jan. 1873, Mr. Prest certified that 139*l.* 9*s.* 10*d.* was due from Mr. Goffage; previous to the audit, but subsequent to Michaelmas, viz. on the 16th Oct. 1872, Mr. Goffage paid to the treasurer the sum of 84*l.* 18*s.* 1*d.* In Feb. 1873 Mr. Prest applied to the justices for a distress warrant against Goffage for the sum of 139*l.* 9*s.* 10*d.*, and they, after hearing the evidence, declined to issue a warrant for the whole amount, but offered to grant one for 54*l.* 11*s.* 9*d.*, the balance due, after allowing for the 84*l.* 18*s.* 1*d.* which Goffage had paid; the auditor refused to accept this, and applied to the Court of Queen's Bench for a mandamus, which was refused, as appears by the case of Reg. v. Fordham and others, Justices of Herts (L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 501).—I have the honour to be Sir, your obedient servant,

H. THURNALL.

To H. Heming, Esq., Secretary, Local Government Board.

To which the assistant secretary of the said Board replied as follows:

Local Government Board,

Whitehall, S.W., 1st May 1874.

SIR,—I am directed by the Local Government Board to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 23rd ulto., and in returning the bill of costs forwarded therewith to state that they have no authority to interfere as regards its payment. Should the guardians pay the bill, the Board will have to determine how it is to be charged, but they have no power to act beforehand in the matter.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant, DANBY P. FRY.

To H. Thurnall, Esq., clerk to the guardians, Royston Union.

The defendants refused to pay the said expenses or any part thereof on the ground that they were not justified in so doing, and this action was brought to recover the said sum of 59*l.* 2*s.* 2*d.* and to enforce payment thereof. The question for the court is whether the defendants ought to pay the said sum of 59*l.* 2*s.* 2*d.* or any part thereof to the plaintiff. If the court should be of opinion in the affirmative judgment is to be entered for the plaintiff for that amount and the plaintiff's costs of action, and a peremptory mandamus is to issue directed to the defendants commanding them to pay the said sum together with the plaintiff's costs of action, and to make a rate if necessary for the purpose of paying the said sum and his costs of action to the plaintiff. If the court are of opinion that the plaintiff is not entitled to have the said sum or any part thereof paid to him by the defendants, judgment is to be entered for the defendants with costs.

Lumley Smith argued for the plaintiff.—The appointment and duties of poor law auditors are regulated by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 32, by which, after providing for the auditor's certifying deficiency or loss, "all moneys so certified to be due by such auditor shall be recoverable as so certified from all or any of the persons making or authorising the illegal payment, or otherwise answerable for such moneys, and shall be recovered on the application of such auditor, or of any such auditor subsequently appointed, or by any person for the time being entitled or authorised to receive the same, in the same manner as penalties and forfeitures may be recovered under the provisions of the said first recited Act; and the expenses attending such proceeding or recovery shall (except so far as the same may be paid by the person against whom the proceedings have been taken) be repaid to such auditor by the guardians of the parish or union, or by the district board of the district to which the proceedings may respectively relate, and shall be charged in their accounts in such manner and in such proportions as the said commissioners may direct." It is clear that this is not a case within the exception in the parenthesis, and therefore the defendants are liable.

Arthur Wilson, for defendants.—The plaintiff must show that he is entitled to these costs from the defendants in any event, and he ought to show that they were reasonably and properly incurred. The justices offered him a distress warrant against Goffage for the amount really due, and if he had accepted it he would have thereby obtained all the costs to which he had any claim at that time. He abandoned his remedy against Goffage, and thereupon he cannot avail himself of his further remedy against the guardians. As to the expenses of the proceedings on the mandamus, this court held that he was wrong.

Lumley Smith was not heard in reply.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think our judgment must be in favour of the plaintiff. The Act of Parliament by the 32nd section enables the commissioners to define audit districts, and to select auditors; it sets out the powers and duties of the auditors, especially with regard to the recovery of any deficiency or loss they may certify in the overseers' accounts.

It then prescribes the mode of recovery and the repayment to the auditors of all expenses they may incur thereby. The language is peremptory and positive, "the expenses attending such proceeding or recovery shall (except so far as the same may be paid by the person against whom the proceedings have been taken) be repaid to such auditor by the guardians of the parish or union, or by the district board of the district to which the proceedings may respectively relate, and shall be charged in their accounts in such manner and in such proportions as the said commissioners may direct." Here it is clear that the auditor's expenses have not all been paid by the person against whom the proceedings were taken; and although they might have been so paid long ago if the auditor had taken advantage of the order he obtained from the justices, yet I think that under the circumstances the enacting part of the section must be taken to operate upon this claim rather than the exception, and on the whole the auditor can recover in this action from the guardians. Although the court feel bound to give this effect to the section, they decline to hold that it was wise on the auditor's part to refuse the justices' order. Goffage was entitled to credit for this part of the overcharge which he had paid, and it would have been far better if the auditor had been contented with the distress warrant for the amount offered by the justices. So with respect to the proceedings in this court, they ought not to have been brought; but although not wise it is impossible to say that these acts of the auditor were either of them altogether unreasonable. It is not suggested that he entertained any fraudulent or improper motive in what he did, and although mistaken he committed errors of judgment only. The intention of the Legislature clearly was that such an officer should not suffer the costs incurred by his bonâ fide discharge of duties imposed upon him. Our judgment, therefore, is for the plaintiff.

MELLOR, J.—I have come to the same conclusion, although I have had some doubt as to the liability of the guardians for costs which the auditor would have avoided if he had acted prudently. It would, however, be hard upon that officer if he were to lose his costs because he did not take the most judicious course in performing his duties. There is nothing in the case to show he was not doing his best, and nothing to disentitle him from recovering judgment in this action.

QUAIN, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is admitted that there has been nothing improper on the auditor's part. He was clearly right in making application to the justices. They said, We will give you a warrant for less than you demand. Whatever his reason for refusing this offer, he does not seem to have known that he was not adopting the best course.

Judgment for plaintiff.

REG. v. THE JUSTICES OF HUDDERSFIELD (SYKES'S CASE).

Licence for sale of beer to be drunk off premises—Refusal of—How far justices must give reasons for refusal—Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869, s. 8. If justices refuse to grant a licence for the sale of liquor to be drunk off the premises they are bound to state their reasons for refusal.

By the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 27), s. 8, no application for a licence for the sale of beer not to be drunk on the premises shall be refused except on one or more of four grounds therein specified, viz. (a) that the applicant has not produced satisfactory evidence of good character; (b) that the applicant's house is disorderly; (c) that the applicant has forfeited a licence previously held; and (d) that the applicant or his house is not legally qualified.

S. applied for a licence to sell beer not to be drunk on the premises, and produced evidence of good character. No evidence adverse to the application was either offered or given, but the licensing justices refused the licence without reasons assigned, and declined to state reasons when called upon on behalf of S. so to do;

Held, that the justices were bound to state their reasons, and a rule for a mandamus to hear and determine the application of S. made absolute.

THIS was a rule calling upon D. Sykes, Esq., and other licensing justices for the borough of Huddersfield, to show cause why a mandamus should not issue commanding them to hold an adjourned licensing meeting, and there hear and determine the application of Mr. Sykes for a licence to sell beer by retail not to be drunk on the premises.

The material facts were these: The applicant had attended at the general annual licensing meeting, and had there produced certain evidence to character with which the chairman had expressed himself satisfied. No evidence against the applicant was offered. The justices retired, and when they came back intimated that they had determined to refuse all applications of a character similar to that of the applicant's. But upon being asked to state reasons for their refusal they declined. Upon showing cause, however, they made affidavit that they had not refused Sykes's application upon the fourth of the grounds specified in the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869 (a),

(a) This enactment is as follows:

All the provisions of the said Act (the Licensing Act 1828) as to the terms upon which and the manner in which and the persons by whom grants of licences are to be made by the justices at the said general annual licensing meeting, and as to appeal from any act of any justice, shall, so far as may be, have effect with regard to grants of certificates under this Act, subject to this qualification, that no application for a certificate under this Act to sell by retail beer, cider, or wine, not to be drunk on the premises, shall be refused, except upon one or more of the following grounds: viz.

(1) That the applicant has failed to produce satisfactory evidence of good character.

(2) That the house or shop in respect of which a licence is sought, or any adjacent house or shop, owned or occupied by the person applying for a licence, is of a disorderly character, or frequented by thieves, prostitutes, or persons of bad character.

(3) That the applicant having previously held a licence for the sale of wine, spirits, beer, or cider, the same has been forfeited for his misconduct, or that he has through misconduct been at any time previously adjudged disqualified from receiving any such licence or from selling any of the said articles.

(4) That the applicant, or the house in respect of which he applies, is not duly qualified as by law is required.

Where an application for any such last-mentioned certificates is refused on the ground that the house in respect of which he applies is not duly qualified as by law is required, the justices shall specify in writing to the applicant the grounds of their decision.

and they further referred to a case of Ex parte Stone (not reported) as justifying the acts complained of by the applicant.

Nov. 3. — Waddy, Q.C. moved, before Cockburn, C.J., and Mellor and Quain, JJ., for a rule for a mandamus to the justices, stating the facts as above.

COCKBURN, C.J. — For the justices to refuse to state their reasons would seem to be an arbitrary and high-handed exercise of their functions. (a) But it is hard to see how you are entitled to a mandamus to hear and determine. Would not the answer to such a mandamus be that the justices have heard and have determined? However, as the justices distinctly refused to state their reasons, you may take a rule nisi.

A rule having been granted accordingly.

Nov. 22. — Maule, Q.C. (with him Ewins Bennett) for the justices, now showed cause. — The justices are entitled to refuse this licence upon any one or more of the four grounds specified in the 8th section. It is not incumbent upon them to state upon which of the four grounds they proceed, unless they happen to proceed upon the fourth—i.e., "that the applicant or his house is not duly qualified as by law required." In this latter case they must state their grounds in writing. Expressio unius exclusio alterius. In any of the three other cases, therefore, they are not bound to state their grounds. [MELLOR, J. — Not in writing, I admit.] The statute has not made the distinction, and the inference cannot be drawn that, because they must write their reasons in one case, they must state them orally in the three others. [FIELD, J. — How is an unsuccessful applicant to appeal if he has no information as to the reason after the failure of his original application?] The right to appeal from the refusal to grant a new licence, such as the appellant's was, is now taken away. (b) The case of Ex parte Stone heard in the Court of Queen's Bench on April 26th, and the note of Blackburn, J., thereon was now referred to, but it was found not to bear the construction put upon it by the justices as stated in their affidavit.

Manisty, Q.C. (with him Waddy, Q.C.) for Mr. Sykes, the applicant, was not called upon.

MELLOR, J. — I am of opinion that this rule ought to be made absolute. I think that the justices ought, at any rate, to declare on which of the grounds they proceeded, and that they are bound to justify their refusal. This application is rightly made for a mandamus to the justices to hear and determine.

QUAIN, J. — I am of the same opinion. If we did not make this rule absolute the justices might

(a) See R. v. Young, 1 Barr. 557, in which Lord Mansfield, C.J., said (at p. 559), "If they (the justices) have no reasonable objection to the man they ought to license him; and if they have any reason they ought to give it. For, though they have, it is true, a discretion in these cases, yet it must not be permitted to them to exercise an arbitrary and uncontrolled power over the rights of other people." As to the grant of new licences for the sale of liquor to be drunk on the premises, see Reg. v. Lancashire (L. Rep. 6 Q.B. 93), in which case it was held by Hannen and Lush, JJ., that in granting such licences the justices both may and ought to consider the number of houses in the neighbourhood already licensed.

(b) See Licensing Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 49), s. 27, which enacts that no appeal shall be had to quarter sessions from any act of any justice with respect to the grant of new certificates under the Wine and Beerhouse Acts, 1869 and 1870.

evade the Wine and Beerhouse Act as they pleased. The Legislature has said in that Act that a licence shall not be refused except on one or more of four specified grounds. There are still certain rights of appeal against refusal of licences mentioned in this 8th section, and a party wishing to exercise those rights cannot freely do so without knowing upon which of the four grounds the refusal against which he appeals proceeded.

FIELD, J. — I am of the same opinion. As for Ex parte Stone, I have no recollection of this 8th section of the Act of 1869 being brought to the attention of the court, and I am quite certain that the decision in that case did not proceed upon a review of the section in question.

STRINGER v. THE JUSTICES OF HUDDERSFIELD.

Licence, renewal of—Enlargement of premises—Form of renewal—Restriction of licence to original premises—Whether restriction may be endorsed on renewal licence—Licensing Act 1872, ss. 42, 43.

By s. 48 of the Licensing Act 1872, "every licence granted after the commencement of the Act shall be in such form as may from time to time be prescribed by the Secretary of State," and "a renewal of a licence may be made by an indorsement on the licence or by the issue of a copy of the old licence." For some time previously to Feb. 1874, an inn called "Newill's Hotel" was kept by N., part of the ground floor being let off as a shop. In Feb. 1874, N. transferred the licence of "Newill's Hotel" to S., who had become tenant of the whole house, including the shop.

In July 1874, S. took in the shop to the inn, and in August applied for a renewal of his licence. The renewal was not opposed, nor was S. required to attend at the licensing meeting. The justices renewed the licence, but described the licensed premises thereon as "Newill's Hotel," consisting of such parts of the premises as were lately in the occupation of N., "and used by her under and for the purposes of the licence granted to her in renewal of which this licence is granted."

S. appealed to quarter sessions against the insertion of the description.

Held, upon a case stated by quarter sessions, that the licence was not irregular, and that judgment ought to be for the respondents.

THIS was an appeal against the form of certificate of renewal of the licence of the appellant (Stringer) by the respondents, being justices of the peace for the borough of Huddersfield, and against the refusal of the respondents to grant a renewal in the alleged legal and proper form. (a)

(a) The following enactments are material:—

Licensing Act 1872, s. 42.—"Where a licensed person applies for a renewal of his licence the following provisions shall have effect:

(1) He need not attend in person at the general annual licensing meeting, unless he is required by the justices so to attend.

(2) The justices shall not entertain any objection to

STRINGER v. THE JUSTICES OF HUDDERSFIELD.

[Q.B. Div.]

The Court of Quarter Sessions at Wakefield had confirmed the order of the respondents, subject to the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench upon the following

CASE.

The following facts were found and ascertained by the Court:

1. [Correctness of plan of premises, which accompanied case.]

2. James Weller Newill had been tenant and held a licence for sale of excisable liquors from 1862 until his death in 1873, after which his widow, Elizabeth Newill, became the tenant of the whole of the premises known as Newill's Hotel, until the 6th Feb. 1874. The said J. W. Newill, during his lifetime, and after his death the said E. Newill, was, until the said 6th Feb., in the possession of all the said premises, and had for some part of this period let off one room therein to one James Waller, a hosier, as her sub-tenant.

3. The said E. Newill was the holder of a licence for the sale of excisable liquors upon the said premises so occupied by her on and prior to the 10th Oct. 1873. The following is a copy of the renewal licence granted to her in Oct. 1873:—

Renewal licence—Innkeeper's.
Borough of Huddersfield, in the West Riding of Yorkshire.

At the General Annual Licensing Meeting. . . . We, being the majority of the justices, hereby grant unto Elizabeth Newill, a licensed victualler, the renewal licence authorising her to apply for and hold. . . .

Any of the Excise licences that may be held by a publican for the sale by retail at a house . . . known by the sign of the Newill's Hotel, of intoxicating liquor, to be consumed either on or off the premises.

The owner of the premises in respect of which this licence is granted are the executors of E. L. Hesp.

This licence shall be in force from the 10th Oct. next until the 10th Oct. then next ensuing, and no longer. . . .

4. At the time the said renewal licence was so granted the premises in respect of which the the renewal of such licence, or take any evidence with respect to the renewal thereof, unless written notice of an intention to oppose the renewal of such licence has been served on such holder not less than seven days before the commencement of the general annual licensing meeting. . . .

Subject as aforesaid, licences shall be renewed, and the powers and discretion of justices relative to such renewal shall be exercised as heretofore."

By sect. 26 of the Licensing Act 1874, the requisition mentioned in the first paragraph of the above section is not to be made "save for some special cause personal to the licensed person to whom such requisition is sent."

Licensing Act 1872, sect. 48.—"Every licence granted after the commencement of this Act shall be in such form as may from time to time be prescribed by a Secretary of State. . . . A renewal of a licence may be made by an endorsement on the licence or by the issue of a copy of the old licence."

Forms under the above section have been issued by the Home Office. The official form of description of a licence of the character renewed to the appellant appears to be as follows: "This general licence authorising him [the holder] to apply for and hold any of the Excise licences that may be held by a publican for the sale by retail at a house situated at . . . known by the sign of the . . . of intoxicating liquor, to be consumed either on or off the premises." It is to be observed that in the case of the general public house licence the discretion of justices, both in granting, transferring, or renewing it (subject to the enactments of 1872 and 1874 above set out), is absolute. See Licensing Act 1828, s. 1, and R. v. Walsall Justices (3 C. L. E. 100), as to the grant and renewal of such a licence; and Licensing Act 1828, ss. 4, 14; 5 & 6 Vict. c. 44, s. 1; and Reg. v. Rowell (26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 732), as to the transfer of it.

licence was held did not include the room let off as in par. 2 mentioned.

5. The licence so held by the said E. Newill was duly transferred by her to the appellant on the 6th Feb. 1874. The following is the transfer of such licence:

Transfer of Licence.

Borough of Huddersfield, } At a Petty Sessions of her in the West Riding of } Majesty's Justices of the Yorkshire to wit. } Peace acting in and for the Borough of Huddersfield, in the West Riding of the County of York, holden at the Court-house in Huddersfield aforesaid, on Friday, the 6th Feb. 1874, whereas no special session for the transfer of licences of inns, alehouses, and victualling houses in the said division is now being holden therein; and whereas application is now made at this Petty Session by Elizabeth Newill (Newill's Hotel), Huddersfield, keeping the inn, alehouse, or victualling house, situate in the said division, and mentioned in the licence hereunto annexed, and granted pursuant to the statute in that case made and provided at the General Licensing Meeting in the said licence mentioned, to transfer the said licence to John Stringer, of Huddersfield, innkeeper. We, therefore, the undersigned, being the majority of the justices present at this Petty Sessions, by this authority under our hands and seals to the said licence hereunto annexed so granted as aforesaid, by virtue of the power vested in us by the statute in such case made and provided, after examining upon oath all necessary parties, do authorise the said John Stringer, being a person not disqualified by the statute in such case made and provided, and to whom it is proposed by such application to transfer such licence, to use, exercise, and carry on the business of a licensed victualler and beer retailer at the same house and at the same premises mentioned in the said licence hereunto annexed, and there to sell such excisable liquors and beer as might heretofore have been sold and retailed therein;
the same being a case where justices of the peace assembled at a Special Session are empowered by the statute in that case made and provided to transfer or grant licences before the expiration thereof to sell excisable liquors and beer by retail in the same house or premises in respect of which any person had been theretofore duly licensed. The authority hereby granted to continue and be in force until the now next ensuing session for transferring and granting such licences, which shall be holden for the said division within which such house and premises are situated, and no longer.

6. The appellant became the tenant of the whole of the premises, including the shop let off as in par. 2 mentioned, on the 6th of Feb. 1874, and on the 1st July 1874, the lease of the said premises was renewed to him by the owners, the trustees of Mr. Hesp, and under such renewed lease the appellant became the tenant and occupier of the whole of the premises, including such shop previously occupied by Waller, and has, since the 1st July 1874, been in possession and occupation of the whole of such licensed premises, including such shop.

7. The shop has always had and still has an internal communication opening immediately into the interior passage which forms part of the licensed premises of the appellant, and one part of that shop has not hitherto been used as part of the licensed premises.

8. Since the year 1870 some portions of Waller's shop have formed part of the appellant's licensed premises called Newill's Hotel, and have been used and occupied therewith under the said licence.

9. Prior to the Brewster Sessions held at Huddersfield for that borough on 26th Aug. 1874, and adjourned to the 30th Sept. 1874, no notice of any intention to oppose the renewal of the appellant's licence had been served on him nor had any requisition been made by the justices upon him pursuant to sect. 42 of the Licensing Act 1872, or sect. 26 of the Licensing Act 1874.

10. No objection was made at the said sessions held on the 26th Aug. 1874, to the renewal of appellant's licence, and no evidence was given before the licensing justices on the application for the renewal of the appellant's licence at the said original or adjourned sessions of any matter or special cause personal to the appellant.

11. The following licence was granted to the appellant on the said 30th Sept. 1874, in respect of which the appeal was brought.

Renewal licence—Innkeeper's.

Borough of Huddersfield, in the West Riding of Yorkshire.

At the adjourned general annual licensing meeting of her Majesty's justices of the peace acting in and for the borough of Huddersfield, in the same riding, holden at the Court House in Huddersfield, in the said borough, on the 30th day of September 1874, we, being the majority of the justices of the said borough at the said meeting assembled, hereby grant unto John Stringer, of the township of Huddersfield, in the said borough, a licensed victualler, this renewal licence authorising him to apply for and hold any of the Excise licences that may be held by a publican for the sale by retail at a house situated in the township aforesaid, known by the sign of Newill's Hotel, of intoxicating liquors to be consumed either on or off the premises (consisting of such parts or portions of the block of buildings called Heep's-buildings in Westgate, and John William-street, as were lately in the occupation of Elizabeth Newill, deceased, and used by her under and for the purposes of the licence granted to her in renewal of which this licence is granted. The owners of the premises in respect of which this licence is granted are the executors of the late Mr. Edward Lake Heep.

This licence shall be in force from the 10th day of October next until the 10th day of October then next ensuing, and no longer.

12. Part of the room on the first floor of the appellant's said premises extends over Michael Hirst's draper's shop, but that shop has never formed any part of the premises leased to the appellant, and had never had external or internal communication therewith.

Upon the hearing of the appeal it was contended on behalf of the appellant that, as he had not been required by the licensing justices to attend in person at the said General Annual Licensing Meeting, or at the said adjourned General Annual Licensing Meeting, and as no requisition whatever had been made by them to that effect, or sent to him for any special cause personal to him as a licensed person, pursuant to the provisions of the Licensing Act 1872, and the Licensing Act 1874, respectively, the said justices were bound, under the provisions of the first-named statute, to renew the appellant's licence, according to the form at the time of the same renewal prescribed by the Secretary of State, either by an indorsement of such renewal on the existing licence or by issuing a copy of the old licence, and that the respondents, as such licensing justices, under the state of the law as then in force, and under the circumstances found in the case, had no power to add to the form so prescribed as aforesaid and then in force, by inserting in the licence then granted as the renewal of the old licence, the following passage set forth in the case, and which was not contained in the then existing licence, viz.:

Consisting of such parts or portion of the block of buildings called Heep's-buildings, in Westgate and John William-street, as were lately in the occupation of Elizabeth Newill, deceased, and used by her under and for the purposes of the licence granted to her in renewal of which this licence is granted.

And that this passage added to the licence either a condition or limitation unauthorised by law, and was an alteration of the licence in substance and form as prescribed by law. And, further, it was objected on behalf of the appellant that no written notice of an intention to oppose the renewal of his licence having ever been served on him as the holder of a licence before the commencement of the said General Annual Licensing Meeting, nor any such notice whatever having been served on him stating in general terms the grounds on which the renewal of his said licence was to be opposed, it was not competent to the respondents as such licensing justices to entertain any objection to the renewal of such licence, or to take any evidence with respect to the renewal thereof, or to vary the form of the licence then to be renewed. And that upon the adjournment of the said licensing meeting, and of the granting of the said renewal of appellant's licence above stated, there having been no objection made to its renewal, and no consequent requisition by the said licensing justices to the appellant to attend on the day of the adjournment, that no other step could be legally taken by the said respondents, but the renewal of the then existing licence, either by indorsement of the said licence, or by issuing a copy of the same, it was contended on behalf of the respondents that the justices did not entertain any objection to the renewal of the appellant's licence, but that what they did was to entertain a question as to the form, and that they had power to insert the said passage in the form of the licence, such passage not being in the nature of a condition, but merely descriptive of the licensed premises as they stood at that date.

The questions for the opinion of the court are:

(1) Whether the respondents, as licensing justices, under the circumstances above stated, were justified in refusing to grant either a copy of the old licence or an indorsement of renewal upon such licence, and whether they could legally insert the passage objected to. If the court shall be of opinion that the justices could not legally insert the same, then the said certificate or licence is to be amended by the court by striking out the said passage, or the said licence shall be returned to this court to be mended or quashed, and a fresh certificate issued; (2) If the court shall be of opinion that the justices had the power to grant the renewal of the licence or certificate in the form in which it now stands, then the order of sessions is to be confirmed.

Campbell Foster, Q.C. (Forbes with him) for the justices.—It will be contended on the other side that the words inserted by the licensing justices amounted to a condition, but it is submitted that they are merely words of definition, and that the justices had a right to insert them. He was then stopped.

Maule, Q.C. (Tennant with him) for the appellant Stringer.—The 48th section is explicit that licences must be in the form prescribed by the Home Office. The licence was granted to the predecessor of the appellant in such a form as to include in the licensed premises that portion of the building which the justices by the words complained of have sought to exclude. [BLACKBURN, J.—Ought not the appellant to have applied for a new licence?] It is submitted not, inasmuch as, notwithstanding the taking in of the shop, the premises, for licensing purposes, remained the same: (Reg. v. Albert Smith, 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 178). In that case the occupier of a licensed house added to his premises the adjoining house, and made them all one establishment. Upon his applying for a renewal of his licence the justices refused, upon the ground that the premises were not the same and that no notices had been given as for a new licence. Upon an appeal to quarter sessions against the refusal the quarter sessions renewed the licence, subject to a case as to whether, under the circumstances, the notices were necessary. It was held by Mellor and Lush, JJ., that the quarter sessions were right in renewing the licence. "It certainly seems to me," observed Mellor, J., "That this is an objection which is not made in the interest of any one except some rival publican. As far as the public are concerned, the house is a better one than before."

Highway—Wilful obstruction—Trees over a bridleway—5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 72.

The respondent was summoned under the 72nd section of the Highway Act 1835 for wilfully obstructing the free passage of a highway, to wit, a bridleway. It was proved that this alleged bridleway passed through a wood which had belonged to and been occupied by the respondent since 1869, and that of late years the trees and underwood had so grown over and across it as to be an obstruction to foot passengers, and to render it impossible for persons on horseback to pass along it.

Held that the justices were right in dismissing the summons, for this was not a wilful obstruction, even if the path were a highway.

THIS was a case stated by two justices of the peace in and for the county of Surrey, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court on a question of law which arose before them as hereinafter stated.

The respondent was summoned under sect. 72 of the Highway Act 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50), at the instance of the Godstone Highway Board, for wilfully obstructing the free passage of a highway—to wit, a bridleway.

The case was heard at the petty sessions, on the 8th March 1875, and the further hearing was adjourned to and took place on the 26th April following, when the justices dismissed the complaint.

The appellant being dissatisfied with their determination upon the hearing of the said complaint as being erroneous in point of law, pursuant to sect. 2 of the said statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, duly applied to them in writing to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and the grounds of their determination as aforesaid, for the opinion of this court, and recognisances have been duly entered into as required by the statute in that behalf, the said justices in compliance with the said request stated and signed the following case:

During the last year or two the surveyor of the Highway Board on several occasions complained to the respondent of the obstruction hereinafter mentioned, and called upon him to lop or cut the trees, but he refused to do so, alleging that he did not admit the way to be a public one, and on the 20th Feb. 1875, the clerk of the Highway Board sent him the following letter:

Sir,—I am directed by the Highway Board of this district to request that you will be good enough to remove the obstruction in the Nobright bridleway, which runs through your property in the parish of Godstone by lopping the trees and underwood in order that the same may be rendered passable for persons riding along it, and the present great inconvenience to foot passengers thereby removed. I am also to state that in the event of your not complying with the above request within ten days from this date, the Highway Board will be compelled to take such proceedings in the matter as they may be advised. I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

(Signed) EVELYN A. HEAD.

J. T. Horner, Esq., Sunnyside, Godstone.

To which the following reply was received

Nobright, Godstone,
2nd March 1875.

Sir,—In reply to your note, as I do not acknowledge the existence of the bridleway you allude to, I am unable to comply with the request of the District Highway Board. I am, yours obediently, (Signed) JAMES THOMAS HORNER.

E. A. Head, Esq.

The summons before mentioned was thereupon issued, and came on for hearing as above-mentioned.

At the hearing, witnesses were called on behalf of the appellant, and gave evidence of the facts before stated, and also to the effect following:

That respondent, in or about the year 1869 purchased a freehold estate formerly called the Nobright, over which estate and adjoining lands the way in question passes; that in one part of its course the way passes through a wood belonging to the respondent and in his occupation; that the trees and underwood growing on the land of the respondent and in his occupation on each side of the way in question, had of late years so grown over and across the way in places as to be an obstruction to the free passage along the same, and in one place the boughs met so as to render it almost impossible for persons on horseback to pass along it.

The respondent, while not admitting either the right of way or the obstruction as matters of fact, objected at the adjourned hearing, that whether or not the way was a public bridleway, an obstruction thereto had been caused in the manner alleged by the appellant, such obstruction was not a wilful obstruction within the meaning of sect. 72 of the Highway Act 1835, and that the remedy of the appellant, if the way was a public bridleway and the passage of it was obstructed in the manner alleged, was by indictment or action, or at all events, not by summary proceedings under the 72nd section of the Highway Act 1835; and the said justices, being of opinion that even if the way were a public bridleway, an obstruction caused by suffering the trees and underwood to grow up over or across a public bridleway as alleged, is not a wilful obstruction within the meaning of the said sect. 72, dismissed the complaint.

The question of law for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench is whether the decision of the said justices, was right in dismissing the complaint on the ground above stated?

Q. B. Div.]

WALKER (app.) v. HORNER (resp.).

[Q.B. Div.]

Lumley Smith argued for the appellant.—The 72nd section of the Highway Act 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50) provided for all offences not previously mentioned, "That if any person shall wilfully ride upon any footpath or causeway by the side of any road made or set apart for the use or accommodation of foot passengers; or shall wilfully lead or drive any horse, ass, sheep, mule, swine, or cattle, or carriage of any description, or any truck or sledge, upon any such footpath or causeway; or shall tether any horse, ass, mule, swine, or cattle on any highway, so as to suffer or permit the tethered animal to be thereon; or shall cause any injury or damage to be done to the said highway, or the hedges, posts, rails, walls, or fences thereof; or shall wilfully obstruct the passage of any footway; or wilfully destroy or injure the surface of any highway; or shall wilfully or wantonly pull up, cut down, remove, or damage the posts, blocks, or stones fixed by the said surveyor as herein directed; or dig or cut down the banks which are the securities, and defence of the said highways; or break, damage, or throw down the stones, bricks, or wood fixed upon the parapets or battlements of bridges, or otherwise injure or deface the same; or pull down, destroy, obliterate, or deface any milestone or post, graduated or direction post or stone, erected upon any highway; or shall play at football or any other game on any part of the said highways, to the annoyance of any passenger or passengers; or if any hawk, higgler, gipsy, or other person travelling shall pitch any tent, booth, stall, or stand, or encamp upon any part of any highway; or if any person shall make or assist in making any fire, or shall wantonly fire off any gun or pistol, or shall set fire to, or wantonly let off, or throw any squib, rocket, serpent, or other firework whatsoever, within fifty feet of the centre of such carriage way or cart way; or bait or run for the purpose of baiting, any bull upon or near any highway, or shall lay any timber, stone, hay, straw, dung, manure, lime, soil, ashes, rubbish, or other matter or thing whatsoever upon such highway, to the injury of such highway, or to the injury, interruption or personal danger of any person travelling thereon; or shall suffer any filth, dirt, lime, or other offensive matter or thing whatsoever to run or flow into or upon any highway from any house, building, erection, lands, or premises adjacent thereto; or shall in any way wilfully obstruct the free passage of any such highway; every person so offending in any of the cases aforesaid shall, for each and every such offence, forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding 40s., over and above the damages occasioned thereby." The effect amongst others of this section is to impose a summary penalty for all kinds of wilful obstructions in any kind of highway, a previous section giving a special remedy when trees grow over a carriage or cartway. By sect. 65, it is enacted "that if the surveyor shall think that any carriage-way or cartway is prejudiced by the shade of any hedges or by any trees, except those trees planted for ornament or for shelter to any hop-ground, house, building, or courtyard of the owner thereof, growing in or near such hedges or other fences, and that the sun and wind are excluded from such highway, to the damage thereof, or if any obstruction is caused in any carriage-way or cartway by any hedge or tree, it shall be lawful for any one justice of the peace, on the application of the said surveyor, to summon the owner of the land on which such hedges or trees are growing next adjoining to such carriage-way or cartway to appear before the justices at a special sessions for the highways to show cause why the said hedges are not cut, pruned, or plashed, or such trees not pruned or lopped, in such manner that the carriage way or cartway shall not be prejudiced by the shade thereof, and that the sun and wind may not be excluded from such carriage-way or cartway to the damage thereof, or why the obstruction caused in such carriage-way or cartway should not be removed." The justices may direct either of these things to be done; or in default a penalty may be imposed, together with the expenses of the surveyor's carrying out the justices' direction, upon the owner disobeying. It appears from Hawkins's Pleas of the Crown Book, I. Ch. 32, sect. 13 that it is an indictable nuisance "to suffer the boughs of trees growing near the highway to hang over the road in such a manner as thereby to incommode the passage." This is in accordance with the rule of law that a person is responsible for the natural consequences of his neglect. It was held in Williams v. Adams (2 B. & S. 312) that the question whether highway or not, under the 73rd section, and such a question under the 72nd section, is exactly the same, was within the jurisdiction of justices. The case of Croasdill v. Ratcliffe (5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 834) may be relied upon as an authority for the respondent, but it can be distinguished from the present case in that allowing rain water to flow upon a highway, which was the complaint there, is not an indictable nuisance.

Bulwer, Q.C. (with him Athawes) for the respondent.—By sect. 5 of the Highway Act the word highway is defined to include a bridleway, therefore, the Legislature if it had intended to give the same remedy against the growth of trees over a bridleway as it has in the case of a carriage or cartway by the 65th section, it might easily have used the word highway in that section. The omission of a bridleway and a footway from that specific remedy is a strong ground for holding that the Act was not meant to apply to obstructions upon them—at all events, not to obstructions the nature of which cannot be said to be wilful. The only authority near the subject is Croasdill v. Ratcliffe, in which Crompton, J., after referring to the provision in this 72nd section about permitting filth to run on to the highway, said "And the other parts of the section show that the obstruction must be wilfully caused."

Lumley Smith in reply.—"There is no doubt" says Hawkins's Pleas of the Crown, Book 1, Ch. 32, sect. 10. "but that all injuries whatsoever to any highway, as by digging a ditch, or making a hedge overthwart it or laying logs of timber in it, or by doing any other act which will render it less commodious to the king's people, are public nuisances at common law." The 72nd section is wide enough to include all indictable nuisances.

Bulwer referred the court to Small v. Bickley (32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 726), in which it was held that refusing to go half a mile to open his shop was not preventing, obstructing, or impeding an inspector of nuisances, under 26 & 27 Vict. c. 117, s. 3.

COCKBURN, C.J.—Certainly this case is not free from doubt, but my own impression is that this comes within the section, and that the justices had jurisdiction to hear this complaint. My reason for saying so is that according to the authorities a man may be convicted upon an indictment for not lopping his trees which obstruct a highway. An indictment would not lie unless such an obstruction were a wilful act in the consideration of the law, and if so in that case I do not see why it should not be a wilful obstruction within the words of this section which provides a summary remedy. I entertain no very strong view on the subject and my learned brothers both think otherwise; so the decision of the justices will be affirmed.

Q.B. Div.]

MELLOR, J.—It seems to me that an obstruction must imply some active measure of a character to cause an interruption, and I do not think that the words of the 72nd section of the Highway Act were intended to include all indictable offences. I consider that I am fortified in this conclusion by sect. 65, the clause which provides a summary remedy “if any obstruction is caused in any carriageway or cartway by any hedge or tree.” I cannot think that it was intended to leave to the magistrates the power to interfere with an obstruction like this, which is not expressly included in the offences created by the Act.

QUAIN, J.—I am of the same opinion. We must see the kind of offences in which a summary jurisdiction is given under the 72nd section. It is not given over all offences, but only over those of the kind the section particularly describes. The acts which are made by that section offences for which penalties are incurred are of an active character, such as riding on a footway, causing damage to a highway, playing games, letting off fireworks on the highway, &c. I cannot think that merely to suffer trees to grow so as to interrupt passengers can be said to be wilfully obstructing the passage of the highway. The 65th section which provides for such a proceeding under certain circumstances does not relate to the obstruction of a bridleway or footpath.

Licence to sell spirits by retail—Excise licence—Second application—Licensing Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), ss. 68 and 69.

The applicant was refused at a general licensing meeting a licence for the sale of spirits by retail not to be consumed on his premises under the Licensing Act 1872, s. 69, on the ground that he had no excise licence as required by the previous sect. 68 before he can sell spirits. At the adjourned licensing meeting he applied again, having obtained an excise licence and given new notices. The justices refused to hear the application on the ground that they had already determined it.

Held, upon mandamus, without consideration of the validity of the first refusal, that the second application, being on new facts was a different case from the first, and ought to have been heard by the justices.

This was a rule calling upon the licensing justices in and for the Kirkdale Division of the county of Lancaster to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue directed to them commanding them to hold within a reasonable time a further adjournment of the general annual licensing meeting holden in and for the said division on the 27th Aug. 1875, and by adjournment on the 30th Sept. 1875, and to issue their precept to the high constable or other proper officer to cause notice to be given of the time and place for holding such further adjournment pursuant to the statutes in that behalf, and at such further adjournment to proceed, to hear, and determine pursuant to the statutes in that behalf the matter of an application by the said John Maughan for a licence to sell spirits, by retail, to be consumed off the premises, situate in Liverpool-road, in the township of Great Crosby, in the said county.

It appeared from the affidavit of John Maughan, the applicant, that he caused notices to be duly served in the mode prescribed by The Wine and Beer House Act 1869 and The Licensing Act 1872 of his intention to apply at the general annual licensing meeting to be held at Kirkdale, for the division of Kirkdale, in the county of Lancaster, on the 27th Aug. last for a licence to sell by retail wine, spirits, and beer to be consumed off the house or premises thereunto belonging, situate in Liverpool-road, in the township of Great Crosby, in the county of Lancaster.

He attended at the general annual licensing meeting held for the said division of Kirkdale, and made application for the licence specified in such notices, when the chairman of the court informed him that the court had no power to grant to him a licence to sell spirits to be consumed off the said house or premises in Liverpool-road, but they were willing to grant and did grant to him a licence to hold an excise licence to sell beer and Foreign and British wines by retail to be consumed off the said house or premises.

He was subsequently informed and verily believed that the cause and ground of refusal to grant to him the licence to hold an excise licence to sell spirits by retail to be consumed off the premises was that he did not hold a dealer's licence to sell spirits.

The court adjourned the said general annual licensing meeting from the 27th Aug. last to the 30th Sept. last.

The applicant caused fresh notices to be duly served in the mode prescribed by the Wine and Beer House Act 1869 and the Licensing Act 1872 of his intention to apply at the adjourned licensing meeting to be held on the 30th Sept. last for a licence to sell by retail spirits to be consumed off the said house or premises in Liverpool-road aforesaid.

On the 15th Sept. last he paid to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue the sum of 10*l.* 10*s.* for a licence to exercise and carry on the trade of a dealer in spirits at the house or premises in Liverpool-road aforesaid, commonly described as a “dealer's licence.”

He attended at the said adjourned licensing meeting held at Kirkdale aforesaid on the 30th Sept. last, and made application through his solicitor to Robert Neilson, Gilbert Winter Moss, Peter Thomson, Peter Silvester Bidwill, and George Gordon Macree, Esquires, justices of the peace for the county of Lancaster (who formed the court which then sat) for a licence to sell spirits by retail to be consumed off his said house or premises in Liverpool-road aforesaid, and he produced to the said justices his said “dealer's licence;”

SMITH v. COOK.

but the said justices refused to grant to him the said licence, on the ground that he had already made an application of a similar nature at the general annual licensing meeting held as aforesaid on the 27th Aug. last, and had been refused; and that it was not competent to him to make a second application at the same annual licensing meeting.

The applicant stated that it was competent in law for him to make such application, by the 69th section of the Licensing Act 1872, and that it was not competent for the said justices to refuse to grant to him the said licence "except upon one or more of the grounds on which a certificate in respect of a licence to sell by retail beer, cider, or wine not to be consumed on the premises may be refused," and no objection was made to his said application upon any of the said grounds.

Gully showed cause against the rule.—The regulations concerning these licences are contained in sects. 68 and 69 of the Licensing Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94) by the former of which "No person shall (a) sell by retail liqueurs or spirits under the authority of any retail licence which such person shall have obtained as a wholesale spirit dealer from the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, except in premises occupied and used exclusively for the sale therein of intoxicating liquor, and which premises have no communication with the premises of, nor are in any way occupied by a person who is carrying on any other trade or business, unless such person shall have obtained from the licensing justices a licence authorising such sale on premises not exclusively so occupied and used." By sect. 69 "a licence for the sale of liqueurs or spirits by retail not to be consumed on the premises may, where such licence is required by this Act, be granted in the same manner in all respects in which a licence for selling wine not to be consumed on the premises may by law be granted, and an application for such a licence shall not be refused except upon one or more of the grounds on which a certificate in respect of a licence to sell by retail beer, cider, or wine not to be consumed on the premises may be refused." By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 21, s. 2, "Any person duly licensed as a dealer in spirits in England may take out an additional licence authorising him to sell by retail Foreign or British spirits in any quantity not less than one reputed quart bottle, or as to foreign liqueurs, in the bottles in which the same may have been imported, not to be drunk or consumed upon the premises; and any licensed dealer taking out such additional licence may send out or deliver any such spirits without the certificate required by law in such cases, if the quantity does not exceed one gallon at a time, and such spirits are not sent to the stock of any dealer or retailer." The justices came to a determination concerning this application at the meeting in August; therefore, during the whole of those sessions it was res judicata, and could not be disturbed. [QUAIN, J.—Do you say he could not come again until the next August?] Yes: that is the effect of the decision of this court in Reg. v. The Justices of the West Riding of Yorkshire (Drake's case), L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 33, in which, although the second application concerning the particular house was good at the adjourned sessions, it was expressly so held on the ground that the previous application was refused for a reason personal to a different applicant from the second, and therefore it was not res judicata. Lush, J. said at p. 39 "I wish to add, with respect to the second objection, that if the justices' decision at the general annual licensing meeting had turned upon the bad character of the house, as at present advised, I should have thought that they could not be required to determine the matter a second time. But their decision did not pass upon that ground; it turned upon the personal qualifications of Boocock. The application by Drake for a certificate is totally different from that by Boocock." It cannot be said here that a second application by the same man for the same purpose is totally different from the first. [MELLOR, J.—The applicant here says he has acquired a different character altogether since his previous application. He has obtained the necessary qualification, given new notices, and made an entirely fresh application.] A fresh application with new notices was made at an adjourned licensing meeting for a beerhouse certificate in Ex parte E. W. Rushworth (23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 120), the justices refused to hear the application, and this court held their refusal to be justified. Blackburn, J. said "No doubt the application may be made in the first instance at the adjournment day, but it would be strange to hold that when a certificate has been refused at the original meeting, a party may renew his application at an adjourned meeting." And Cockburn, C.J. in his judgment said "If we granted this rule we should be establishing the principle that a second application may be made in all cases where the first has been refused."

Munistly, Q.C. and Hodgson Bremner appeared to support the rule, but were not heard.

MELLOR, J.—This was, in fact, a new application. The applicant was on the second occasion clothed with a different character from that in which he appeared on the first. It being admitted that there would have been no ground for refusing his application if his first appearance had been at the adjourned meeting, I do not see that the previous refusal, which was based on a ground no longer existing, should have prevented his being heard.

QUAIN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The magistrates are not bound to hear and determine the same case twice over during the same licensing period; but the second application was here made upon a different state of facts from those which existed when the magistrates had refused the certificate, and it cannot be said to have been the same case.

FIELD, J.—I am of the same opinion.

SMITH v. COOK.

Duty of agister of cattle—Scienter—Liability for injury by trespassing animals.

The defendant undertook to agist a horse of the plaintiff, which he put into a large field with some heifers. The field was part of a marsh, and was separated from another field, in which a bull was kept, merely by a ditch, which the bull was known by the defendant frequently to cross, in order to get to the heifers. The bull was exceptionally quiet, and had never been known to injure any animal, but the horse was found gored to death by him. A verdict was found for the plaintiff for the value of the horse.

Held, that the doctrine of scienter was not to be imported into an action upon a bailment; and that the only question of the defendant's liability turned upon the fact whether he had used reasonable and proper care, which fact was rightly determined by the jury.

This was an action tried in London before Blackburn, J., when a verdict of 50*l.* was found for the plaintiff, leave being reserved to the defendant to move for a nonsuit.

Plaintiff was the owner of three horses, which he entrusted to the defendant for agistment. The defendant placed the horses in a field belonging to him on Plumstead Marshes, where there were some cows and heifers. The fields there situated are divided only by ditches, which are kept in order by commissioners having charge of the marshes. In a neighbouring field, divided from the defendant's only by one of these ditches, another agister of cattle, named Russell, had placed a bull and some cows. This bull was frequently in the habit of wandering across the ditches, and into the neighbouring fields, and the defendant was aware of his keeping occasional company with the cows in his field. The bull's character, however, was exceptional for quietness, and he had never been known by his owner, or anyone who had the management of him, to show vice of any kind against men, horses, or other living creatures. One of the plaintiff's horses, however, was, after being about two months in the defendant's field, discovered to be dead, and, as the jury found, gored to death by this bull. The jury also found that the defendant had not, under the circumstances proved, taken reasonable and proper care in agisting the plaintiff's horse, and estimated the plaintiff's damage at 50*l.*

A rule nisi was obtained calling upon the plaintiff to show cause why this verdict should not be set aside, and a nonsuit entered instead thereof, pursuant to leave reserved by the learned judge, on the ground that there was no evidence of scienter, and that such evidence was necessary to maintain the action; and why a new trial should not be had between the parties on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence.

Bray showed cause for the plaintiff.—Proof of scienter is necessary in various cases of torts, but here a relation of contract exists between plaintiff and defendant, and the jury have found that the defendant was guilty of negligence in the performance of the duty he undertook for the plaintiff. Without negligence, the defendant's liability might come within the rule laid down by the Privy Council in The Madras Railway Company v. The Zemindar of Carvatenagarum (L. Rep. 1 S. C. 364). The liability here, however, was a question of fact, which has been decided by the jury. In Lee v. Riley (18 U. B., N. S., 722), the question was as to the defendant's liability for the death of the plaintiff's horse caused by a kick of the defendant's mare, which had strayed from the defendant's into the plaintiff's adjoining field. There was no evidence of the mare's vice, but the defendant was held responsible, the damage not being too remote. That case is stronger than the present, because here was a contract between plaintiff and defendant that the latter should take reasonable care of the horse. It also shows that defendant would have a certain remedy over against the neighbouring agister who had charge of the bull. [FIELD, J.—Has not the plaintiff the same remedy directly? QUAIN, J.—May v. Burdett (9 Q. B. 101) decided that the owner of an animal accustomed to attack and bite mankind is liable prima facie for injury done by the animal even without negligence. Is there authority for saying that a bull's propensity for goring horses should be common knowledge? BLACKBURN, J.—In a case of trespass or negligence the owner's liability exists whether the animal be vicious or not.] And by Ellis v. Loftus Iron Company (L. Rep. 10, Q. B. 10), a kick through an iron fence is a sufficient trespass. Although there seems to be no English authority, it has been held in America that the owner of a bull is liable for damage done by him to a horse without any knowledge of vice. In Dolph v. Ferris (7 Watts and Sergeant's Reports of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 367, Kennedy, J., at p. 370, "Injuries committed by bulls or horses occur so frequently that it is difficult to avoid coming to the conclusion that every owner of a bull ought to be held answerable in an action of trespass for his bull in killing or injuring, when running at large either by his negligence or permission, the horse of another, though it be the first offence of the kind that the animal was ever known to commit." And Burnes v. Chaplin (4 Allen (Massachusetts) 444) decided that "If a sucking colt, while following its dam, which is led by her owner in a highway, is kicked and killed by a horse which has been turned loose in the highway without a keeper, the owner of the colt, if found by the jury to have been in the exercise of reasonable care, may recover damages of the owner of the horse, although the horse was not vicious." It may be taken generally that a mere propensity on the part of one animal to injure another is sufficient to make the owner liable, without proof of actual vice. [Stopped by the court on the second ground of the rule, as to the weight of evidence.]

Powell, Q. C. and Shaw supported the rule.—Buzendin v. Sharp (2 Salk. 662) and Cox v. Burbidge (13 C. B., N. S., 430) have long determined the rule of law that the owner's knowledge of an animal's vice is necessary to make him liable for injury done by the animal. [FIELD, J.—But you have to show that this doctrine of scienter should be imported into a contract of this kind.] When an owner has no reason to guard against damages by an animal in his possession, surely a stranger need not do so. There could not have been negligence on the defendant's part unless he had some knowledge of this bull's propensity to gore horses. No evidence was adduced that any bull was ever known to do such a thing, and there was evidence that this bull had never done so. According to Corbett v. Packington (6 B. & C. 268) this is an action in assumpsit. [QUAIN, J.—It is brought upon a bailment, and may be either in contract or tort.] The same rules of evidence apply to either.

BLACKBURN, J.—I think in this case we must discharge the rule upon both grounds. The plaintiff brings a charge against an agister of horses of neglecting to take due and proper care of a horse whose custody the plaintiff entrusted to him, and in consequence the horse was killed. In point of fact the defendant, having charge of this horse, turned it into a marsh with heifers ready for bulling, being well aware that a bull was in the habit of straying from another part of the marsh, which was separated only by a ditch, which the bull could easily cross. The evidence was sufficient that the plaintiff's horse, whilst in the place where the defendant had put it, came by its death by being gored by this bull. The first question is, was it negligence to put the horse into a field where it was known a bull was in the habit of going to visit heifers? There was evidence that it is dangerous to do so; and that whether mischief ensued or not it is negligent to do so. There was also contrary evidence. One man said he had thirty bulls in the same field with horses and heifers. The jury, however, found it was negligence, and I do not quarrel with the verdict. The point of law which arises has been settled from early times, more on authority than on reason, that in the case of domesticated animals, such as horses, dogs, bulls, &c., which are not mischievous by nature, the owner is entitled to suppose they will not do mischief until he has express knowledge to the contrary; that is to say, he is not liable unless a scienter be proved. It is otherwise, of course, with respect to animals whose nature is admittedly well known to be injurious to men or other animals; but this doctrine is laid down as early as Henry VIII.'s time, in Dyer's Reps. (Vol. 1, 25 b, pl. 122, ed. 1794), where reference is made to authorities in the Book of Exodus and the Year Books. It is clearly settled, at all events, that to show a man keeps a bull at his peril there must be proof that he had knowledge of the bull's specially mischievous nature. It is not enough to show that bulls sometimes gore other animals. There was no evidence here that this animal was mischievous, and therefore the owner, perhaps, could not be made liable, at all events without trespass. But does it follow that the defendant could, without negligence, put a horse he was agisting where he knew a bull, however quiet, was in the habit of coming? Was such a proceeding consistent with the reasonable care which the plaintiff, the owner of the horse, had a right to expect of him? It seems to me that the doctrine of scienter does not govern this case at all. There is no authority for extending it to cases of contract, and I am not inclined to import a rule of this very artificial kind into matters not included by authority. The cases do not throw much light upon the question. Lee v. Riley is the strongest in favour of the plaintiff, but it appeared there that the defendant was negligent in not keeping up a fence. It may, however, be inferred that the same liability would have occurred if the two horses had been put in the same field. If so, a fortiori, should the defendant here be liable for putting the plaintiff's horse where a bull was known to have access? I think the rule should be discharged.

QUAIN, J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree that the action is founded on negligence. There was a bailment to agist the plaintiff's horse, and the only question for us is whether the defendant took proper and reasonable care of the animal. Mr. Powell says he could not be guilty of negligence unless he knew this bull was mischievous; but it is a mere question of fact whether there was negligence or not. Although the authorities are clear that scienter is necessary to establish an owner's responsibility, there are none for importing that doctrine into cases of contract. I think there was ample evidence to justify the verdict in this case.

FIELD, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the evidence was sufficient, and the only other question is whether the defendant's ignorance of this bull's having gored horses before entitles him to a verdict. This is not a case which involves the doctrine of scienter; it is an action upon a bailment, and the only question is whether the defendant took reasonable and proper care of the plaintiff's horse. The facts were that he took the horse into a field where he knew this bull would probably come, and the result was what he ought to have expected. The jury have found that his proceeding in the matter was not reasonable, and that he ought to have known the risk to which he put the horse, even although the bull was particularly quiet.

Rule discharged.

REG. v. THE JUSTICES OF GLAMORGANSHIRE.

Licence for sale of liquor to be drunk off premises—Whether residence of licensee necessary—"Duly qualified as by law required"—Mandamus to licensing justices—Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869, s. 8—3 & 4 Vict. c. 61, s. 1—23 Vict. c. 27, s. 3—24 & 25 Vict. c. 21, s. 2—26 & 27 Vict. c. 33, s. 1.

By 1 Will. 4, c. 64, s. 2, any person "being a householder" may apply for and obtain an excise licence for the sale of beer by retail, and by 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61, no licence to sell beer by retail, under Will. 4, c. 64, "shall be granted to any person who shall not be the real resident holder and occupier of the dwelling-house in which he shall apply to be licensed."

By 23 Vict. c. 27, s. 3, every person keeping a shop for the sale of other goods than foreign wine, or holding a wine dealer's licence, is entitled to take out a licence for the sale of wine by retail, not to be drunk on the premises.

By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 21, s. 2, any person holding a wholesale spirit dealer's licence may take out an additional licence for the sale of spirits by retail, not to be drunk on the premises.

By 26 & 27 Vict. c. 33, s. 1, any person holding a wholesale beer dealer's licence may take out an additional licence for the sale of beer not to be drunk on the premises, "and such additional licence shall be granted without the possession of any other qualification" than the wholesale beer licence.

By the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869, after reciting the Acts above mentioned, it is enacted that no licence for the sale of beer, cider, or wine, or any of such articles, under any of such Acts, shall be granted except after the production of a certificate of justices, and no certificate for the sale of beer, cider, or wine, not to be drunk on the premises, "shall be refused" except upon one or more of four grounds, the fourth ground being that the applicant "is not duly qualified as by law required."

M., holding a strong beer dealer's licence, but not being resident upon the premises in respect of which he applied to be licensed, and not intending to reside there, applied for a licence to sell beer, wine, and spirits, not to be drunk on the premises. The justices refused the application, upon the ground that M. was disqualified by non-residence.

Held, that M. was not so disqualified, and a mandamus to the justices to hear and determine his application made absolute.

This was a rule for a mandamus to the justices for the county of Glamorganshire, commanding them to hold an adjourned sessions for the purpose of hearing and determining the application of William Morris for licences or certificates to hold additional Excise licences to sell beer, wine, and spirits by retail, not to be drunk on the premises.

From affidavits filed by the applicant and his solicitor, it appeared that the applicant was the holder of a wholesale spirit dealer's licence, and also of a strong beer dealer's licence from the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, that the notices required by the Licensing Act had been duly given, and that evidence of the applicant's good character and of the rateable value of the shop in which the liquor was intended to be sold was produced before the justices, and that the justices had expressed themselves satisfied with such evidence.

The notices were of the intention of the applicant to apply for licences, as follows :

A licence or certificate to hold an additional excise licence to sell by retail at a shop situate and being No. 63, Oxford-street, Mountain Ash, beer, to be consumed off the premises, in pursuance of the Act 26 & 27 Vict. c. 33, s. 1. . . . A licence or certificate to hold an additional excise licence to sell by retail, at the same shop, spirits, to be consumed off the premises, in pursuance of the Act 24 & 25 Vict. c. 21, s. 2. . . . A licence or certificate to hold an excise licence to sell by retail, at the same shop, wine, to be consumed off the premises, pursuant to the Act 23 Vict. c. 27, s. 3, and Acts amending the same. (a)

The affidavit of the applicant did not state that he was the holder of a wine dealer's wholesale licence.

The licensing justices, having taken time to consider, refused the application, and the chairman stated that they did so solely on the ground that it was not the intention of the applicant to reside upon the premises or personally conduct the business on the premises. They further intimated their opinion that the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869 contemplated and intended that the person

(a) If the wholesale spirit licence, or wholesale wine licence, as the case may be, have been taken out by the applicant, and if the premises on which the spirits or wine, as the case may be, are intended to be sold, are occupied and used exclusively for the sale therein of intoxicating liquors, and have no communication with the premises of, nor are in any way occupied by a person who is carrying on any other trade or business, the consent of the justices is not required: (Licensing Act 1872, 35 & 36 Vict. c. 94. ss. 68, 73.) If the premises are occupied otherwise, the consent of the justices is required, but it may not be refused except on one or more of the grounds on which a certificate to sell beer, to be drunk off the premises, may be refused (ib. s. 69). The licences to sell spirits, to be drunk off the premises is grantable only to the holder of the wholesale spirit licence, or of the general public-house licence under the Licensing Act of 1828. The licence to sell wine, to be drunk off the premises, would seem to be tenable only by a person either holding the wine dealer's licence, or "keeping a shop for the sale of any goods or commodities other than foreign wine." (23 Vict. c. 23. s. 3.)

to whom a licence should be granted should reside upon the premises and personally conduct the sale of beer, wine, and spirits under the licence; that the grounds of objection enumerated in the 8th section of the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869 were all of a personal nature, and that therefore a licence could only be granted to a person who intended personally to conduct the business. Upon that ground only the applications were refused.

The 8th section of the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 27), is as follows :

All the provisions of the said Act of the ninth year of the reign of King George the Fourth (a) as to the terms upon which and the manner in which, and the persons by whom grants of licences are to be made by the justices at the said general annual licensing meeting, and as to appeal from any act of any justice shall, so far as may be, have effect with regard to grants of certificates under this Act subject to this qualification, that no application for a certificate under this Act, in respect of a licence to sell by retail beer, cider, or wine, not to be consumed on the premises, shall be refused, except upon or more of the following grounds, viz. :—

- (1) That the applicant has failed to produce satisfactory evidence of good character ;
- (2) That the house or shop in respect of which a licence is sought, or any adjacent house or shop owned or occupied by the person applying for a licence, is of a disorderly character, or frequented by thieves, prostitutes, or persons of bad character ;
- (3) That the applicant, having previously held a licence for the sale of wine, spirits, beer, or cider, the same has been forfeited for his misconduct, or that he has, through misconduct, been at any time previously adjudged disqualified from receiving any such licence, or from selling any of the said articles ;
- (4) That the applicant, or the house in respect of which he applies, is not duly qualified as by law is required.

Where an application for any such last-mentioned certificates is refused, on the ground that the house in respect of which he applies is not duly qualified as by law is required, the justices shall specify in writing to the applicant the grounds of their decision.

B. T. Williams, Q.C., for the justices, now showed cause.—By 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61, after reciting 11 Geo. 2 and 1 Will. 4, c. 64, and 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 85, it is enacted that no licence to sell beer or cider by retail, under the recited Acts or that Act, "shall be granted to any person who shall not be the real resident holder and occupier of the dwelling house in which he shall apply to be licensed." [BLACKBURN, J.—In a case where that Act applies, the justices would seem to be right, but the Wine and Beerhouse Act does not say "duly qualified," as by 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61, required, but "duly qualified as by law required."] It is submitted that residence has always been an essential qualification by law for the holding of a licence, otherwise a person may obtain a licence for as many houses as he pleases, and put a manager in each. [COCKBURN, C.J.—I entirely concur in the policy of a law which should require residence, and thus fix the licence holder with a personal responsibility, but the question is, whether the Legislature has steadily adhered to this policy. The qualification, if any, must be sought for in the Acts antecedent to the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869.]

Poland, for the applicant, supported the rule.—It is admitted that for the sale of beer to be drunk on the premises residence is a necessary qualification, and that the Act 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61 applies to such a case, but for the sale of beer to be drunk off the premises, no such qualification is necessary in cases where the applicant is fortified with a wholesale beer dealer's licence, under 26 & 27 Vict. c. 33, s. 1(a), as the present applicant was, nor is residence necessary in order to be able to sell spirits to be drunk off the premises. The only qualification is the possession of a spirit dealer's wholesale licence, and this licence also the applicant had already taken out.

THE GASLIGHT AND COKE COMPANY (apps) v. MEADE (resp.).

Gas rate, arrears of—Whether incoming tenant liable to pay—35 & 36 Vict. c. xliii.—Metropolis Gas Act 1860, and Gasworks Clauses Acts 1847, 1871.

By the Gaslight and Coke Company's Act 1872, in case a consumer of gas leave the premises without paying the rates due for gas supplied to him, the company shall not require payment of the arrears from the incoming tenant unless he shall have agreed with the defaulting consumer to pay the arrears, or unless the incoming tenant shall continue the trade of the outgoing one and pay him or the owner a consideration for so doing.

The respondent having taken over a public-house from M., who was in debt to the appellants for gas supplied, was summoned by the appellants for nonpayment of the arrears.

Held, upon a case stated under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, that the Act of 1872 gave no positive power to require payment of the arrears from the respondent, and that the appellants could not recover them from him.

THIS was a case stated under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, by the Stipendiary Magistrate for the District of Westminster.

The complaint of the appellants was, that the respondent did unlawfully neglect upon demand to pay to the appellants the sum of 16l. 3s. 9d. for gas supplied to one Henry Murray, a consumer, who had left the premises known as the Crown Public-house, where such gas was supplied to the said Henry Murray without having paid to the said appellants the said sum for the said rate and meter rent due from him, the respondent being the incoming tenant and continuing the trade of the outgoing tenant, and having paid the said Henry Murray a consideration for so doing.

All material facts were proved in favour of the appellants, but the magistrate dismissed the complaint, subject to the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench upon a case, from which it appeared that the ground of the magistrate's decision was that the consideration money mentioned in the complaint was not in fact received by the said Henry Murray, but was with the consent of the said Henry Murray received by Messrs. Whitbread as mortgagees of the said public-house, and applied by them in discharge of a mortgage they held on the premises, and also of a debt due to them for beer supplied and for rent, the balance being paid over to a firm of distillers who were second mortgagees of the lease.

Upon these facts the magistrate was of opinion that he was "exactly in the same position as a Superior Court with regard to an equitable jurisdiction, and although it was true a maxim of law applied, namely, that the deed executed between the respondent and Murray could not be disputed, still there had been no consideration as was necessary to carry out the 18th section of the Gaslight and Coke Company's Act 1872, relied on by the appellants, and that as the Judges of the County Courts or Superior Courts would have the power to exercise an equitable jurisdiction, he (the magistrate) considered himself as placed in the same position, and applying equitable principles to the case, gave judgment for the respondent."

The question for the opinion of this court was, whether the appellants were entitled to an order, as prayed for in their summons, i.e., that the respondent should pay to the appellants the said sum of 16l. 3s. 9d. If the appellants were entitled to such order, the determination of the magistrate was to be reversed, otherwise not.

The said 18th section is as follows:

In case any consumer leave the premises where gas was supplied to him without paying to the company the rate or meter rent due from him, the company shall not require from the next tenant of the premises payment of the arrears so left unpaid, unless the incoming tenant agreed with the defaulting consumer to pay the arrears, or unless the incoming tenant shall continue the trade or business of the outgoing tenant, and shall have paid to the owner, lessee, or mortgagee in possession, or to the outgoing tenant of such premises, a consideration for so doing; but the company shall, notwithstanding any such arrears in the absence of collusion between the outgoing and incoming tenant, supply gas to the incoming tenant, as required by this Act, on being required by him to do so. (a)

The principal Act of the company was the Gaslight and Coke Company's Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. cap. cvi.), which incorporated the Gasworks Clauses Act 1847, with which latter Act the Gasworks Clauses Act 1871 is to be read as one.

Willis and R. S. Wright, for the appellant, referred to

10 Vict. c. 15 (Gasworks Clauses Act 1847), s. 16;
23 & 24 Vict. c. 125 (Metropolis Gas Act 1860), s. 39;
34 & 34 Vict. c. 41 (Gasworks Clauses Act 1871), s. 39.

but none of these enactments contained a positive provision for the recovery of arrears of gas rate or rent of meter from an incoming tenant.

R. T. Reid, for the respondent, was not called upon to argue.

BLACKBURN, J.—The judgment of the court must be for the respondent, but not upon the ground upon which the magistrate proceeded, which I must say I fail to understand. However, we cannot send the case back, because the magistrate proceeded on a wrong ground. It was for the appellants to show affirmatively that the incoming tenant is liable for the arrears of the outgoing one, and they have not shown it.

LORT (app.) v. HUTTON (resp.).

[Q.B. Div.]

Monday, Jan. 17, 1876.

LORT (app.) v. HUTTON (resp.)

Articles of the peace, exhibition of—Evidence tendered by exhibites, whether admissible.Where articles of the peace are exhibited, the question for the justices is, whether or not they believe the exhibitor on his oath, and neither the evidence of the exhibitee himself nor witnesses tendered on his behalf may be heard to contradict the exhibitor.

THIS was a case stated, under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, by the justices of the peace for the borough of Shrewsbury, and the following are the material parts of such case:

At a petty sessions held at Shrewsbury, a complaint preferred by William Hutton, gentleman (hereinafter called the respondent), against William Lort, gentleman (hereinafter called the appellant), charging that the appellant had made use of divers threats towards the respondent, whereby he feared that the appellant would do him some bodily injury, and therefore praying that the appellant might be bound in a recognizance, with sureties, to keep the peace towards him, was heard and determined by four justices of the peace for the borough, in the presence of the said parties.

Upon such hearing the appellant was ordered to enter into his own recognizance, in the sum of 50*l.*, to keep the peace towards the respondent for six months.

The respondent on his oath said that the appellant had made use of threats towards him on the day named in the complaint, and swore that from such threats he was in bodily fear of the appellant, and that he did not ask for sureties of the peace against the appellant from malice or vexation.

No evidence was offered by the respondent to corroborate his statement as to the appellant having threatened him, but only as to the appellant having called him (the respondent) a blackguard, and that the respondent appeared more under the influence of fear than of other excitement.

Upon the conclusion of the respondent's case, the appellant, through his solicitor, denied ever having threatened the respondent, or used any signs of violence towards him on the day named in the complaint, and tendered himself as a witness to prove this; and further, to prove that the proceedings were taken by the respondent through malice and vexation, and also to explain portions of the evidence given by the respondent, and to show that the respondent had no just grounds to be in bodily fear of him.

The appellant further tendered one John Cook as a witness on his behalf, to prove that he was present on the day named in the complaint and heard no such threats as alleged by the respondent, and did not see the appellant exhibit any such conduct as to give the respondent grounds for being in bodily fear of him.

The justices being of opinion that the appellant was not a competent witness in the proceedings, inasmuch as the complaint made was not under any statute enabling him to be so, refused to allow the appellant to give evidence.

The justices were also of opinion (and in coming to such opinion they were influenced by former decisions of the Superior Courts), that a person demanding sureties of the peace swears only to his own apprehensions, of which no other person can form an adequate judgment; and also, considering the deduction made by the judges in many cases, that as a general rule articles of the peace cannot be resisted on any ground except by showing direct evidence of express malice, and, moreover, that wherever particular facts of violence are stated by the complainant, it is not permitted for the defendant to controvert them, but that they must be taken to be true till negatived through the medium of an appropriate prosecution, thus came to the conclusion that they could not legally hear the evidence of the witness John Cooke, tendered by the appellant, and consequently rejected him. And bearing in mind the dictum of the authorities, that where a person has just cause to fear that another will do him some bodily harm, he may demand the surety of the peace against him, and that every justice of the peace is bound to grant it, upon the party making oath before him that he is under such fear, and that he has just cause to be so, and that he does not require it out of malice or vexation, they came to the conclusion that, inasmuch as the respondent had sworn to the facts as stated in the complaint, and as they had no reason to doubt his testimony, he was entitled to the surety of the peace against the appellant. The justices, therefore, ordered the appellant to enter into his own recognizances of 50*l.*, to keep the peace towards the respondent for six months, or, in default, to be imprisoned for such period.

The questions of law for the opinion of the court were: First, whether the justices rightly or wrongly refused to allow the appellant to be sworn, and to give evidence on his own behalf; and, secondly, whether the justices rightly or wrongly rejected the evidence of the man John Cooke, tendered by the appellant.

Rose, for the appellant, argued that the justices were wrong in refusing to hear the appellant, and wrong in refusing to hear the witness tendered on his behalf, and that the evidence tendered for the defence was legally admissible in order to show that the respondent had no just cause for going in fear of the appellant. It must be conceded that it was always a practice of the Court of Queen's Bench to exclude counter affidavits upon an exhibition of articles of the peace, but it is submitted that this is a rule of practice only, and is not binding on an inferior court. The justices may cross-examine, whereas the Superior Court is restricted to the affidavits. [BLACKBURN, J.—That is not so. An issue might be directed, or an oral examination before a master might be ordered.] It is stated in Oke's Magisterial Synopsis, 10th edit., vol. 2, p. 1295, to be the practice to conduct the hearing as on ordinary summary conviction, and for this the author cites

Reg. v. Tregarthen, 5 B. & Ad. 678;

Re Dunn, 10 L. J. 29, Mag. Cas.;

Reg. v. Stanhope, 12 A. & E. 624.

[BLACKBURN, J.—The authorities cited by Mr. Oke do not bear out the proposition.] It must be conceded that they do not, but the practice of examining the defendant would seem to be the more proper one; otherwise there is an infringement of the rule, that a man is entitled to be heard in his own defence. [BLACKBURN, J.—If it were a case of punishment I should be disposed to agree with you; but I do not see that compelling a man to give security is equivalent to a punishment.] There may be cases where it is a great indignity BLACKBURN, J.—The judgment of the court must be for the respondent. The appellant has not been punished, the process against him being only a process to prevent danger. The same rule which applies in the court above must bind the court below, and that rule is, that where it appears on oath that the applicant is in bodily fear, the justices have no alternative but to bind over the other party to keep the peace towards him.

Poor rate—Moorings in the Thames—Derrick, rate-ability of—Thames Conservancy Act (20 & 21 Vict. c. 147).

An exclusive occupation is the foundation of rating, and where the owner of the realty grants permission to erect a substantial erection on the land, though he retains power of terminating such permission at any time, the grantee thereby acquires an exclusive occupation in the soil.

The Conservators of the Thames being owners of the soil and bed of the river, and having statutory powers to give and revoke licences to lay down moorings, granted the plaintiffs permission to lay down moorings for two coal derricks, subject to the conditions (inter alia) that "if at any time it should be found by the conservators inexpedient to permit the mooring to remain," the conservators might under their statutory powers cause them to be removed.

The moorings consisted of four anchors and two stones. Two of the anchors were made with one fluke each, and were such as are generally used for permanent moorings. In laying them down, a hole was dredged out large enough to contain the whole of the anchor, at a depth of seven feet below the bed of the river, the stones were placed in similar holes, the derricks were attached by chain cables, to both anchors and stones, and the holes were then filled up to the level of the river bed with ballast. The moorings thus formed were as firm as moorings could be, and the derricks could only be moved by casting off the cables, and leaving the anchors and stones behind.

Under the statutory powers above-mentioned the conservators could, at any time, by giving one week's notice in writing, require such mooring chains to be removed.

Held (reversing the decision of the Common Pleas), that the derricks were liable to be rated in respect of such moorings.

THIS was an action brought (in pursuance of 9 Geo. 4, c. 43) against the defendant, as clerk to the churchwardens, overseers, and directors of the parish of Greenwich, to recover damages for the unlawful seizure and conversion by such churchwardens, &c. of a ship known by the name of the Atlas, and also for money had and received by them to the plaintiffs' use. The cause came on to be tried before Brett, J., at the sittings in Middlesex, after Hilary Term 1874, when a verdict was found for the plaintiffs for 145*l.*, subject to the opinion of the court, upon a special case, upon the question whether the plaintiffs were occupiers of land in the parish of Greenwich, and liable as such to be rated, or assessed to the relief of the poor.

The case came on to be argued before the Court of Common Pleas on the 26th April 1875, before Lord Coleridge, C.J., Brett, J., and Denman, J., when judgment was given for the plaintiffs, as reported ante Vol. 9, p. 500; 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 797; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 504; 44 L. J. 288, C. P.

The facts of the case are fully set out in the report in the court below; the following were the paragraphs to which the court drew particular attention.

1, 2, 3, 4. The plaintiffs are coal merchants, and by the assessment duly made for the Parish of Greenwich were rated in the sum of 139*l.* as the occupiers of certain lands in the parish, which lands consisted of two moorings in the bed of the River Thames, to which were moored two coal derricks of the plaintiffs.

5. The said coal derricks are large floating hulks, fitted up so as to unload coal from colliers, and reload the same into vessels brought alongside.

9. The derrick Atlas (No. 1) is moored by two single fluke anchors on the side nearest the shore, by two stones on the channel side, and by two stream anchors, one at the head and the other at the stern.

10. Prior to Atlas (No. 1) taking up her position the resolution next following was passed by the conservators of the River Thames, in whom, by virtue of the Thames Conservancy Acts, the soil and bed of the River Thames is vested, and the terms and conditions therein contained were assented to and agreed to by the plaintiff:

Resolved, "That permission be given to Messrs. Cory and Son to lay down moorings (at which they may place derrick hulk) immediately opposite the sluice next eastwards of Angerstein's Wharf, East Greenwich, and 510ft. from the river wall at the said sluice as per plan, the work to be done to the satisfaction of the conservators of the River Thames, and under inspection of the harbour master, and to remain under the following conditions being agreed to and observed by Messrs. Cory, viz., that the accommodation be assessed and the rent paid thereon, that the hulk be not used for the purpose of storing coals, that it be for the general use of the coal trade, that the barges to or from the hulk be in all cases towed by a steam tug to or from the custom house, London; that all vessels leave the hulk immediately after being discharged, and that sailing colliers when discharged be towed away to such part of the river as the harbour master may direct, and in all other respects be worked to the satisfaction of the conservators under the inspection of the harbour master, and with the full understanding on the part of Messrs. Cory that if at any time hereafter it shall be found by the conservators inexpedient to permit the moorings of the derricks hulk to remain in that or any other part of the river, the conservators will, under the powers vested in them by the 91st section of the Thames Conservancy Act cause the same to be removed."

11. Instead of themselves laying down the moorings contemplated by the said resolution, the plaintiffs caused and procured the necessary work to be done by the workmen of the said conservators, and paid the said conservators the whole of the costs and charges of the materials and labours expended in and about the same.

12. The moorings as actually laid down for Atlas (No. 1) consist of four anchors and two stones. Of the anchors, two are small and of little importance, and it is not contended on the part of the defendants that any liability to be rated in respect of the soil occupied by them attaches to the plaintiffs. But the other two anchors are made with only one fluke each, and are such as are never used as anchors on board ship, but are only used for permanent moorings. Anchors with one fluke could not be trusted to take the ground when dropped in the ordinary way. In laying down each of these anchors a hole was dredged out large enough to contain the whole of the anchor and to a depth between 7ft. and 8ft. below the bed of the river, with ballast which lies all round and over the anchor, through which the chain cable is led up to the derrick.

13. The two stones used are each of them about 7ft. long by 5ft. wide and 3ft. thick. In order to put each of these in their places, a hole was dredged large enough to contain the stone, and about 7ft. deep. The stone was then let down into the hole, then filled up to the level of the bed of the river with ballast. There is about 4ft. thickness of ballast on each stone, and about seventy tons of ballast are used; in each hole a chain cable is led up through the ballast to the derrick. The moorings formed by these two anchors and stones, are as firm moorings as it is possible to place in the river. It is quite impossible that the derrick using them can weigh them in the ordinary way in which ships weigh anchor; if the derrick had to be moved it could only be by casting off the cables and leaving these anchors and stones behind.

17. The rent paid by the plaintiffs is 600l. per annum for the moorings of Atlas (No. 1), and 650l. for those of the other derrick Atlas (No. 2).

The following sections of the Thames Conservancy Act 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 147) was made part of the case; were referred to in the argument, and were material to the case. By sect. 58 the consideration for any license or permission which may be granted by the conservators . . . for the erection of any wharf or quay . . . or for laying down any mooring chains . . . shall be such as in the judgment of some competent person shall be deemed to be the value thereof to the person obtaining such licence. Sects. 80 and 82 gave the harbour master power to regulate the movements of vessels, and to remove any vessel; by sect. 90 the conservators might purchase private mooring chains; by sect. 91 "No mooring chains shall be put down or placed in any part of the river without the permission of the conservators previously obtained, and every such mooring chain which shall be put down or placed, shall be so continued only during the pleasure of the conservators; and, the conservators may, at any time by giving one week's notice in writing, require such mooring chains to be removed; and in case default shall be made in such removal, beyond the time to be mentioned in such notice, such mooring chain shall be treated by the conservators as a nuisance and removed accordingly." By sect. 105 works are to be approved of by the Admiralty. The estate of the Crown in the soil and bed of the river, within the flux and reflux of the tide, was agreed to be conveyed to the conservators by articles of agreement, set forth in the preamble to the Act.

Barrow, for the defendants, the appellants.—First, as to the rateability of the things themselves. The whole current of decisions is to the effect, that the owners of such apparatus as gas pipes, telegraph posts, water pipes and such like, take possession of and occupy the soil and are rateable. Where a grantor erects works on the land, and grants the use of them, there may or may not be a rateable occupation in the grantee, but where there is a grant under which the grantee puts his materials into the soil, by this he takes possession and becomes rateable. In very early times the question has been whether there has been an easement. R. v. Mayor, Alderman, and Citizens of Bath (14 East. 609); R. v. Brighton Gas and Coke Company (5 B. & C. 466) per Bailey, J. Lord Coleridge in the court below says "the conservators could not, and do not by that resolution profess to grant to the plaintiffs the exclusive occupation of so much of the bed of the river as is occupied by these moorings; and the words of the resolution are abundantly satisfied by holding it to be a mere licence to place and use the moorings during the pleasure of the conservators"; but here the plaintiffs have made these substantial moorings, and if what they have done amounts to an occupation of the soil, no matter how they got it, it is a rateable occupation. In all these cases it is the rated company which puts the materials into the soil.

MELLISH, L.J.—It becomes a question whether the grantor has given an easement or possession.] The grantee gets a right to go and put materials there, which the man who gave the right could not go and take away, except under certain terms. [JAMES, L.J.—If the conservators had gone and removed these moorings without a week's notice, would an action of trespass lie? Yes it would. The court below said, that by the terms of the Thames Conservancy Act, the conservators had no right to make a grant which would give up the occupation of the soil. [JAMES, L.J.—The object of the Act was to utilize the bed of the river.] Lastly, the power of the conservators to remove if they chose, would constitute a tenancy at will, and this is answered by the case of Chelsea Waterworks Company v. Bowley (17 Q. B. 358); Dyson v. Collick (5 B. & Ald. 600). In the cases of Grant v. Oxford Local Board (L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 9; 38 L. J., Mag. Cas. 39; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 378); *Allan v. S. 835), the persons appealing were held not to be rateable, as they only had an easement in the matter, but in none of those cases had they erected the building themselves.

Patchett, for the plaintiffs, the respondents.—The stones laid in the middle of the river are principally for anchorage, and the defendants are seeking to rate anchors. The soil is that of a navigable river which prima facie is in the Crown. [JAMES, L.J.—The phrase that the Crown is in possession as trustee for the public is entirely inaccurate.] The occupation has not passed out of the conservators. [MELLISH, L.J.—Is it not a general proposition that where the owner of the soil permits another to make a substantial erection on it, although the freeholder can at any time revoke his license, yet until he does so, the occupation with regard to the erection is in the person who made it?] The construction of a similar licence was considered in Cory v. Churchwardens of Greenwich (L. Rep. 7 C. P. 499; 91 L. J. 39, Mag. Cas.; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 150). Sects. 80, 82 of the Act show the power of the harbour master to control the navigation and to remove vessels; sect. 91 the power of the conservators to remove these moorings at their pleasure. The cases of gas pipes, water pipes, and telegraph posts are cases where the materials have been laid down under the powers of an Act of Parliament. [BLACKBURN, J.—Not so in the case of Reg. v. Chelsea Waterworks Company.] It has been endeavoured to rate floating docks, Reg. v. Morrison (1 E. & B. 150). To render the plaintiffs rateable here there must be a parting by the conservators, with the exclusive possession of the soil to them, Allan v. Overseers of Liverpool (ubi sup.); London and North-Western Railway Company v. Overseers of Liverpool (ubi sup.). By sect. 105 of the Act the conservators are in the position of the Crown, and it is the intention of the statute that the possession should not pass out of the conservators; they had the power to go down and remove the ballast. There is no occupation in the plaintiffs because the owner of the soil did not intend to part with the possession. Upon this document the conservators did not intend nor did they part with the possession of the soil.

JAMES, L.J.—I am unable in this case to agree with the conclusion at which the Court of Common Pleas has arrived. There is no doubt as to the law in these questions, and the authorities show that where part of the soil is permanently occupied, as in the case of water pipes, gas pipes, sewers, and telegraph posts, there the persons owning the property have the occupation in the soil for those purposes and are rateable as such; if on the other hand the property is not occupied by them, but is occupied by some other person, who has only got the right to use the property, as in the case of a lodger or customer, there the property is not rateable in the hands of the occupier. The question, therefore, turns upon the facts stated in the case, and depends upon what the right is, which the conservators under and by virtue of the Thames Conservancy Act, have given to the plaintiffs. Under this Act the conservators are owners of the soil and bed of the River Thames, it is, indeed, the property of Her Majesty subject to the rights conferred on the conservators by this Act, and they have the power of raising funds for the benefit of Her Majesty; they also have power to interfere with the position of vessels in order to regulate the navigation of the river. As owners of the soil, by reason of their estate, they have power to grant a number of things, such as wharfs and floating piers to be built on the river, and power to permit anyone to lay down mooring chains in the bed of the river. Having that power, they have granted to Messrs. Cory permission to lay down mooring chains, and make a permanent erection on the bed of the river, and, in order to do this, to dredge out a hole, in which a large stone is placed to which mooring chains are affixed, and then the remainder of the hole being filled up with ballast, an imposing structure is made composed of cable, stone, ballast, &c.—a licence to Messrs. Cory which would amount in substance to a licence to build a house. Having given such a licence, the plaintiffs have the erection completed at their own expense, and forthwith enter into such an occupation of the land as anyone would to whom the freeholder had given permission to erect some building, such as a wall, on the soil; a right, whether it was a licence to have permanent possession of the soil or not, that terminates the case. Such is the settled law with regard to the owners of gas pipes, water pipes, &c., but we are told to put a different construction on this occupation, because by one week's notice the conservators have power to terminate it, by requiring the mooring chains to be removed; and in case default should be made in such removal beyond the time to be mentioned in the notice, such mooring chain is to be treated by the conservators as a nuisance, and removed accordingly; but that, to my mind, strengthens the defendant's case, because it shows that for one week the plaintiffs have complete possession, and if during that week the conservators did anything wrong, such as moving the chains, they would be trespassers and could be treated as such. I am, therefore, of opinion that the defendants are rateable and that the decision of the Court of Common Pleas should be reversed.

MELLISH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The first question is whether these mooring places have become part of the realty. The ordinary anchor does not become part of the realty, because being thrown overboard and hauled up at pleasure it is part of the ship; although while overboard it moors the vessel, yet it is not put down in the way in which these stones are put down. The Court of Common Pleas have thought this was a temporary mooring for keeping the vessel in her position, such as an anchor would be; but having regard to the description of the mooring, the holes, the stones and the ballast, it is impossible to come to the same conclusion. This brings us to the second question—Whether the conservators or Messrs. Cory are in the occupation? It appears to me that the anchors, the stones, the ballast, and the chains remain the property of Messrs. Cory, and the conservators have the power to order their removal. There is a plain distinction between this and the cases referred to on behalf of the plaintiffs. Nice distinctions often arise as to whether the person obtaining possession does so, as lodger or tenant, in both cases both parties would have the occupation, and it is necessary to see what degree of control is exercised over the property by the landlord. The conservators do not claim any property in these anchors, and the case becomes undistinguishable from the cases of occupation by means of gas pipes, water pipes, telegraph posts, &c., and other cases, where one person who is owner of the soil gives permission to another to make erections on the soil, giving him, in fact, an exclusive benefit in that part which is taken up by the erections, and there the person to whom permission is granted is occupier. In the case of telegraph posts, as long as the posts remain, the telegraph company have an exclusive occupation in them, and it would be the same in the case of tramroads; and therefore I am of opinion that Messrs. Cory were in occupation of the land and consequently liable to be rated.

BAGGALLAY, J.A.—I am of the same opinion. There is no question as to the principle in these cases, and the principle which has been decided by a long series of cases, of which one of the oldest is the case of Reg. v. Mayor, Alderman, and Citizens of Bath, referred to in the argument is, that an exclusive occupation is the foundation of rating. From the facts of this case, which I need not go through again, it appears to me that the exclusive occupation of these moorings was in Messrs. Cory. Of all the cases cited that of the telegraph posts seems the most in point, and though, sitting here as a court of appeal we are not bound by that decision and it is open to us to consider it, we do not think it necessary to do so.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. Considering the manner in which these mooring places were fixed, I differ from the Court of Common Pleas in the conclusion at which they have arrived, as to who was the occupier of the land in them. The Common Pleas thought under the circumstances of this case that Messrs. Cory were not occupiers: upon that I differ. I will not go into the distinctions between what constitutes an occupation and what does not, more than by referring to the two cases of Smith v. Overseers of St. Michael Cambridge and Roades v. Overseers of Trumpington to which I referred in the argument, and those distinctions are sufficiently explained. In the first case, that of Smith's, which was the post office case, the appellant rented a house at Cambridge and let off five rooms to the post office; in the judgment of Sir Hugh Hill which he and I prepared together, it was held, that although the agreement to let these rooms amounted to a demise, yet that the real facts must be inquired into, and that although Smith let off these rooms at a rent, yet that from the facts it was apparent that he retained the possession of the rooms, and therefore was rateable as the occupier of the whole property. The other case, which was a coprolite case, was exactly the converse, for there, although in the agreement to dig for the coprolites no express words giving a right to the exclusive occupation of the land, were used, yet, in fact, the person obtaining the right to dig, had the right of the exclusive occupation of the land, and was, therefore, liable to be rated in respect of such occupation. Lord Coleridge in his judgment in the court below thought that the conservators could not be parting with the possession of this part of the soil of the river, because it would be in violation of their duty to do so. Brett, J. thought that the duty imposed by the Act of Parliament on the conservators, was to retain in their hands absolute power and control over every part of the river. I cannot find this in the Act or in the case; the terms of the licence amount to a permission to Messrs. Cory to lay down moorings to the satisfaction of the conservators, and under the inspection of the harbour master, on which they are to pay rent, and with the full understanding on the part of Messrs. Cory, that if at any time thereafter it should be found by the conservators inexpedient to permit the moorings of the derrick hulks to remain in that or any other part of the river, the conservators would, under the powers vested in them by the 91st section of the Thames Conservancy Act, cause the same to be removed. By the terms of the 91st section of the Thames Conservancy Act "the conservators may, at any time, by giving one week's notice in writing require the mooring chains to be removed," but until this notice has been given and has expired the moorings remain in the possession of Messrs. Cory, and without a week's notice the conservators would, if they interfered with Messrs. Cory's possession, lay themselves upon to an action of trespass. The Court of Common Pleas have assumed what the Act does not bear out, viz., that the conservators had no authority to part with the exclusive occupation of the bed of the river. If the conservators, by virtue of the express powers given to them, have given permission to Messrs. Cory to put down moorings and occupy them subject to a week's notice, I can come to no other conclusion but that Messrs. Cory are in occupation of these moorings, and that for that privilege they are liable to be rated.

Barrow applied for costs.

ETHERINGTON v. WILSON.

Charity—Christ's Hospital—Election of scholar—Qualification—"Parishioner."

A scheme sanctioned by the Court of Chancery for a charity entitling the minister, churchwardens, and parishioners of a parish, to elect children for Christ's Hospital, provided that no child should be considered eligible to partake of the benefits of the charity unless he or she should have been born in, or unless his or her parents or one of them should be or should have been parishioners or a parishioner of the parish. Prior to an election to fill a vacancy under this charity, the father of a candidate, in order to qualify his son, took a house in the parish for three months, with an option of continuing his tenancy at a rent of 30s. per month, paid a month's rent, paid the rates payable in respect of the house (before they were demanded), and had his name inserted in the rate book, but he did not reside in the parish, nor did he put any furniture in the house, or sleep there till after his son had been elected:

Held (reversing the decision of Malins, V.C.), that the father was a "parishioner" within the meaning of the scheme, and that the fact of his acquiring the qualification of a parishioner with a view to the election did not invalidate his son's election.

[CT. OF APP.]

ETHERINGTON v. WILSON.

[CT. OF APP.]

THIS was an appeal from a decision of Malins, V.C. The hearing in the court below is reported ante, vol. ix., p. 521; 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 789; L. Rep. 20 Eq. 606, where the facts of the case are fully reported.

The Vice-Chancellor held that the defendant, Henry Arthur Wilson, was not duly elected a scholar of Christ's Hospital, on the foundation of West's Charity, on the ground that his father was not a bonâ fide parishioner of the parish of Twickenham.

From this decision the vicar and churchwardens of Twickenham appealed.

J. Pearson, Q.C. and W. Phillimore, for the appellants.—The election was good, there being nothing in the scheme to render ineligible the child of a man who has acquired the qualification of a parishioner in order to make his child eligible. The legal meaning of the word "parishioner" is well settled. In the Attorney-General v. Parker (3 Aik. 576), it was thus defined: "The word 'parishioner' is a very large word, and takes in not only inhabitants of a parish, but persons who are occupiers of lands that pay the several rates and duties, though they are not resident." Residence, therefore, is not necessary to make one a parishioner. In Jeffrey's case (5 Rep. 66 b.), it was held that the occupier of lands, though living out of the parish, is, in the judgment of law, a parishioner, and may come to the assemblies of parishioners. By 58 Geo. 3, c. 69, and 59 Geo. 3, c. 85, it is provided that all inhabitants rated to the relief of the poor, whether resident inhabitants of the parish or not, are entitled to attend parish vestries and vote at them: (Prudeau's Churchwardens' Guide, p. 110.) There is no doubt that the defendant's father is a parishioner within the meaning of that word in the earlier clauses of the scheme. He would clearly be entitled to vote at an election to fill a vacancy in the charity, and there is no reason why a different interpretation should be given to the word "parishioner" in the qualification clause of the scheme. The defendant's father is clearly a "parishioner" in the legal meaning of the word, and his son was, we submit, eligible. The Vice-Chancellor ordered us to pay the costs of the suit. We are entitled to have that order discharged, for there is no ground on which it can be supported. It is the invariable practice in cases of this kind to order the costs to be paid out of the funds of the charity. They also referred to Phillimore's Ecclesiastical Law, p. 1887.

Simmons, for the defendant, Henry Arthur Wilson.

Freeing, for the governors of Christ's Hospital. Glasse, Q.C. and Rawlins, for the plaintiff.—To be a parishioner one need not, it is true, be a resident in the parish, but a casual sojourner cannot be a parishioner (Steer's Parish Law, 3rd edit. p. 21). And it is evident this scheme was intended for the benefit of the bonâ fide residents in the parish, and not for any one who merely sought to qualify his son for election by taking a house at a trifling rent and becoming a non-resident occupier.

Without calling for a reply,

JAMES, L.J., said.—I am unable at all to concur in the judgment and decision of the Vice-Chancellor in this case. There is a certain charity regulated by a scheme of this court, and according to that scheme the parish of Twickenham, that is to say, the minister, churchwardens, and parishioners for the parish in vestry assembled, have a right to present for admission to Christ's Hospital a child of a certain lineage, being the child of a father or mother who is or has been a parishioner of the parish of Twickenham, the qualification of course being intended for the benefit of the parish of Twickenham. There was a child, the defendant Wilson, who was of the prescribed lineage, and whose father was minded to complete the qualification for his child by making himself a parishioner of the parish of Twickenham, as he knew that the turn of that parish was very soon coming to present a child. He, being minded to acquire this qualification, proceeds to find out a vacant house in Twickenham, where there happened to be a vacant house. He goes to the landlord of that house, and bargains with him to take the house for three months, and thenceforward from month to month. It is not pretended that the landlord of the house had any object whatever but to find a tenant for the house and get rent for it. The father of the child enters into a valid binding contract to take the house and to pay the rent, and having done that, he, by way of further securing his qualification, causes his name to be entered on the rate book of the parish, and pays a portion of the rate which was then current. That being so, he was, as it appears to me, in point of law a parishioner, and in point of law he had acquired the qualification which was prescribed by the scheme. The child thereupon does obtain from the minister, churchwardens, and parishioners, in vestry assembled, the majority of the votes of the electors, and was thereupon by the vicar and churchwardens presented or nominated to the proper authorities of Christ's Hospital, upon which this bill was filed. Now, the Vice-Chancellor was of opinion that that election was to be set aside, and that the child was to be deprived of the benefit which he had received from the electors of the parish of Twickenham, and he declared that another boy who had not obtained the majority ought to have been declared duly elected, and was entitled to the benefit of the charity. The Vice-Chancellor does not appear to me to have denied that in point of law, and for every other purpose whatever, either at common law or under any Act of Parliament, the father of the child was a parishioner of the parish of Twickenham; but, admitting that he was a parishioner under an Act of Parliament or under the common law, he came to the conclusion that he was not a parishioner within the meaning of this scheme. Now I am not aware that there is any different interpretation of the word "parishioner" in this scheme from what it would have in any other legal document, but, unfortunately for the purpose, as it seems to me, the Vice-Chancellor imported into the consideration of the scheme his own knowledge of what were or would have been his intentions when he framed the scheme, if his attention had been called to what might have been done under it, which does not appear to me to be a legitimate subject, either for the Vice-Chancellor himself or for any other Vice-Chancellor of this court. He proceeded then upon the ground that the father of the child was not a bonâ fide householder and parishioner, but that his qualification as a parishioner was colourable. Now, I cannot help thinking that the fallacy of the Vice-Chancellor's judgment arose from the use of those words "colourable" and "bonâ fide." Of course, if the father of the child never did become the occupier of the house, if he never did enter into a contract to take and never did take the house, but only got somebody to put his name over the door, or anything of that kind, then it would have been colourable, and it would have been a sham thing, and in that case he would never have been a parishioner; but if he was really a parishioner in point of law, then the thing is not colourable, is not fictitious, is not malá fide. The meaning of the words "colourable" and bond fide in the Vice-Chancellor's judgment appears to me to be this: that a man is not entitled to be considered qualified under this scheme if he expressly, avowedly, and exclusively obtains the qualification for that purpose, and for that purpose only, without any other intention of establishing a permanent connection with the parish. I am of opinion that no court of law or equity has a right to attach any such condition or modification to the qualification of the scheme. If the law entitles a man to be qualified, he is qualified, and if it is intended to put any restriction upon that qualification, that restriction must be put by special enactment, or by a special provision in the scheme or other document. Of course it is familiar to us all that men constantly acquire qualifications for voting in counties. A man goes and buys a 40s. freehold for the sole purpose, the undisguised purpose, of giving himself a vote in a county with which he does not mean to have and has no other connection whatever. I might put a great number of other cases in which the law has prescribed qualifications. A man has a right to give himself a qualification if he can. If he does so, then he is qualified, and there is no equity to deprive a man of that qualification which the law entitles him to get. I am of opinion, therefore, that the Vice-Chancellor's declaration and decision were wrong in this case, and I must say I read with some surprise the order upon the vicar and churchwardens to pay the costs of the proceedings. The vicar and churchwardens were made parties merely in their representative character, as being the three parishioners who were best fitted to represent the whole body of parishioners who had an interest in this scheme; they seem to have done nothing whatever beyond presiding at this election, and have done their duty according to the best definition they could give to it, and accepted the child of a person who was a parishioner, and that they should under those circumstances be fixed with costs seems to me to be somewhat singular: I am bound, therefore, to say that if this had been an appeal merely for costs by these gentlemen, it is one of those cases in which the appeal would have been entertained. I am of opinion that the decree of the Vice-Chancellor must be discharged, and that in lieu thereof the bill of the plaintiff must be dismissed with costs as against the next friend.

MELLISH, L. J.—I am of the same opinion. The only question to be determined is whether Henry Wilson, the father of H. A. Wilson, the boy, was on the day of the election, which, I think, was the 31st Dec. 1874, a parishioner of the parish of Twickenham. Now I am of opinion that in interpreting this scheme, we must interpret just as we should interpret any other legal document, or Act of Parliament, or deed constituting a charity, and so interpreting it, I see no reason why we should not put the same construction on the word "parishioner" in this scheme as was given by Lord Hardwicke in the case of the Attorney-General v. Parker (3 Atk. 576), where he says: "Parishioner is a very large word, and takes in not only inhabitants of the parish, but persons who are occupiers of lands, that pay the several rates and duties, although they are not resident, nor contribute to the ornaments of the church." Therefore, according to that definition, the question is, was Henry Wilson on the 31st Dec. last the occupier of property, and did he pay the several rates and duties in respect of that property? I agree with the argument of Mr. Pearson that, if there was any doubt as to what was the proper interpretation to be put on the word "parishioner" in the clause in question, it would be strong ground for giving it the interpretation he contends for that in the first and second clauses of the scheme the word "parishioner" is unquestionably used in that sense. Then the question is, was Mr. Wilson on the 31st Dec. the occupier of property in the parish of Twickenham, which was liable to be rated? The evidence is that he made an agreement with Stroud, the agent of the landlord, to take a house for a period of three months, and then afterwards from month to month, paying a certain rent. Is there any reason to say that that was not really done? I agree that even although a nominal agreement, or, perhaps, a formal deed had been made making such a lease, yet if it had been proved that there was a secret understanding between Stroud and Wilson that he should not occupy the premises, and that he should not pay any rent, or that if he went in he should go out whenever he was told to go out, and that the whole thing was a scheme adopted merely to make him appear to be an occupier when he was not an occupier, that he would not then have a qualification. There are authorities respecting the qualification of members of Parliament where the existence of a secret trust prevents the person seeking the qualification from being qualified, he not being the real owner; but I cannot see the slightest reason for supposing that Stroud was looking to anything except to get his rent, and Wilson was trying to get a house which apparently there might very likely have been great difficulty in getting, and Stroud wished to get rent for three or four months, if in any way he could get it. He knew very little about Wilson, and might have thought Wilson was not a very responsible person, but he was introduced to him by a person in whom he had confidence, and who told him the rent would be paid. He believed the rent would be paid, and if the rent was paid I do not suppose he cared whether Wilson paid it out of his own money or out of anyone else's. Therefore, he made a bargain, which seems to be a bargain fairly and candidly made. He gives up the key, and Wilson enters formally into possession, having the key. He put some furniture in, and came occasionally day by day. Now I am not aware of any authority for holding that a person who does that, does not become the occupier of the premises so as to be subject to be rated. There may be cases where the landlord, not being able to get a tenant, may be free from the rates because his house continues to be unoccupied, but if a person takes a lease of a house or the tenancy of a house, for the express purpose of becoming the occupier, and takes the key and goes in, I apprehend such person is the occupier, and is liable to be rated. The question whether he is actually rated or not, is immaterial, but, so far, the fact of his being rated confirms the evidence that he was the occupier, and he had actually gone and requested to be rated, and had been put on the rate book. That is made evidence against him that he was the occupier. I am of opinion, therefore, that he did fulfil this qualification, and if he did fulfil the qualification, it appears to me that we really cannot enter into any further question about it, and all we have to do is to say that the qualification which entitled his son to be elected was fulfilled, and therefore, in my opinion, the election of the son was good.

BAGGALLAY, J.A.—I am of the same opinion.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am also of the same opinion. This was clearly to my mind not colourable. That is a word that is properly used when, if the true state of things were known colour would appear, and both parties had agreed that the true state of things should not be known, and that a different colour should be given to them. That is not the case here. I make no doubt but that this man was liable for the rent. There is no pretence for saying that Stroud meant that he should occupy the house without paying rent for it, or that the premises should continue empty until such time as the election took place. Stroud may have had to ask him, but although Wilson's object was to get a qualification for his son, it seems to me that Stroud's object was to get some rent for the premises. There is nothing colourable in it; it is the truth. Then he has a right to occupy the house, and he occupies so much as he thinks fit to occupy; he is subject to be rated, and is rated and pays rates. The result is that he has all the rights, and is subject to all the duties, of a parishioner, except in so far as there may be any statute applicable to this case which might deprive him of that right of voting or might not. But what then? That statute does not unmake him a parishioner, as it were, or make him not a parishioner, but it says, although you are a parishioner, you shall not have a particular right. The question is, whether he is a parishioner, and it appears to me that the statute would rather go to show that he was a parishioner, than that he was not. It is clear to my mind that this man was in some sense a parishioner, and I should say a parishioner in every sense he could be. Now a sort of, I can scarcely call it argument, has been used; but it is said of him that he is not a bonâ fide parishioner. I suppose anybody would have a difficulty in defining the difference between a parishioner and a bonâ fide parishioner. I do not know what difference there is between them. The matter may be tested in this way. Suppose with a view only to one of these elections a man had taken the premises ten years ago, and had occupied and paid rent and rates for them, I suppose he would have been a bonâ fide parishioner then beyond all doubt, and certainly if his occupation had been such as that of Mr. Wilson in this case, who, I believe, there is no doubt took these premises with a view to get a qualification for his son, the mere fact of his occupying them to get a qualification for his son, would not prevent his being a bonâ fide parishioner. Now suppose that instead of that being the case, Wilson had taken these premises without a view to the election, but that the windfall had happened a month after he had taken them, I suppose then there would be no doubt that he would be a bonâ fide parishioner. Therefore it seems to me that he was a bonâ fide parishioner, although his occupation was short, and although his object in taking the premises was to qualify his son. Can the combination of those two things prevent his being a bonâ fide parishioner? Certainly not. It seems to me, therefore, that it is almost a matter of demonstration that this man is a parishioner, and as far as we can attribute any meaning to the expression, is not otherwise than a bonâ fide parishioner. It seems to me, therefore, that he had the requisite qualification, and that his son was duly elected.

Simmons.—On behalf of the boy Wilson, I have to ask the court to make an order that shall put him in the same position as he was in before the bill was filed. At that time he had been presented to Christ's Hospital; he had failed to pass one examination, and was prepared for another examination. Under the Rules of Court 1875, Order 58 rule 5, the Court of Appeal has power to make any order which ought to have been made by the Court of First Instance, and to make any other order it thinks fit which may do full justice. Will your Lordships now make an order declaring that Mr. Wilson's son is entitled to be presented?

JAMES, L.J.—I suppose we must declare that Wilson was duly elected, and dismiss the bill. What we have really decided is that Wilson was duly elected. The form of our order will be: The court being of opinion that the defendant, H. A. Wilson, was duly elected, dismiss the bill with costs.

THE WIMBLETON AND PUTNEY COMMONS
CONSERVATORS v. DIXON.

Right of way—Limited user—Prescription—Excessive user—Right of way over common by undefined track.

The owner of a farm, adjoining a common, and to which access for horses and carriages had been obtained from time immemorial by ancient tracks over the common from one point to another, but by no clearly defined road, sought to erect houses on a portion of his farm, and to use a road which had recently been made in substitution for the ancient tracks over the common, for the purpose of drawing building materials, intending afterwards to use it as a means of access to the houses when built. On the farm there were a farm-house and a cottage, and there was evidence that, in addition to using the ancient tracks for access to the farm for ordinary agricultural purposes, the owner or his predecessors in title had also drawn over the tracks building materials for adding a wing to the farm-house, and for converting a mud hovel into a brick cottage.

On a bill by the conservators of the common to restrain the owner of the farm from drawing over the road made in substitution for the ancient tracks any building materials for the erection of the proposed houses, and from any other excessive user of the road:

Held (affirming the decision of the Master of the Rolls), that the owner of the farm had no right to increase the burden of the servient tenement by changing the character of his property, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to the injunction sought for,

Held, also (differing from the Master of the Rolls) that there may be a good right of way in respect of the ancient tracks over a common from one fixed point to another, although there is no clearly defined road.

Observations on dicta of Lord Abinger, C.B., and Parke, B., in Cowling v. Higginson (4 M. & W. 256.)

Williams v. James (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 664; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 577), approved.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Master of the Rolls.

The facts of the case were as follows:

By the Wimbledon and Putney Commons Act 1871, the plaintiffs were incorporated, and the commons, with the buildings and enclosures within the ambit thereof, and including the new road, which was the road in question in this suit, were vested in the plaintiffs for all the estate and interest therein, which immediately before the passing of the Act was vested in or belonged to Earl Spencer, in whom the fee simple and inheritance of the commons were then vested. And it was by the Act provided that the plaintiffs should at all times keep the commons open, uninclosed and unbuild upon, except as regarded such parts thereof as were at the passing of the Act enclosed or built upon, and should by all lawful means prevent, resist, and abate all encroachments on the commons, and protect the commons and preserve them as open spaces, and resist all proceedings tending to the enclosure or appropriation for any purpose of any part thereof.

At the time of the passing of the Act there were and still are three messuages, with pleasure grounds and appurtenances, called respectively "The Rounds," "Cæsar's Camp," and "The Holmwood," standing on the south side of and adjoining Wimbledon Common, and on the east side of an ancient earthwork of great historical interest, commonly known as Cæsar's Camp, and consisting of a fosse and double bank or vallum nearly circular in form, and enclosing to the edge of the outer bank an area of about fifteen acres. Access to these messuages is obtained by a road on the north side running from a public road called Workhouse Lane across part of the southern side of Wimbledon Common, and connected by two short roads running nearly at right angles therefrom southwards to the entrance gates of the messuages.

The new road was made under the following circumstances: Before the year 1867 the sites of the three messuages, together with Cæsar's Camp and the farm and lands on the west and south sides thereof, respectively called Warren Farm, Shadwell Wood, and Warren Cottage, were the property of Mr. Drax, and access for horses and carriages to the lands which now form the sites of the said messuages, and to Cæsar's Camp, Warren Farm, Shadwell Wood, and Warren Cottage, was obtained by an old private road running from Workhouse Lane at or near the point at which the new road now runs therefrom, to a cottage called Camp Cottage, lying to the north-east of the grounds of The Holmwood, and from a point in the said old private road near Camp Cottage by several ancient tracks across Wimbledon Common, running a little to the south of the new road to the eastern entrance to Cæsar's Camp, and thence across and through the Camp and round the south-east and south sides thereof. Except by means of the old private road and tracks, and the tracks which are presumed to have been replaced by the old private road, so far as it extended, the bill alleged that there was not and never had been, down to the year 1867, any road for horses or carriages across Wimbledon Common to Cæsar's Camp, which is separated from those parts of the common abutting thereon by a post and rail fence, and a ditch; that the old private road and the tracks were never used for horses or carriages except by the occupiers of Camp Cottage, Warren Farm, and Warren Cottage respectively, save that they may occasionally have been so used by persons who visited Cæsar's Camp from curiosity, and that the road and tracks were never used by such occupiers except for their personal access to, and for the agricultural purposes only of the said farm and premises. The area within Cæsar's Camp is, and has always within living memory been, uncultivated.

In or shortly before the year 1867 the defendant became the lessee, from Mr. Drax, of the sites of the messuages called the Rounds, Cæsar's Camp, and Holmwood, which messuages he thereupon erected, and he shortly after entered into negotiations with Earl Spencer, as the then owner of the soil of Wimbledon Common, for the grant of a right of foot, horse, and carriage way from the Workhouse Lane to the sites of the messuages and grounds called the Rounds. No grant of such right of way was ever executed, but the new road, so far as the cross road nearest to Cæsar's Camp, and the said two cross-roads were made by Earl Spencer at his own cost, and were kept in repair by him until the passing of the Wimbledon and Putney Commons Act 1871, and the defendant paid to the Earl until that time the yearly sum of 10*l.* for the use of the said roads, and the defendant and his tenants have since used the said roads for access to the said messuages. The new road has also been used by the occupiers of Warren Farm and Warren Cottage "for their personal access to and for the agricultural purposes only of the said farm and lands," as the bill alleged, "and the user thereof for the several purposes aforesaid, has, so far as the said road extends, been only in substitution for the said ancient tracks across the common, and has been limited to the ancient user of the said tracks."

After the making of the new road the defendant became the lessee from Mr. Drax of Cæsar's Camp and the land lying to the south of it, and in 1872 he erected fences within the area of the Camp, apparently with a view to building thereon, and thereupon the plaintiffs through their clerk wrote to the defendant, giving him notice that they recognised "no right of access to the Camp over Wimbledon Common, except along the existing road or track to the gate of the Camp for the purposes of agricultural occupation only."

The defendant replied that he did intend to build in the Camp, and also to use the road for the purpose of taking building materials on to the ground, and afterwards as the means of access to all houses to be there erected. But he took no further proceedings till 1874, and did not begin to build till April 1875.

Thereupon the plaintiffs filed their bill praying that the defendant, his servants, and agents might be restrained from drawing, or causing to be drawn along the new road leading from Workhouse-lane to the entrance to Cæsar's Camp, or along any part of the new road, any bricks, stone, or other building materials to be used in the erection of houses or other buildings upon Cæsar's Camp or any part thereof, or upon any of the lands now or lately forming part of Warren Farm, and of which the defendant claims to be lessee from Mr. Drax, and from otherwise using the new road as a means of access to the Camp and lands in excess of the user to which the same is liable as a road made in substitution for the ancient tracks across Wimbledon Common.

The defendant's case was that he had a right to use the road for all purposes, and in support of his case he adduced evidence that the ancient tracks over the common had been used for the purpose of drawing building materials on one occasion to add a wing to the farm-house, and on another to turn a mud hovel into a brick cottage; for the purpose of taking away gravel which had been found and dug on the farm, and by persons going to the farm for the purpose of shooting, and by visitors to Cæsar's Camp. It is not necessary to refer at greater length to the evidence which is sufficiently stated in the judgments of the Court of Appeal.

The Master of the Rolls granted an injunction in the terms of the first part of prayer of the bill, with this addition, "except for the ordinary farming purposes of the said Camp and lands respectively."

In delivering his judgment the Master of the Rolls (Jessel), after stating the facts, said: On the first point of whether there was a road there is really no substantial conflict of evidence. Up to 1867 the state of matters was this: There was a place called the Rounds, now generally called or known as Cæsar's Camp, forming a part of Warren Farm. It was a place of great interest to the public, and there was a gate leading to it, which gate had a lock upon it, the key of which was kept by the owner of Warren Farm; and as strangers and others from motives of curiosity were in the habit of visiting the Camp, they used to go down to the farm-house and get the key and go into the Camp. Those strangers of course came in all sorts of vehicles, and they used to turn off from the high road somewhere near the National Schools, and go on to the common. They used to drive their gigs and other vehicles to this gate, and so get into Cæsar's Camp. In addition to this the farmer occupying Warren Farm, if he wanted to go that way, and cart materials or manure or anything, used to drive his carts across the common and through this gate to the Rounds or Cæsar's Camp on to the farm, but beyond that there is no evidence of user at all, and it appears that not only was this a driving over the common, but there was no road at all, but only a series of tracks, which tracks are nothing but cart tracks more visible in winter when every cart, as one of the witnesses told us, made a separate rut and, therefore, a separate track, almost always invisible in summer on account of the ground being hard or more consolidated. Just close to the gate there was more of a road. For about fifteen yards out of the 200 yards, which the gate was distant from the high road, it was more like a road on account of the carts and carriages being driven along a narrower portion, but upon the rest the grass grew between the cart-ruts, and the cart-ruts diverged at some places as much as fifty yards, and at others thirty yards, there being no defined line of road. Therefore it was not a road going from point to point. There is no evidence of any repairs except to this extent, as some of the witnesses said, that they had seen gravel occasionally thrown into the ruts. There was nothing like regular repair, nor anything like a regular road, but simply that sort of track across a common which is not as a rule interfered with either by the owner of the soil in the common, who probably has a right to interfere with it, or by the commoners, who probably have no right to interfere with it, because it does not interfere with their right of common. No one cared about it, and people used to go over it. I am told that that is a proof in law that this amounts to a definite road. I am of opinion that it is no such proof in law, and that the defendant's case must fail on that ground. [His Lordship then examined the evidence as to the user of the road for carrying materials to add a wing to the farm-house, and to turn the mud cottage into a brick cottage, and continued:] That being the state of the evidence, it appears to me that the rule of law that the use of a road to a farm for farming purposes for any number of years, does not give a right to use the road when you have turned the farm into a small town or series of houses, must apply, and, therefore assuming that I have come to the conclusion, which I have not, that the defendants have proved a road up to the gate of the Rounds or Cæsar's Camp, to exist at all, I should still be of opinion that he had not proved his right to use it for the purpose for which he desires to use it. It follows from what I have said that there will be a perpetual injunction.

From this decision the defendant appealed.

Miller, Q.C. and Bush, for the appellant.—We adduce evidence of user of the way, for a variety of purposes, and the inference is that we are entitled to use it for all purposes. [Lord Justice JAMES.—Surely it is settled law that the owner of a dominant tenement cannot change the character of his tenement in such a way as to increase the burden of the servient tenement.—Lord Justice MELLISH referred to Godson v. Richardson, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 142; L. Rep. 9 Ch. 221.] In Cowling v. Higginson (4 M. & W. 256) Lord Abinger, C.B. says: "If a way has been used for several purposes, there may be a ground for inferring that there is a right of way for all purposes." And in the same case Parke, B. says: "If the way is confined to a particular purpose, the jury ought not to extend it, but if it is proved to have been used for a variety of purposes, then they might be warranted in finding a way for all." And in the course of the argument in the same case, observations were made by the judges which are still more strongly in our favour. Lord Abinger C.B. there said (4 M. & W. at page 252): "The extent of the right must depend upon the circumstances. If a road leads through a park, the jury might naturally infer the right to be limited: but if it went over a common, they might infer that it was a way for all purposes." And Parke, B., said during the argument: "If it had been shown that from time immemorial it had been used for all purposes that were required, would not that be evidence of a general right of way?" And further on he answered the question thus: "If they show that they have used it time out of mind for all the purposes that they wanted, it would seem to me to give them a general right." The acts of user proved by us show that we are entitled to use the road for the purposes of the proposed houses. They also referred to Chitty Q.C. and W. B. Fisher, for the respondents.—The evidence does not prove user of the right of way for any other purposes than those to which the land was originally put. And the law is quite settled that a right of way cannot be increased so as to cast a greater burden on the servient tenement. This is clearly settled by many cases, and especially by a recent case of Williams v. James (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 664; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 577) where Bovill, C.J. says: "When a right of way to a piece of land is proved, then that is, unless something appears to the contrary, a right of way for all purposes according to the ordinary and reasonable use to which the land might be applied at the time of the supposed grant. Such a right cannot be increased so as to affect the servient tenement by imposing upon it any additional burthen." And in the same case Willes, J., says: "I quite agree with the argument that the right of way can only be used for the field in its ordinary use as a field. The right could not be used for a manufactory built upon the field. The use must be the reasonable use for the purposes of the land in the condition in which it was while the user took place." Against such clear language as that, the appellant can set nothing but the dicta of Lord Abinger and Parke, B., in Cowling v. Higginson (ubi sup.) Too much weight must not be attached to mere dicta. As Lord Selborne said in Re The Metropolitan Public Carriage and Repository Company, Brown's Case (29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 562; L. Rep. 9 Ch. 106): "It seems to me to be only just to the learned judge, from whom those dicta proceeded, to remember that judges have tacitly in their minds the circumstances and facts of the particular case before them, when they speak of the influence of any material fact in the evidence which they have to consider. They are not to be supposed to forget that there are other facts, but they speak of the value of the particular fact, bearing in mind the general character of the entire case." [Lord Justice JAMES referred to Henning v. Burnet, 8 Ex. 187.] In the old case of Jackson v. Stacey (Holt. 455) it was held that the user of a way for agricultural purposes only was not sufficient to support a general right. Allan v. Gomme (11 A. & E. 760) turned upon the construction of a reservation of a right of way, and does not apply, but so far as it goes it is in our favour. They also referred to:

Miller, Q.C. in reply.

JAMES, L.J.—I am of opinion that, subject perhaps to an alteration that may be made in the words of the injunction, the order of the Master of the Rolls ought to be affirmed. The question between the parties is as to whether Mr. Dixon is entitled to convert a piece of land that has been uncultivated up to the present time, forming part of an estate or farm called Warren's Farm, into sites for several houses, the right which he claims being an unlimited right for himself and for Mr. Drax, in whose right he is claiming, to turn the whole of the farm into a town or town as if they should be so minded, and should be able to do so. As far as we have any evidence before us, the farm and lands in respect of which this right is claimed have been substantially in their present state from time immemorial, during which it is to be assumed that the right of way has been exercised; that is to say, there was a farm-house, farm lands, and a piece of woodland. The only alterations in the state of the property, of which we have any evidence, have been an enlargement of the farm-house to a small extent, the change of a mud cottage into a brick cottage, and probably the erection of another cottage, but whether an erection or a change I am not quite sure. But those are the only changes which have taken place in the property. Now that those changes may be material, and may be to some extent evidence of the general right, it is probably difficult to deny. But whether they amount to evidence sufficient to justify any inference of fact is another question. I am of opinion that the mere fact that over a common some building materials were taken to build another house is not sufficient to justify the inference of fact that the right, whatever it was, that belonged to the house and property was a right for all purposes whatsoever to which the land might be applied. The other rights alleged are for agricultural purposes, for sporting, which seems to me the same thing as an agricultural purpose, and for taking gravel from a gravel pit in one of the fields. That is insufficient, as it seems to me, to raise any inference of fact from which to draw the right claimed. Then the property has been used practically for all purposes for which a farm may be used, for residential purposes, and for farming purposes. We have then to consider whether the character of the property can be so changed in substance as substantially to increase or alter the burden upon the servient tenement. I said when this case was first opened that I was strongly of opinion that it was the settled law of this country that no such change in the character of a dominant tenement could be made as would increase the burden on the servient tenement. The dicta and observations, which are entitled to very great weight, of Lord Abinger and Mr. Baron Parke, in the cases which have been referred to, induced me at first to think that the opinion I had formed was wrong. But when we consider those dicta and observations in connection with the very clear language of the Court of Queen's Bench in Allan v. Gomme (11 A. & E. 759), and of the Lord Chief Justice Bovill and Mr. Justice Willes in the case of Williams v. James (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 664; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 577), I am quite satisfied that the true principle is the principle laid down in these later cases—namely, that you cannot from evidence of user of property in its original state infer a right to use it in whatever form or for whatever purpose that property may be changed; that is to say, if there be a right of way, however general, for whatever purpose, to a field, the person who is the owner of the field cannot from that say, I have a right to turn that field into a manufactory, or into a town or ten yard, and then use the right of way for the purposes of the manufactory or town so built. I therefore think that the Master of the Rolls was right in the result at which he arrived in drawing an inference from the facts as well as in the law which he applied to those facts. But I think it right to say, as the judgment of the Master of the Rolls has been read to us, that I am unable to agree with the view which he apparently formed that there could be no right of way at all in respect of what are called the tracks over the common. I am not at all prepared to assent to that as a true statement of the law of this country. If from one point, say from a gate to a road 200 yards off, persons have found their way from time immemorial across a common, although sometimes going by one track, and sometimes by another, with such deviations as occur between the gate and the road, I am not prepared to say that a way across the common through those tracks may not be validly claimed, and may not be as good as any right over any formed road. But when the Master of the Rolls says that the way ought to be used only for the purposes for which it was used when the land was in a state in which it was formerly, and when we see the evidence of user, I think he is right, and concur in what he has said. The substance of the injunction is to restrain Mr. Dixon from erecting the new buildings, or using the road for the purpose of any new buildings, except agricultural buildings there. Then it goes on to say, "and from using the same except for agricultural purposes." Probably it should run in this way, if their Lordships agree with me: "except for the purposes to which the land has been heretofore applied."

MELLISH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is whether Mr. Drax and his tenants are entitled to use this right of way for the purpose of turning the land into building land and erecting new buildings upon it, and then using the way, after the buildings are erected, for the purposes of those buildings. It was admitted in the bill, and proved in point of fact, that the right of way did exist for some purposes; and I do not agree, as the Lord Justice has said, with what was thrown out by the Master of the Rolls as to the consequence of the track not being a perfectly definite track over the common, but being a track going in different directions previously to the time when the new road was made. No doubt it is perfectly correct that if a person has land bordering on a common, and it is proved that he went on the common at any place where his land might happen to approach, sometimes in one place and sometimes in another, and then went across the common sometimes to one place and sometimes to another, it would be difficult from that to infer any right of way. But if you can find the terminus ab quo and the terminus ad quem, the mere fact that the owner of the land does not go precisely along the same line for the purpose of going from one place to the other would not enable the owner of the servient tenement to dispute the right of way. Assume the owner of this common had a grant which stated that Mr. Dixon had the right to go from the gate leading out of Caesar's Camp, to the highway by the National School with carriages and horses, at his free will and pleasure, I cannot suppose that the grant would fail in point of law, because it did not point out the precise definite track between the one terminus and the other in which he was to go, in using the right of way. If the owner of the servient tenement did not point out the line of the right of way, then the owner of the dominant tenement must take the nearest way he can. If the owner of the servient tenement wishes to confine him to a definite track, then he must point it out, and in that case the owner of the dominant tenement would not be entitled to go out of the way, strictly speaking, merely because the way is rough and there are ruts in it, and so forth. In my opinion the bill has properly admitted that he has a right of way for some purposes. Then comes the question to what extent does that right of way go? That depends partly on a question of law, and partly on a question of fact, but mainly on a question of law. When the question of law is settled, there is no great difficulty in arriving at a proper conclusion as to the question of fact. The question of law is this: assuming that it is made out that Mr. Drax and his tenants have used this way not exclusively for agricultural purposes, but for all purposes for which they wanted it in the state in which the land was at the time of the supposed grant—at the time when the right of way first begun—and assuming that there has been no material alteration in the premises since the user of the way for all the purposes for which they have required it in the state in which the premises were at the time when the road was supposed to have its origin and during all the time it has been used, does that entitle Mr. Drax to alter substantially, and increase the burden on, the servient tenement by building any number of houses he pleases on this property, and arguing that the persons who inhabit those houses will have a right to use the way for all purposes connected with the houses? I certainly was under the impression, when this case was opened, that the owner of the dominant tenement could not increase or alter the burden on the servient tenement in any such way as that. Mr. Miller called our attention very pointedly to the language of Parke, B., in Cowling v. Higginson (4 M. & W. 245) and that certainly did raise some doubt in my mind as to what the true rule of law is. But now that the other cases have been cited, I doubt whether Parke, B., had the question now before us present to his mind; and I am of opinion that the true rule is that laid down by Lord Chief Justice Bovill and Mr. Justice Willes in the case of Williams v. James (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 664: L. Rep. 2 C. P. 577), and I think by Parke, B. himself, in the other case of Henning v. Burnett (8 Ex. 187). That was with reference to a grant. I am now speaking merely with reference to user. In Cowling v. Higginson (4 M. & W. at p. 256) Lord Abinger is cautious in the way in which he lays down the rule. He says: "If a way has been used for several purposes, there may be a ground for inferring that there is a right of way for all purposes; but if the evidence shows a user for one purpose, or for particular purposes only, an inference of general right would hardly be presumed." If the owner of the dominant tenement has used the way only for purposes connected with the occupation of the land in its existing state, that may be considered to be a user for particular purposes, and I have a doubt whether Parke, B., really intended the contrary, although he says that the user of a way for several purposes implies its user for all purposes; because if the facts in Cowling v. Higginson are examined, it will be found that the mines were opened seventy years before, it is true, but it was, therefore, a property with existing mines in it. That way, it is true, had not been used for those mines, but it being a property with mines in it, it may be inferred that if the owner is entitled to use the way for all the purposes for which he wanted it, that might include the user of it for the purposes of the mines, that being a reasonable occupation of the land in the condition in which it was. However that may be, in my opinion the true rule is that laid down by Lord Chief Justice Bovill in Williams v. James (ubi sup.), that where a right of way to a piece of land is proved, that is, unless something appears to the contrary, a right of way for all purposes according to the ordinary and reasonable use to which that land might be applied at the time of the supposed grant. Mr. Justice Willes evidently agrees with that view. That being the rule, what are the purposes for which, according to the ordinary and reasonable use to which this land would be assumed to have been applied at the time of the grant, or supposed grant, this road may be used? We do not know when the grant was made. It is from time immemorial; Caesar's Camp has existed from time immemorial; so have Wimbledon Common and the village of Wimbledon. When Warren Farm was first inclosed we do not know. But one cannot suppose that there was any notion of using it for general building purposes at that time, though no doubt the owner of that farm must always have required, first of all, the way to the cottages in one direction, and then a way to Wimbledon, which lies in another direction. Is there any such evidence of user for purposes beyond what was necessary, and beyond what was reasonably required for the occupation of the land in its existing state, as entitles us to hold that the right extends beyond that? I agree that if we found that several houses had been built, and that the owner of Warren Farm had exercised the right of building new houses, and had a road to those new houses, we might infer that it was not to be confined to those particular houses, because that was not the original grant. But for that it must be inferred that building generally was contemplated at the time of the original grant, and that that was included in it. I will not say that there is no evidence of it, but there is not sufficient evidence for us to act upon and say that there is a right of way beyond what is necessary and reasonable for the occupation of the premises as they existed at the time of the supposed grant. The enlargement of Warren Farm-house does not go beyond the right for farming purposes. It would be a very narrow construction to hold that because a small farm-house with some small buildings was erected 200 or 300 years ago, the farmer could not enlarge his farm buildings for the purposes now required in agriculture. Then with regard to the cottage, the changing of a mud cottage into a brick cottage is really the strongest piece of evidence in the case. That is very weak evidence, if it is evidence at all, because if a mud cottage became unfit for human habitation, in the alteration of it, although there is the carrying of bricks for the time, the burden is not permanently increased. On the assumption that the owner and occupiers had a right of way to the mud cottage, the going to the brick cottage after it is once built, is no greater burden than the going to the mud cottage. The other acts of user that occurred in taking away gravel, and in going to the farm for the purposes of shooting, are acts of user reasonably connected with the occupation of the premises as they have been during the whole time that the right of way has existed, as far as we know. I am, therefore, of opinion that it is not made out that there is any right to use this road for the purpose of erecting entirely new buildings, and then after those buildings are erected, using the road for the purposes of those buildings. I agree, therefore, that the appeal must be dismissed.

BAGGALLAY, J.A.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that there are two questions for decision in this case. The first is, what is the extent of the right of way which is proved by the evidence in the case; and the second is, if that right of way is established as limited to particular purposes, can it be extended consistently with the rule of law applicable to questions of the like kind? I think the judgment of Parke, B., in the case of Cowling v. Higginson (4 M. & W. 245) has been interpreted to an extent beyond what the learned Baron intended. It is true that in one part of his judgment he uses this expression: "If it is shown that the defendant and those under whom he claimed have used the way whenever they have required it, it is strong evidence to show that they had a general right to use it for all purposes, and from which a jury might infer a general right." These words taken by themselves point in the direction of Mr. Miller's argument. But I think those wide words are qualified by this statement: "If the way is confined to a particular purpose, the jury ought not to extend it; but if it is proved that it has been used for a variety of purposes, then they might be warranted in finding a right for all." Now let us assume we have the case of an agricultural district where there has been a right of way to a certain piece of land exercised for agricultural purposes for a length of time, and then it appears that there is valuable gravel on the estate, and it is raised and sold from time to time and carried over the way previously used for agricultural purposes alone; then assume that afterwards mineral produce was found on the estate and raised, and the way was used for carrying it away, and one might imagine a variety of acts of user that would from time to time arise in the course of the occupation of the land—in such a case, with all this variety of acts of user established, I can understand that the jury might be directed to find from that that the original grant must be treated as a grant for all purposes. No such case arises here. If it is not proved by evidence, as I think it is, it is admitted that the right of way was used for agricultural purposes from time immemorial. Then we find in addition to that two or three kinds of user suggested as going beyond agricultural purposes which do not appear to do so, such as building a new barn, or adding a wing to the house, or even the shooting. But we have got two purposes for which this way has been used, the one for carrying materials for replacing a mud cottage upon a small portion of the property by a more substantial building, and the other for taking gravel and carting it away. If it came before me as a jurymen to say, whether I could infer a right to use the way for all purposes, I should answer, "No." It is not like a general user for all purposes, such as Parke, B., contemplated. Therefore to the first question it must be answered, that the right of way has been enjoyed merely for the purposes to which the land was applied at the date of the grant and no further. Then the second question is whether the right to use this way, being limited to these particular purposes as to which there has been actual proof, can it be extended to the purposes for which the defendant desires to use it? I think it cannot be so extended consistently with the rule of law from time to time enunciated, and particularly in the case of Williams v. James (ubi sup.) that the burden of the servient tenement must not be increased, nor can the nature of the user be substantially changed. Answering the questions that arise in this case in the way I have suggested, it appears to me that the judgment of the Master of the Rolls is correct, and that, subject to the modification which has been mentioned by Lord Justice James, the injunction must stand.

BRAMWELL, B.—I agree, and have nothing to add.

Appeal accordingly dismissed with costs.

REGISTRATION CASE.

ASHWORTH (app.) v. HOPPER (resp.)

County vote—Freehold determinable at will of grantor—Parliamentary franchise.

Where an equitable freehold rent-charge was granted by deed for valuable consideration to certain persons called in the deed "beneficiaries," by certain other persons called therein "trustees," the trustees having by the deed an absolute power of sale of the whole of the property comprised in the deed, it was Held by the court (Lord Coleridge, C.J., Grove and Archibald, JJ.), that such power of sale could only be exercised subject to the proceeds being held in trust for the "beneficiaries," and that the beneficiaries had a sufficient interest, until the exercise of such power of sale, to entitle them to the franchise.

THIS was an appeal from the decision of the revising barrister for the North-East Division of the county of Lancaster, who struck off the register of voters for that division of the county of Lancaster, the name of the appellant, and the names of thirty other persons whose claim arose under circumstances similar to those of the appellant.

The material parts of the case stated by the revising barrister for the opinion of the court were as follows:

The appellant claimed to be entitled to vote in respect of 1-54th share of a freehold rent-charge of 120*l.* under a deed of which the following is a copy:

This indenture, made the 28th day of Jan. 1875, between [certain persons therein called the trustees], of the one part, and the several persons whose names are subscribed and seals affixed to these presents, and whose descriptions are set forth in the schedule hereto (hereinafter called the said beneficiaries), of the other part; whereas, by an indenture dated the 5th day Jan. 1875, and made between Richard Siddall, of the one part, and the said trustees of the other part, in consideration of the sum of 282*l.* therein expressed to have been paid to the said Richard Siddall by the said trustees, all those four plots of land situate at Waterford, in Rosendale aforesaid, formerly part of an estate there, called the Miller Barn Estate, and also all those messuages, &c., erected upon the said plots of land, and the appurtenances were granted and conveyed to uses limiting thereon unto the said trustees, their heirs, and assigns, the clear yearly rent of 120*l.*, payable by equal half yearly payments on, &c., together with certain powers and remedies for securing and enforcing payment of the same yearly rent, and subject to the said rent, powers, and remedies, to the use of the said Richard Siddall, his heirs, and assigns for ever; and whereas the said trustees have agreed with each of the said beneficiaries for the sale to him of the beneficial interest of and in one undivided equal fifty-fourth part or share of and in the said yearly rent, and the securities therefore, at the price of 52*l.* 5*s.*, and upon the terms hereinafter appearing. Now this indenture witnesseth that in pursuance of the said agreement, and in consideration of the sum of 52*l.* 5*s.* to the said trustees, paid by each of the said beneficiaries on or before the execution of these presents, one such sum being so paid by each of them, the said beneficiaries (the receipt whereof the said trustees do hereby acknowledge), they the said trustees do hereby declare and agree to and with the said beneficiaries respectively, that they the said trustees, their heirs and assigns, do and shall henceforth stand seized and possessed of one undivided fifty-fourth part or share of and in the said yearly rent of 120*l.*, and the said powers and remedies for securing and enforcing payment thereof, and the benefit of the covenants by the said Richard Siddall, in the hereinbefore recited indenture contained (all hereinafter referred to as the said rent and premises), in trust for each of the said beneficiaries, his heirs and assigns, absolutely. And it is hereby further agreed and declared by and between the said trustees that they, the said trustees, their heirs and assigns, do and shall stand seized and possessed of the remaining parts or shares of and in the said rent and premises, in trust for the said trustees, their heirs and assigns, as tenants in common, in equal shares; and each of them, the said beneficiaries, doth hereby, for himself, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, covenant with the said trustees, their heirs and assigns, that if at any time he, the said covenanting party, his heirs or assigns, shall be desirous of selling his or their part, share, or interest of and in the said rent and premises, such part or share shall be first offered to the said trustees, or the survivors or survivor of them, or other the trustees or trustee for the time being of these presents, at a price to be ascertained, in case of dispute, by two arbitrators, or their umpire, to be appointed and to act in accordance with the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, or any then subsisting statutory modification thereof. And each of them, the said trustees, doth hereby, for himself, his heirs, &c., covenant with the others of them, their heirs and assigns, that if at any time he, the said covenanting party, his heirs or assigns, shall be desirous of selling his or their beneficial part, share, or interest of and in the said rent and premises (including the benefit of the covenant hereinbefore lastly contained), such part, share, or interest shall be first offered to the others of the said trustees, or the survivor of them, or other the trustees or trustee for the time being of these presents (other than the trustee so desiring to sell), at a price to be ascertained in case of dispute in manner aforesaid. And it is hereby expressly agreed and declared that the said trustees, or that the survivors or survivor of them, or that the heirs of such survivor, or that other the trustees or trustee for the time being of these presents shall respectively have an absolute power of sale over the said rent and premises exercisable at their or his discretion, without any further consent on the part of any person. And that the power of appointing a new trustee or new trustees of these presents shall be exercisable by the surviving or continuing trustees or trustee for the time being, or the acting executors or executor, administrators or administrator of the last surviving and continuing trustee, or by the last retiring trustees or trustee, and on every or any such appointment the number of trustees may be either augmented or reduced. And each of them the said trustees, so far as relates to the acts of himself and his own heirs, executors and administrators, alone, and so far as to bind himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators respectively only while in the actual custody of the deeds and writings hereby covenanted to be produced, and so far as practicable to bind such deeds and writings, into whosever hands the same may come, and not so as to bind himself, his heirs, executors or administrators, or to incur any liability in relation thereto, farther or otherwise, doth hereby, for himself, his heirs, executors and administrators, covenant with each of the said beneficiaries, his heirs, and assigns, that they, the said covenanting parties respectively, and their respective heirs and assigns, will at all times, unless prevented by fire or other inevitable accident, upon the request, in writing, of the covenantee, his heirs or assigns, or any person lawfully or equitably claiming through him or them, any estate or interest in the said rent and premises, at the expense of the person or persons, &c., the hereinbefore recited indenture of the 5th day of Jan. 1875, and this present indenture, or either of them, for the support or manifestation of the estate or title of the said covenantee, his heirs and assigns, and every or any other person claiming as aforesaid, and upon such request, and at such expense as aforesaid, make and deliver to the person or persons requiring the same, or to such person or persons as he or they shall appoint such true copies, attested or unattested, of the same deeds and writings as he or they may require, and in the meantime keep the said deeds and writings safe, uncancelled and undefaced.

The deed was duly executed and signed by the parties thereto, and proof of such execution given, and also of the fact that previous to the 31st. Jan. 1875, the claimant had received payment of 11. 2s. 2d., being the first half yearly instalment of the one fifty-fourth share of the rent-charge. The claimant's full share of the said rent-charge being 2l. 4s. 4d. per annum.

It was contended on behalf of the objector that the covenant by the parties in the said deed, who are therein called the "beneficiaries," that if at any time they should be desirous of selling their respective shares, such shares should first be offered to the persons in the said deed styled the trustees at a price to be ascertained in case of dispute by arbitration, and the absolute power of sale vested in the trustees by the said deed exercisable at their or his discretion, without any further consent on the part of any person, were inconsistent with the claimant having such freehold interest in the said 1-54th share of the said rent-charge as would entitle him to have his name inserted on the said list of voters. I was of opinion that inasmuch as the estate of the beneficiaries might be determined at the will of the trustees, the former had not such an interest in the rent-charge as entitled them to vote. I therefore expunged the name from the list. The question for the court was whether this decision of the revising barrister was correct or not.

Gorst, Q.C., for the appellant.—The estate granted to the beneficiaries was an equitable freehold which would, indeed there is no question raised as to that, give a right to vote if there were no conditions or covenants in the deed relating to the determination of the estate conveyed. The effect of the conditions for determining the estate is not to alter the nature of the estate during its actual continuance. It remains an equitable freehold until it is put an end to by the exercise by the trustees of their absolute power of sale, or by a sale by the beneficiaries themselves. [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—There is nothing against you in the right of pre-emption that is given to the trustees, but assuming that the absolute power of sale that is given to them can be exercised by them, without any regard to the interest of the beneficiaries, and the money resulting from the sale appropriated by them, would the estate still be an equitable freehold?] The trustees cannot appropriate the money resulting from a sale under this power. Equity would impose a trust upon them, they would be trustees of the money resulting from the sale, just as before the sale they were trustees of the estate. That a trust is to be implied is evident from the whole frame of the deed. In the witnessing clause the trustees agree with the beneficiaries to stand seised in trust for the beneficiaries absolutely. The deed, too, shows that the agreement was for a sale to the beneficiaries, and shows that the beneficiaries paid for an interest and not for a mere tenancy or holding at the absolute will of the trustees. The 4th section of the Act 23 & 24 Vict. c. 145, enacts that the money received upon sales by trustees having a power to sell, shall be laid out in the manner indicated in the instrument creating the trust, but if no indication is therein contained, then in the purchase of other hereditaments; and it may well be that this section being in the mind of the draftsman, he avoided the unnecessary labour of indicating what should, in case of a sale by the trustees, be done with the resulting funds. But even if the trustees could determine the estate at their absolute will, and appropriate the proceeds of the sale of it, it would still, until they did so, be an equitable freehold and confer the right to vote. Davis v. Waddington (7 M. & G. 37, note (a), p. 45) shows what interests the court have held not to be freehold interests, but mere holdings at the will of the grantors, and it is evident that the case itself of Davis v. Waddington is regarded by the learned reporters as an extreme case, or indeed as being actually wrongly decided by the court. In 2 Coke's Instit. 201a, the nature of freehold estates on condition is explained. The authorities are to be found collected in Wynne v. Wynne (2 M. & G. 19), a case mentioned in the note to Davis v. Waddington. The statute gives to the persons in possession of equitable freehold rent-charges of certain value the right to vote, and does not, either expressly or by implication, deprive them of it because, under certain circumstances, the estate may be divested. He also cited Sugden on Powers, 8th edit. p. 452.

J. Edwards, Q.C., for the respondent.—The intention of this deed is obviously to manufacture a number of votes, and to keep the voters in a state of perpetual dependence on the trustees, as they are called. It is true that it is not found by the case that this deed is a fraud, or within the statute 10 Anne c. 23, but it is submitted that the interest which the beneficiaries have is dependent upon the absolute will of the trustees, who are the grantors. A person may, when there is no impending contest, desire to withdraw, and the trustees will then allow him to do so, and pay him an arbitration price; but when an election is impending, and he is not to be depended upon as a sure voter for the party espoused by the trustees, they will sell over his head, unless indeed seeing his danger he reconciles himself to the trustees and their party. The Act (23 & 24 Vict. c. 145) only deals with cases where there is a trust; it does not impose a trust where none has been created by the instrument. [ARCHIBALD, J.—You must not overlook the fact that the beneficiaries have paid a valuable consideration.] It is a matter to be decided upon the construction of the whole instrument, whether there is, in truth, any trust. But, even assuming that when the question arises between the parties to the instrument, the beneficiaries will be held to have equitable freeholds, it may well be that for election purposes public policy requires a different construction to be put upon the matter. It has never been decided that a freehold determinable at the will of the grantor gives a vote; and here, as I have submitted, the trustees are the grantors. Cases bearing on this point are to be found collected in Rogers on Elections, 10th edit., p. 12, and in a judgment of Mr. Manning's, sitting as revising barrister for South Hants, reported in 2 Jur. 459. In Beeson v. Burton (12 C. B. 647; 20 L. T. Rep. 3 O. S.; 2 Lut. 225, 232), Maule, J., says: "It is the arbitrary power of removal which prevents the estate being a freehold." Here there is an arbitrary power of removal, and there is not any resulting trust of the purchase money in favour of the grantees. The estate, therefore, at any rate for election purposes, is not a freehold. He also referred to Lewin on Trusts, p. 176; Burgess v. Wheate (1 Eden. 177); Steele v. Bosworth (11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 507; 34 L. J. 57, C. P.; 10 Jur. N. S. 1239).

Lord, Q.C., replied.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—This case comes to us on appeal from the decision of the revising barrister, who struck the name of the appellant off the list of voters, under these circumstances: There was a deed which, according to one construction, gave to the appellant, and the other persons styled in the deed "beneficiaries," an estate of freehold, but which according to another construction, gave them nothing, or nothing except what the so-called trustees chose to allow them to have. The question is, which of these is the true construction? This deed between "trustees" and "beneficiaries" recites an earlier indenture whereby in consideration of a considerable sum of money certain lands were conveyed to uses limiting therout unto the "trustees," their heirs and assigns, the yearly rent of 120*l.* to the use of the grantor, his heirs and assigns. We must take it, as the case stands, that this deed did give to the "trustees" the rent. Then the "trustees" sell in small shares the greater part, but not the whole of this rent to the "beneficiaries." The portion unsold still remained in the "trustees." The deed which we have to construe states that there was an agreement for a sale between the "trustees" and the "beneficiaries," and in the operative part of the deed it is "declared and agreed that the trustees shall stand seised of the remaining parts or shares of and in the said rent and premises in trust for the trustees, their heirs and assigns." The trustees are, therefore, beneficial owners of the remaining parts or shares. Then each beneficial owner covenants to give an offer to the trustees first, of his part or share, when he may wish to sell. This is followed by a provision for determining the price to be paid in such case, if the trustees wish to buy. So far there is a freehold interest. Then comes this important clause. "It is hereby expressly agreed and declared that the said trustees, or that the survivors or survivor of them, or that other the trustees or trustee for the time being of these presents shall respectively have an absolute power of sale over the said rent and premises, exercisable at their or his discretion without any further consent on the part of any person." I think myself, though I know not whether as to this I shall have the assent of my brothers, that it is a power extending as well to each separate and individual share or part as to the whole corpus; but at any rate, even if they cannot sell each part or share separately, they can sell the whole corpus without any consent on the part of the beneficiaries to the sale. Now, if that were a power which the trustees might exercise for their own benefit, pocketing the proceeds, as at present advised I should say that Davis v. Waddington (7 M. & G. 37) and Beeson v. Burton (20 L. T. Rep. O. S. 111; 12 C. B. 647; 2 Lut. 225, 232) applied, and that the deed would not operate to give an equitable freehold interest. I think, however, that this is not the true construction of this deed. A consideration was paid for the interest conveyed, as appears by the deed, in the latter portion of which is found this power of sale, so that the law would, in my opinion, imply that the proceeds were not to go into the pockets of the trustees. Although the power of sale is absolute, and no trust is expressed, yet a trust can be collected from the deed. Even if the Act of Parliament cited (23 & 24 Vict. c. 145) does not apply, the trustees cannot in defiance of the interests of the cestui qui trusts forfeit the fifty guineas consideration money, so that until the arising of the event defeating the estate, until the exercise of the absolute power of sale, there is a freehold interest. It may be that a fraud upon the election law was intended, but the revising barrister has not so found. To create votes is not unlawful, but to create them so as to be in the absolute power of the creator is an object which, if unlawful, is not attained by this deed, for these trustees, whether they wish it or not, have created a franchise which they cannot extinguish without accounting to the voters created for the proceeds of the property, and so repaying them the amount invested. The decision of the revising barrister, therefore, is incorrect.

GROVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. Whether, if the interest were subject to revocation at the mere will of the trustees, it would be a freehold or not, we need not decide. I am far from saying that it would not be a freehold. Still, so long as it existed Co. Lit., 42, and the cases cited in Comyn's Digest, Tit. Estate (A 6), and the notes to Davis v. Waddington (7 M. & G., note a), make it arguable that it would be a freehold, though defensible at will; but that, as I say, is a question which it is unnecessary to decide. So, also, is it unnecessary to decide whether the power of sale is as to the whole property or as to each separate share. We can only look to the deed, not to any extraneous facts. Can we derive it therefrom as the intention of the parties that the money was given to persons who may at once forfeit the interests for which the money was paid and pocket the money? To construe the deed so would be contrary to the use and plain meaning of the word

"trustees." The trustees are so named in the deed, and the other contracting parties are called "beneficiaries," and give a consideration. A court of equity would impose a trust, and say they sold for the benefit of the beneficiaries. I think the statutes would supply this if it were needed, though, in my opinion, it is not necessary to rely upon the statute. As I read the Act (23 & 24 Vict. c. 145) it saves the insertion of certain provisions, and where they are not inserted adds to the deed what a court of equity would say was required for the just construction, and refers to the case of deeds in which persons called trustees have a power of sale. I think, therefore, that these persons did take an equitable freehold interest, and that as the sale was not to be for the trustees' own benefit it is clear that the appellant has such an interest as, the value being admittedly sufficient, will entitle him to the franchise.

ARCHIBALD, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is, whether the appellant has a freehold interest. I think we must look at the deed and construe it without reference to the motives of the grantor, and when so looked at, the deed in its earlier part amply conveys a freehold interest. We need not decide whether the case of Davis v. Waddington (supra) governs the present case or not. I refrain from saying whether this case is similar to that case or to the case of Beeson v. Burton (sup.), but from the whole contents of the deed I am clear that the power of sale cannot be construed as Mr. Edwards has suggested. The first part of the deed gives an interest to the cestuis que trust, and then it provides that they may sell that interest. The trustees are to hold for the cestuis que trust their heirs and assigns.

HALL v. NOTTINGHAM AND OTHERS.

Custom—Recreation in alieno solo—Right of parishioners to at any time in the year—Reasonableness and certainty of custom—"Any lawful and innocent recreation"—"Any time in the year"—Meaning of word "custom."

A custom was claimed for the inhabitants of a parish to erect a Maypole in a certain piece of inclosed ground of a private owner in the parish, and to dance round and about the same, and otherwise enjoy any lawful and innocent recreation at any time in the year on the said ground:

Held by the court (Kelly, C.B., and Cleasby and Amphlett, BB.) to be a good valid and reasonable custom, and sufficiently certain, on the authority of Abbott v. Weekly (1 Lev. 176) and Fitch v. Rawling and another (2 H. Black. 393) which were approved and followed in preference to Millechamp v. Johnson and others (Willes 205 (note b), which was also distinguished.

Per Cleasby, B. the meaning of the word "custom" in a case like this, is something having the effect of a local law, arising from the consent of all the inhabitants of a district from before the time of legal memory. But the general law of the land requires that this kind of local law shall be both reasonable and certain.

THIS was an appeal from the decision of the Judge of the County Court of Shropshire, holden at Ludlow, in an action of trespass which was brought by the plaintiff against the defendants, parishioners of the parish of Ashford Carbonell in the county of Salop, for trespass on a field or piece of pasture land called "The Maypole Piece," situate in the said parish. The defendants pleaded a right under a custom which they claimed for the parishioners of Ashford Carbonell to go upon the said piece of land at all times, for the purpose of using the same as a recreation ground, and they disputed the plaintiff's right to the freehold of the land.

The learned judge, after hearing the evidence and arguments on both sides, found that the freehold was in the plaintiff and that the land in respect of which the rights were claimed, was a piece of glebe land situate in an enclosed field of the plaintiff, and which glebe was exchanged in the year 1780 by the incumbent of Ashford Carbonell (with the consent of the bishop) with a predecessor of the plaintiff for an equal portion of another field in the said parish, of equal value; that the said land over which the said rights were claimed had been regularly rated to the poor, and tithe had been paid and commuted for the same; and that the custom had been claimed for a number of years by the parish and also disputed by the owner for the time being for the same period. He found also that the said piece of land was subject to a lawful custom for the inhabitants of the said parish to erect a Maypole on the said ground, and dance round and about the same, and otherwise enjoy any lawful and innocent recreation at any time in the year on the said ground. Judgment having accordingly been given in favour of the defendants, the plaintiff brought the present appeal. The question for the opinion of the Court of Exchequer was whether the custom alleged was good in law.

Masterman, for the plaintiff (appellant), submitted that the custom was bad, inasmuch as it was too wide, general and uncertain. The particular games or sports were not specified, nor were the times at or during which they were to be indulged in limited: The defendants claimed a right by custom to dance and enjoy other recreations at any and all times of the year on the plaintiff's land, and that such a custom could not be upheld was clear from the case of Millechamp v. Johnson and others (Willes 205, note b) in which the custom claimed was for all the inhabitants of the Town of C. for the time being to have and enjoy the liberty and privilege of playing at all rural sports or games in the said close every year at all times of the year at their will and pleasure, and the court held that the custom as laid, extending to "any rural sports," was too general and uncertain. No doubt a somewhat similar custom was upheld in Abbott v. Weekly (1 Lev. 176) where a prescription for all the inhabitants of the vill, to dance at all times of the year at their free will for their recreation on the plaintiff's close was held a good custom. So also in Fitch v. Rawling and others (2 H. Blacks. p. 393) a custom for all the inhabitants of a parish to play at all kinds of lawful games and sports and pastimes in the close of A., at all seasonable times of the year, at their free will and pleasure, was held to be reasonable and good. But these cases are clearly distinguishable.

Ex. Div.]

HALL v. NOTTINGHAM AND OTHERS.

[Ex. Div.]

In Abbott v. Weekly the recreation was specified and limited to dancing; whereas here it extended not only to dancing on May Day, but to all and any other times and to any other games and recreations, so that it might deprive the plaintiff of the entire use of his land for any agricultural or profitable purpose; and in Fitch v. Rawling the claim was limited to all seasonable times of the year, whereas in the present case there was no such limitation. [AMPHLETT, B. referred to Race v. Ward and others (4 E. & B. 702; 24 L. J. 153, Q. B.)] The court will be slow to hold the custom good as it is one "beyond reasonable control," and falls within the judgment of Lord St. Leonards, L. C. in the Scotch appeal case of Dyce v. Hay, in the House of Lords (1 Macq. H. L. Cases) where the right was claimed for the pursuer, as an inhabitant of Aberdeen, to go at all times for purposes of recreation upon the enclosed land of the appellant, and in his judgment there at p. 309 his Lordship said, "Now that I conceive is a claim so large as to be entirely inconsistent with the rights of property, for no man can be considered to have a right of property worth holding in a soil over which the whole world has the privilege to walk and disport themselves at pleasure." [KELLY, C.B.—That case was a case of prescription.]

Nov. 15.—Bosanquet, for the defendants (respondents), contra, contended that the custom claimed was a perfectly good and valid one. The proposition contended for by the plaintiff is that there cannot be so wide a custom in alieno solo, and, inasmuch as a parish cannot as an individual person have a freehold, it amounts to saying that a piece of ground cannot be dedicated to the use of a parish so that the parishioners may have a right to play games therein, which would be a practical denial of the right to a village green. Abbott v. Weekly (ubi sup.) is it is submitted a conclusive authority for the defendants. The custom under which the trespass in that case was justified was alleged to be for all the inhabitants of the vill to dance on the locus in quo at all times of the year. The objection was taken after verdict that a prescription to dance in the freehold of another and spoil his grass was void, especially as it was said, "at all times of the year" and not at all seasonable times. But the court said, "This is a good custom and it is necessary for the inhabitants to have their recreation." So in Fitch v. Rawling (ubi sup.) a custom, for "all the inhabitants of a parish to play at all kinds of lawful games, sports, and pastimes, in the close of A. at all seasonable times of the year at their free will and pleasure" was held to be good; the court there resting their judgment on Weekly v. Abbott (ubi sup.) and Buller, J. in his judgment there says, "In the case in Levinz (Abbott v. Weekly) the court say that it is necessary for the inhabitants to have their recreation. If so, it is a matter of law, and though there may be precedents which state such custom to be for either the health or recreation of the inhabitants, yet where the court lay it down that recreation is necessary, it is not necessary to be averred in pleading." [KELLY, C.B.—The right claimed in the present case is the use of the whole surface of the soil of the plaintiff's land at all times.] That is so, but, though no doubt such a custom might and probably would practically deprive the owner of the use and profit of the surface, the current of authority is in its favour. And as to Millechamp v. Johnson (ubi sup.) relied on by the plaintiff, the only case that is at all opposed to the contention of the defendants, the decision there that the custom as laid, extending to "any rural sports," was too general and uncertain, is not good law; whilst as to "all times of the year," the court there expressly held that these "must be taken to mean all legal and seasonable times of the year," and that this did not take away the profits of the land. Sir W. Blackstone (2 Black. Comm. p. 263 of the 16th edition by Coleridge and p. 293 of the 20th edition by Stewart) in pointing out the distinction between custom and prescription, the former being "properly a local usage and not annexed to any person," says, "If there be a usage in the parish of Dale that all the inhabitants of that parish may dance on a certain close at all times for their recreation (which is held to be a lawful usage) this is strictly a custom, for it is applied to the place in general and not to any particular person," and he cites Abbott v. Weekly as upholding such a custom. The question arose again in this court in Mounsey v. Iemay (7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 767; 1 H. & C. 729; 12 L. J., N. S., 94, Ex.) and both Pollock, C.B. and Martin, B. in their judgments refer to Abbott v. Weekly as distinctly holding such a custom as the present though not limited to "seasonable times" to be good. The case of Dyce v. Hay (ubi sup.) though cited by my friend in support of the plaintiff's case, in truth is an authority in favour of the plaintiff, for the Lord Chancellor (Lord St. Leonards, in his judgment says "There is one thing as to which I must particularly guard myself, and I must anxiously beg that the House may not be taken as expressing any adverse opinion; I mean that right to which the right in question in this case has been improperly assimilated; the right of village greens and playgrounds the enjoyment of which has been dedicated to the public . . . It is now admitted to be clear that the law of Scotland in that respect agrees with the law of England. If there be a piece of ground uninclosed (not that I mean to say inclosure would make any difference, unless there was an exercise of an adverse right), but I say, if there be a piece of ground uninclosed, and dedicated from time immemorial to the public from which a custom may be laid for sports generally or for village recreation, nobody I trust will suppose that such rights can at all be affected or disturbed by any decision at which your Lordships may arrive upon the present appeal. Those rights will remain untouched, and are unassailable, be the fate of this case what it may." [KELLY, C.B.—As far as it may operate, that opinion of Lord St. Leonards, although the decision in the particular case is the other way, is no doubt in your favour.] There is nothing unreasonable in one piece of ground in a parish being dedicated to the recreative use of the inhabitants of the parish, and all the cases recognise the validity of such a custom. [AMPHLETT, B.—In his judgment in Race v. Ward (4 E. & B. at p. 713) Lord Campbell, C.J. refers to the case of Abbott v. Weekly in Levinz (ubi sup.) and says "It is a good custom for all the inhabitants of a parish to dance in a particular spot or the like."]

Masterman in reply.—The assumption that this ground is a village green, and that its destruction will be wrought by the court giving judgment for the plaintiff, has no foundation in fact. The close in question is an inclosed piece of land about an acre in extent, and it is found by the case to be the

HALL v. NOTTINGHAM AND OTHERS.

plaintiff's freehold; it was formerly glebe land. It is rated to the poor and tithes have been commuted and paid in respect of it. Certainly since 1780 it has not in any way been waste of the manor. Taking its name "The Maypole Piece," the utmost there could be gotten from that would be that, as in Mounsey v. Ismay, the parishioners might have a right to dance there on May Day. All the cases that have been cited are cases of limited rights; and Millechamp v. Johnson shows that a custom for all kinds of games at all times is uncertain and too large.

KELLY, C.B.—I have had very considerable doubt in the course of the argument of this case, arising principally from the fact that, to hold the custom claimed by the defendants here to be good, would be practically to deprive the owner of the freehold of the whole beneficial enjoyment and use of the entire surface of the piece of ground in question. It is a case, therefore, which requires very clear authority to be shown in favour of the defendants' contention that the custom as claimed by them is a good custom. Now the authorities which have been cited to us on the one side and the other in argument are the case of Millechamp v. Johnson on the part of the plaintiff, and the cases of Abbott v. Weekly and Fitch v. Rawling on the part of the defendants; and these authorities are entirely opposed to each other, and, it being impossible to reconcile them, the court have to decide between them. In Millechamp v. Johnson a custom for "all the inhabitants of a town to play at any rural sports or games in the close of the plaintiff at all times of the year at their will and pleasure" was held to be a bad custom; though not on the ground that the claim extended to "all times of the year," for as to that objection which was taken in the case, the court were of opinion that "there was no weight in it," for that "all times of the year" must be taken to mean all legal and seasonable times of the year," but on the ground that "the custom as laid extending to any rural sports was too general and uncertain." On the other hand we find in Abbott v. Weekly and Fitch v. Rawling (ubi sup. respectively) decisions, which, if they are to be followed, are decisive of the present case in favour of the defendants. In both those cases, as in the present case, the right claimed was unlimited both as to the games, sports, pastimes, and recreations to be indulged in on the ground, and which when indulged in would necessarily occupy the whole surface of the land, but also as to the times when the right might be exercised, for that extended to "all times of the year;" so that there was no moment of time when the owner of the soil could enjoy or make any profitable use of it, as there are some games and sports which in being played or pursued necessarily occupy every inch of the surface of the ground so played upon. The whole question then is, which of these conflicting authorities we are to follow and give effect to. We are dealing, it must be remembered, with a matter affecting an individual owner of a small piece of land on the one hand, and the rights and privileges of all the inhabitants of an entire parish on the other; and it is so much for the physical and moral benefit and advantage of those inhabitants that they should have rational and healthful recreation, and that they should have a piece of ground on which they may be able to indulge in the exercise of all lawful sports, games, and pastimes, that I think the benefit and advantage accruing to them from the right claimed outweigh the injury and disadvantage arising therefrom to the owner of the land. Having then the authority of the cases of Abbott v. Weekly and Fitch v. Rawling in favour clearly of the defendants in this question, to say nothing of the additional weight given to that authority by the observations of Pollock, C.B. and Martin, B. in Mounsey v. Ismay (ubi sup.) which have been referred to in the course of the argument, and finding only the solitary and not very decisive authority of Millechamp v. Johnson (ubi sup.) the other way, I think we ought to adhere to and to follow the first mentioned authorities, and to hold in favour of the inhabitants of this parish that the custom claimed by them in this case is lawful, reasonable and good.

CLEASBY, B.—I am quite of the same opinion. The one question put to us and which we have to consider and answer, is whether the custom claimed in this case is a good and valid custom and the judgment of the County Court Judge correct? The custom as claimed, and found by the judge, is for the inhabitants of the parish in question "to erect a Maypole on the ground, and dance round and about the same, and otherwise enjoy any lawful and innocent recreation at any times in the year on the said ground." Now I am of opinion that that is a good and valid custom. I believe that the proper meaning of the word "custom" as used and applied in a case like the present, is something having the effect of a local law arising from the consent of all the inhabitants of a particular district from before the time of legal memory. But the general law of the land requires that this kind of local law shall be both reasonable and certain. Now, with regard to the reasonableness of this custom, it seems to me that all the authorities to which our attention has been directed in the course of the argument, are conclusive in favour of the custom on that point. There are, in the first place, the cases of Abbott v. Weekly and Fitch v. Rawling (ubi sup.) with which, so far as the reasoning goes, the case of Millechamp v. Johnson, in Willes agrees; we have further the judgment of Lord Campbell, C.J. in Race v. Ward (ubi sup.) and the opinion of Lord St. Leonards in Dyce v. Hay (ubi sup.) in the House of Lords. The other question, as to the custom being sufficiently certain, is a more difficult one. In Millechamp v. Johnson (ubi sup.) the right was claimed to play at "any rural sports or games," and that was held to be too general and uncertain; but, in the present case, the custom claimed is "to erect a Maypole and dance around it and otherwise enjoy any lawful and innocent recreation." Now I do not think that this addition to the specified sport of "erecting a Maypole and dancing round it," of "otherwise enjoying any lawful recreation" makes the custom bad on the ground of uncertainty. It would not, I think, be reasonable to expect that any more specific description of the nature of the particular sports or recreation to be indulged in should be given. They specify the erection of a Maypole and dancing, and then add generally the enjoying "any lawful and innocent recreation." I do not think, therefore, that we should be justified, having regard to the authorities, in saying that there is such uncertainty in the present case as to invalidate the custom; though, no doubt as appears from the note to the case in Willes' Reports, the merely saying "any rural sports," without any thing more, was held to be too uncertain. On the other hand, in Fitch v. Rawling (ubi sup.) a custom to play at "all kinds of lawful games, sports, and pastimes at all seasonable times of the year" was held to be a good and valid custom, and the only distinction between that case and the present case is that, in the present case, the time is not limited, it being "at any times in the year;" but then Millechamp v. Johnson and other subsequent cases, have decided that that must be taken to mean "all seasonable times of the year." I am of opinion, therefore, on the authority of Abbott v. Weekly and Fitch v. Rawling that the custom in the present case is a good, reasonable, and valid custom and sufficiently certain.

AMPHLETT, B.—I am of the same opinion. Certainly a custom to be valid must be both reasonable and certain. A test of unreasonableness no doubt is the fact that the owner of the land may, by the exercise of the custom, be deprived of all beneficial use of the surface. There may be many circumstances, however, which may counterbalance that one circumstance, and so the custom may, nevertheless, well be held to be reasonable. Take the present case, for instance, of a piece of land in a parish being appropriated to the recreation of the inhabitants of the parish. Would it have been unreasonable at the time of the inclosure of this land that a small piece of land should, for the benefit of the parishioners, be appropriated or dedicated to the purpose of their recreation? And even if it might be that its use for such recreative purposes might deprive the owner of the beneficial enjoyment of the surface, it might not have been unreasonable in those days that a piece of land would be so appropriated; and the Legislature seems to have been and to be of that opinion, for it is a common thing to make it a condition in inclosure Acts, that a portion of the land shall be set apart for the purposes of recreation; thus showing that what is reasonable now was or may have been reasonable 500 years ago. But another objection to the custom in this case was that it was uncertain, inasmuch as it did not specify what sports and games in particular were to be played and indulged in on the ground. It does not indeed specify any particular mode of recreation beyond erecting a Maypole and dancing round it, and "otherwise enjoying any lawful recreation at any times in the year." I think that that is reasonably certain; and surely it is but reasonable that the parishioners should have some place in which to recreate themselves and enjoy the benefit of fresh air and out of door pastimes. Apart from authority such a custom, I think, ought to be held good, and all the cases except only that cited from Willes' Reports (ubi sup.) are strongly in favour of it. With regard to the question of the time of enjoyment I cannot distinguish the present case from the decision in Willes, where the court said that "all times of the year" must be taken to mean "all legal and seasonable times of the year." We have also the high sanction of the opinion of Lord St. Leonards on the subject, who in his judgment in that case in the House of Lords (ubi sup.) seems to have been quite astonished that, at this time of day, any doubt should be thrown upon the right of the inhabitants of towns and villages to these village greens and playgrounds, the enjoyment of which has been dedicated to the public.

BEESTON v. BEESTON.

"Gaming and wagering"—Contract by way of—Cheque given for share of winnings—Illegality—Betting agent—Liability of to account—8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, s. 18.

An agreement, between A. and B. that B. should employ certain money of A., paid by A. to B. for the purpose, together with other money of B.'s own, in making and laying bets and wagers upon the result of certain horse races, and should pay to A. a certain proportion of such sums as B. should win by such betting and wagering, is not "a contract or agreement by way of gaming or wagering" within sect. 18 of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109; nor is A. prevented by that statute from suing B. on a cheque given by him to A. for the latter's proportion of the winnings which were received by B. to the joint use of A. and himself, and for which he was bound to account to A.

So held, by Cleasby, Pollock, and Amphlett, BB, on the authority of and following Johnson v. Lansley (12 C. B. 468).

To a declaration containing a count on a cheque or order, drawn by the defendant in favour of and made payable to the plaintiff for 50l., and the common money counts, the defendant pleaded (amongst other pleas) for a third plea as to the first count, and so much of the plaintiff's claim under the money counts as related to money alleged to be due upon accounts stated, that the said accounts stated [were stated of and concerning the said cheque or order in the first count mentioned and the consideration for the same and not otherwise; and that the defendant made and delivered the said cheque or order to, and the same was received by, the plaintiff for and in respect of moneys alleged to be due from the defendant to the plaintiff, upon a contract made between them by way of wagering, that is to say, a contract whereby it was agreed between the plaintiff and the defendant that the plaintiff should pay certain moneys to the defendant, and that the defendant should employ and use the said moneys and certain moneys of the defendant in making and laying bets and wagers upon the result of certain horse races, and that the defendant should, subject to certain terms and conditions agreed upon between the plaintiff and the defendant, pay to the plaintiff a certain proportion of such sums as he should win by betting and wagering on the said horse races with the said moneys; and the money so alleged to be due on the said contract, and in respect of which the said cheque or order was given and the said accounts were stated, was money alleged to have been won upon the said bets and wagers, and except as aforesaid there never was any value or consideration for the making or payment of the said cheque, or order, or stating the said accounts by the defendant.

Demurrer, on the ground that the illegality of bets and wagers between the defendant and persons other than the plaintiff is no defence to the plaintiff's claim to a certain proportion of such sum as the defendant should win by such betting and wagering.

Joinder in demurrer.

R. Purvis for the plaintiff in support of the demurrer to the plea.—The defendant will no doubt rely on sect. 18 of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109 (the Act to amend the law concerning Games and Wagers), which enacts "That all contracts or agreements, whether by parol or in writing, by way of gaming or wagering, shall be null and void; and that no suit shall be brought or maintained in any court of law or equity for recovering any sum of money or valuable thing alleged to be won upon any wager, or which shall have been deposited in the hands of any person to abide the event on which any wager shall have been made." That section however it is submitted does not apply to the present case. No doubt a betting or wagering contract is thereby rendered void, but is not made illegal, and that this is so is clear from the case of Fitch v. Jones (5 E. & B. 238; 24 L. J. 293, Q.B.). That was an action on a promissory note by an indorsee against the maker, and the plea was that the defendant made and delivered the note to the indorser in payment of a bet on the amount of hop duty, and that the plaintiff took it without value, and it was held by the Court of Queen's Bench that, although proof that a negotiable instrument was affected with fraud or illegality in the hands of a previous holder would call on the plaintiff to prove value, yet that the presumption did not arise where the previous holder merely held without consideration; and that a bet, though void, and therefore no consideration, was not illegal so as to raise the presumption of indorsement without value. Lord Campbell, C.J., in his judgment there said, "The question comes to be whether this note was given for a consideration merely equivalent to no consideration, or whether it was given in an illegal transaction. I am of opinion that the note did not take its inception in illegality within the meaning of the rule. The note was given to secure payment of a wagering contract which, even before stat. 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, the law would not enforce, but it was not illegal; there is no penalty attached to such a wager, it is not in violation of any statute, nor of the common law, but is simply void, so that the consideration was not an illegal consideration, but equivalent to no consideration at all." And Erle, J., in the same case said, "The question is whether this note was brought within the category of notes tainted with illegality within the meaning of the rule. I am of opinion that it was not. I think that the defendant might, without violating any law, make a wager. If he lost, he might, without violating any law, pay what he had lost, or give a note for the amount." So, again, in Knight v. Cambers (15 C. B. 562; 24 L. J. 121, C.P.), it was held to be no answer to an action for money paid by the plaintiff for the defendant's use at his request, that the money was paid in respect of losses on wagering contracts made void by the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, s. 18. [AMPHLETT, B. refers to Sharp v. T aylor (2 Phillip's Chanc. Rep. 801), a case before Lord Cottenham, L.C., which illustrates the distinction between enforcing illegal contracts and asserting title to money which has arisen from them, and where it was held that one of two parties, who had possessed himself of the property of the firm, cannot be allowed to retain it merely by showing that, in realizing it, some provision of some Act of Parliament had been violated or neglected.] That case is strongly in favour of the plaintiff here. To the same effect as Knight v. Cambers, already cited, is that of Jessopp v. Lutwyche (10 Ex. 614; 24 L. J. 65, Ex.). This is not the case of a winner of a bet on a horse race suing the loser for the amount, to which the statute no doubt would apply, and the money would be irrecoverable; but it is in the nature of an action for money had and received. That the plaintiff was privy to the original transaction is immaterial. Where A. has received money from B. to the use of C. on an illegal contract or consideration it may nevertheless be recovered by C. in an action for money had and received, and A. would not be allowed to set up the illegality of the contract or consideration as a defence to the action:

Tenant v. Elliott, 1 Bos. & Pul. 3;

Farmer v. Russell and another, Ib. 296.

A more recent case of Johnson v. Lansley (12 C. B. 468) is precisely in point. There A. and B. jointly made bets with third persons on horse races. B. received the money, and gave A. a bill accepted by C. for his share, and it was held that A. was not prohibited by sect. 18 of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109 from suing C. on the bill. As was said by Maule J., in that case, "A duty arises on the part of the defendant to pay over his share to his co-partner." The defendant was bound to account for this money to the plaintiff. The losers having paid the defendant could not get the money back, and it would be unjust that the latter should retain it. He cited also, Nicholson v. Gooch (5 Q. B. 999; 25 L. J. 137, Q.B.), and particularly the observations of Crompton J. in that case.

Hill v. Fox, in error from this court, 4 H. & N. 352;

W. Graham, for the defendant, contra, supported the plea, and contended that it was good. It was not necessary to dispute much of the argument, or the cases cited on the other side. The ground taken by the defendant here is that if no consideration was given for this cheque the plaintiff cannot recover upon it. The present is an attempt to recover on an illegal contract, and the case differs entirely from the cases of money had and received. The consideration in this case was illegal, and the transaction wholly void under the statute of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 41, sect. 1. It is a different thing altogether from a bet on which ready money is paid at the moment. Here the contract was that A. should go and bet on horse racing, and pay the proceeds of his winnings or the part of them to B. That was a void contract under sect. 18 of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, and if so there was no consideration for the defendant's cheque. It is not a contract to pay a specific sum, but a contract to advance money for purposes of gambling. The fact that the defendant has been paid the various bets, does not make him an agent. The case is within the very mischief against which the Act was directed, and the contract being void as a contract "by way of gaming or wagering" within sect. 18, it is submitted, is void, and the demurrer to it should be overruled.

Purvis was not called on to reply.

BEESTON v. BEESTON.

[Ex. Div.]

CLEASBY, B.—I am of opinion that sect. 18 of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109 does not apply to the present case. [His Lordship read the section]. Now, it is necessary that we should see what the cause of action here is. It is the receipt by the defendant of money for which he ought and is bound to account to the plaintiff. Why is he bound to account for it? Because it has been paid to him, and he agreed to do so. The obligation to account for this money to the plaintiff is on the defendant, and the only reason given by him in answer to the plaintiff's claim is, that he is not bound to account by reason of its being a wagering contract which the statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, s. 18 has prohibited and rendered illegal and void, and which therefore cannot be enforced in an action by the plaintiff. I am of opinion that that is not so. I do not think that this was an illegal transaction. It was not, in my opinion, a contract "by way of gaming or wagering," which is what sect. 18 says "shall be null and void." The mere act of betting on a horse race is not illegal in the sense that any and every transaction connected with or arising out of such betting is tainted with illegality. The case of Johnson v. Lawley (ubi sup.) which was cited in argument, is in point, and cannot, I think, be distinguished from the present case. A. and B. there jointly made bets on a horse race, and B. received the money and gave A. a bill for his proportion of the winnings. In that case, as in the present, there was an attempt to raise the defence that A. was precluded by sect. 18 of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, from suing or recovering on the bill; but the court held that he was not prohibited by that statute from recovering the amount of the bill. The observations of Jervis, C.J., and Maule, J., in that case, are in point here, and show the ground on which the decision there proceeded. Jervis, C.J., says, "Before the passing of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, there were various statutes relating to betting on horse races, all of which were repealed by the 15th section of that Act." Then, after reading sect. 18, the Chief Justice proceeds as follows, "There is nothing there (sect. 18) to show this transaction illegal. Hunt was bound upon every principle of justice to pay this money to Johnson, and the circumstance of Lansley being substituted for Hunt, cannot make that illegal which, as between Johnson and Hunt would not have been so." And Maule, J. says, "The money which was the consideration for this bill was money which Hunt was bound to account for to the plaintiff. The losers could not get it back from Hunt, and it would be a very unjust thing that he should keep the whole. Before the statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, he clearly would have been bound to pay over the money, and I find nothing in that statute to excuse him from doing so." The ground on which the court held that A. the plaintiff, was entitled to recover in that case, was that the defendant, or B., for whom the defendant was substituted, was A.'s agent, and had, as such, received money in respect of bets made by them jointly, of which he was bound to account to A. for his share. That is precisely the present case, with this difference only between the two cases, that there it was known that A. and B. were jointly interested in the bets, whereas here it was not known that the plaintiff had any interest at all in the matter. On the authority of that case, therefore, I am clearly of opinion that the plaintiff may recover from the defendant the money which has been paid to the defendant under this contract. This is not "a contract by way of gaming or wagering," and is, therefore, not void under sect. 18 of the statute in question, nor is this an action to recover money due on such a contract. The demurrer to the plea must therefore be allowed, and our judgment be for the plaintiff.

POLLOCK, B.—I also think that it is clear that this is a bad plea. In the first place the cheque on which this action has been brought was given for money which had been paid to and was then actually in the defendant's hands, and which was in fact the money of the plaintiff. There was, therefore, beyond all question, good consideration for the cheque. But it is said that the defendant is not bound to account for this money, or to pay the amount of the cheque to the plaintiff, because sect. 18 of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109 prohibits the bringing or maintaining any suit for the recovery of any money alleged to have been won upon any wager, &c. [His Lordship read the section.] Now I do not think that this section avails the defendant here. It is clear that this action is not brought "for the recovery of money won upon a wager," within the meaning of that section; that section does not apply to a case like the present, but to a case where the action is brought by one party to the wager against the other party to it, or by the winner of the bet against the stakeholder between the two. But it is said that this betting between the defendant and third persons is illegal, and therefore the agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant is tainted with illegality. But betting is not in itself illegal at common law, nor by the statute of 9 Anne, c. 74, or the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 41, sect. 1; which latter Act relates only to securities given in respect of money lost at play, and enacts that such securities shall not, as theretofore, be absolutely void, but shall be deemed to have been made and given for an illegal consideration. And the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, sect. 18, makes such wagering contracts void, but does not make them illegal. I agree with the observation of Sir J. Byles on this matter, in Byles on Bills, where, at p. 137 of the 10th edition, referring to the statute of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, s. 18, the learned writer says, "It further makes all gaming contracts, written or oral, null and void," and then he adds the following note: "But not illegal in the sense of criminal, or in such a sense as to impose on the subsequent holder of a negotiable instrument the obligation of proving the consideration he himself gave for it," and he then cites the case of Fitch v. Jones (ubi sup.). For these reasons I am of opinion that our judgment on this demurrer should be in favour of the plaintiff.

AMPLETT, B.—I am entirely of the same opinion. When we look at the contract between the plaintiff and defendant in this case, it appears to me that there is nothing illegal in it. [His Lordship read the agreement as set forth in the plea]. That is an agreement between them that the defendant should employ the plaintiff's money, together with money of his own, in betting upon horse races, and that the winnings should be shared between them; and to such a case the Act of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, s. 18 has no application. What that Act means and what it says is, that no money lost on a bet of this kind shall be recoverable from the loser, but it says not a word about making betting,

BROWN v. EVANS.

or such a contract as the present one, illegal. That being so, what illegality is there in A. saying to B.: "Go and make bets on our joint account, and whatever the winnings on such bets may be shall be shared between us." That is exactly what took place in the present case. The defendant, using the plaintiff's money and his own, made certain bets which he won, and which were paid to him; when he received money in payment of such bets, he received it to the joint use of the plaintiff and himself, and he then gave the cheque in question to the plaintiff for his agreed proportion of such winnings. Now I see nothing illegal in that transaction. The case of Sharp v. Taylor (in 2 Phillips) to which I referred during the argument, is in point very strongly in favour of the plaintiff here. There A. and B., subjects of this country, purchased an American built ship on a joint speculation with a view of employing her in the trade between the two countries until they could sell her at a profit, and for that purpose they had her registered in America in the name of C., a citizen of that country, upon a false declaration that she was bona fide the sole property of C. After some voyages, B., who had had the management of her, attempted to exclude A. from his share in the speculation, and in spite of A. sent her on another voyage to America. In a suit by A. against B. for an account and payment of his share of the realised profits, the contention on the part of B., the defendant, was that A.'s (the plaintiff's) case, involved the confession of a falsehood, and a deliberate violation of the navigation laws of both countries, and that a title to relief in a court of justice could not be founded on it; that if the plaintiff's case was correct, the ship had been engaged in an illegal traffic, and the plaintiff could not assert in a court of justice any title to the profits of it. But it was held by Lord Cottenham, L.C., that, even supposing the declaration and registration to have been a fraud upon the American law, and the employment of the ship as registered to have been a fraud upon the English navigation laws, such fraud would not prevent A. from maintaining his suit for an account and payment of his share of the realised profits of the speculation. In his judgment in that case, Lord Cottenham said (at p. 818 of 2 Phill.): "As between these two, can their supposed evasion of the law be set up as a defence by one against the otherwise clear title of the other? In this partnership, can the one tenant in common dispute the title common to both? Can one of two partners possess himself of the property of the firm, and be permitted to retain it, if he can show that, in realizing it, some provision in some Act of Parliament has been violated or neglected? Can one of these two partners, in any trade, defeat the other by showing that there was some irregularity in passing the goods through the custom house? The answer to this, as to the former case, will be that the transaction is completed and closed, and will not be in any manner affected by what the court is asked to do as between the parties." Therefore, in the present case, I say that, if it be made out that there was something illegal in this kind of wagering, yet, if the loser has not raised the question of illegality, but has paid the money over, it is not recoverable back by the other party. But it is not necessary to go so far here, because there is nothing illegal in horseracing. As to the other point that was raised by Mr. Graham, viz., that this cheque was a void security under sect. 1 of the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 41, I agree with my learned brothers that that objection is not maintainable. The securities made void by that Act are securities given in payment of a gambling debt. This cheque was not given for the security of such debt, but in payment of half the amount of money which had been received by the defendant, and which he actually had in his possession at the time, and was bound to account for to the plaintiff.

Municipal Corporations Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76), s. 102—Municipal Corporations Act Amendment Act (24 & 25 Vict. c. 75) s. 5—Clerk of the peace for the county—Clerk to the justices of the borough—Appointment of same person to both offices—Legality of appointment—Appointing or continuing—Liability of justices to penalty under sect. 5—Action by informer—Construction and operation of statute.

The Municipal Corporations Act Amendment Act of 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 75), s. 5, repeals certain provisions of sect. 102 of the principal Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76), disqualifying certain persons for holding the office of clerk to the justices of a borough, and in lieu thereof enacts that "it shall not be lawful for the justices of any borough to appoint or continue as their clerk any . . . clerk of the peace of such borough, or of the county in which such borough is situate, or the partner of such clerk of the peace . . . and any person who shall in anywise offend in the premises shall, for every such offence, forfeit and pay the sum of 100l., one moiety, &c. Provided that nothing herein contained shall prevent the justices of any borough from re-appointing as their clerk any clerk of the peace, or partner of such clerk of the peace, of their borough, or of the county in which such borough is situate, who, at the time of the passing of this Act shall be, or who shall not, at the time of such re-appointment, have ceased to be, the clerk of such justices."

In June 1845, F., who, from before 1840, had been, and still was, a partner in the firm of P. and F., attorneys and solicitors, in the borough of N., in the county of M., being a borough having a separate commission of the peace, under the Municipal Corporations Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76), was appointed, and acted as clerk to the justices of the said borough. In March 1848, P., being still a member of the said firm, was appointed and acted as clerk of the peace for the county of M., and continued as such until his death, in June 1874. Soon after his appointment P. appointed F. his deputy clerk of the peace, and since 1870 F. discharged all the duties of the office down to P.'s death. Upon the passing of the Municipal Corporations Act Amendment Act (24 & 25 Vict. c. 75) in 1861, the justices of the said borough re-appointed F. as their clerk, and he continued to act as such clerk. On P.'s death F. was, on 24th

June 1874, appointed and accepted the office of clerk of the peace for the said county, and has continued to act as such since that time.

On the 9th Nov. 1874, at a properly convened meeting, the justices of the said borough passed the following resolution:—"If and so far as it may be necessary, in accordance with the provisions of sect. 5 of the statute 24 & 25 Vict. c. 75, Mr. F. be re-appointed clerk to the justices of the said borough." F. has continued to fill the offices and to act as clerk of the peace of the said county, and of clerk to the justices of the said borough thence hitherto. The defendant took part in the meeting of the 9th Nov. 1874, and voted with other justices for the above resolution, and has since continued to act as a justice of the peace for the said borough, and so acted on the 13th Nov. 1874.

The plaintiff brought a qui tam action against the defendant to recover 100*l.* penalty, and by the first count of his declaration charged that the defendant, after the passing of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 75, then being and acting as a justice of the peace for the said borough, did appoint F. to be clerk to the justices of the said borough, he, F., being at the time of the said appointment clerk of the peace for the county of M., contrary to the form, &c. And by the second count he charged that the defendant being and acting as such magistrate as aforesaid, wilfully and unlawfully continued the said F. as clerk to the said justices, between the 3rd June and the 13th Nov. 1874, after the passing of the said last-mentioned Act, and contrary to the form, &c.

The notice of action delivered by the plaintiff related only to the appointing and continuing F. as clerk to the justices on the 13th Nov. 1874, he being at the time clerk of the peace for the county.

On a special case stated by order of the judge at Nisi Prius, it was Held, by the court (Kelly, C.B., and Cleasby and Pollock, BB.), giving judgment for the defendant, that although the holding of the two offices together by one individual is illegal within the general purview of the two Acts of Parliament (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, and 24 & 25 Vict. c. 75), yet by the express terms of the proviso in sect. 5 of the latter Act, which was inserted to save vested interests existing at the passing of the Act, the appointment or re-appointment of F. as justices' clerk in Nov. 1874, was rendered lawful by reason that he was at the time of the passing of the Act, in 1861, clerk to the justices of the said borough.

Per Cleasby, B.—The operation of the proviso in sect. 5 is not confined to one act of appointment or re-appointment, and the justices may re-appoint from time to time a person who fulfils the conditions therein mentioned.

Quære, per Kelly, C.B., whether the merely continuing, without formal re-appointment, a clerk to the justices who has accepted the office of clerk of the peace, would be within the penal provisions of the section, and render the justices liable to a penalty?

SPECIAL CASE.

THIS is one of twenty-six distinct actions brought by the same plaintiff, an informer, against the defendant and other gentlemen, Justices of the Peace for the borough of Newport, Monmouthshire, to recover penalties, under the Municipal Corporations Act Amendment Act of 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 75), sect. 5, and which action came on to be tried before Archibald, J., at the Spring Assizes 1875, at Monmouth, when a verdict was found for the plaintiff by consent for 100*l.* (one penalty) subject to the opinion and determination of the Court of Exchequer upon the following CASE.

1. The borough of Newport, in the county of Monmouth, has a separate commission of the peace, under 5 & 6 Will. 4, cap. 76, sect. 98, but has no recorder or separate quarter sessions for the trial of prisoners, and prisoners committed for trial by the borough justices are tried at the assizes held at Monmouth, or at the general quarter sessions of the peace for the county held at Usk.

3. The defendant became in or about 1850, and still is, a justice of the peace for the borough of Newport.

4. Prior to 1840, Mr. Charles Barton Fox became a partner in the firm of Prothero and Fox, attorneys-at-law and solicitors, practising at Newport, in the county of Monmouth, and in June 1845, Mr. Fox was appointed and acted as clerk to the justices of the borough of Newport.

5. In March 1848, the said Mr. Prothero being still a member of the said firm of Prothero and Fox, was appointed and acted as clerk of the peace for the county of Monmouth, and continued as such clerk of the peace until his death on the 16th June 1874.

6. Mr. Prothero soon after his appointment nominated Mr. Fox deputy clerk of the peace for the said county, and since the year 1870 the said Mr. Fox discharged all the duties of the office down to the said Mr. Prothero's death.

7. Upon the passing of the said Act, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 75, in 1861, the justices of the borough of Newport re-appointed Mr. Fox clerk to the justices of the said borough, and he continued to act as such clerk.

8. On the 24th June 1874, Mr. Fox was appointed to and accepted the office of clerk of the peace for the county of Monmouth, and has continued to act as such clerk of the peace since that time.

9. On the 9th Nov. 1874, at a properly convened meeting, the justices of the borough of Newport passed the following resolution:—"If and so far as it may be necessary, in accordance with the provisions of sect. 5 of the statute 24 & 25 Vict. c. 75, Mr. C. B. Fox be re-appointed clerk to the justices of the said borough."

10. Mr. Fox has continued to fill the office of and act as clerk of the peace for the county of Monmouth, and also to fill the office of and act as clerk to the justices of the said borough of Newport, in the county of Monmouth thence hitherto.

11. The defendant took part in the said meeting held on the 9th Nov. 1874, and voted, with eleven other justices, for the said resolution, and has since continued to act as a justice of the peace for the said borough, and so acted on 13th Nov. 1874.

The notice of action and pleadings herein are set out in the appendix, and are to be referred to and taken as part of this case.

The question for the opinion of the court is, first, whether the notice of action is sufficient, and, secondly, whether, upon the facts above stated, the plaintiff is entitled to recover.

APPENDIX.

Notice, signed by Clennell and Fraser, the attorneys for the plaintiff, and addressed to the defendant, and dated 30th Nov. 1874, that at or soon after the expiration of one calendar month from the time of the said defendants being served with this notice, a writ of summons would be sued out of Her Majesty's Court of Exchequer against him the said defendant at the suit of the said plaintiff, for that he the said defendant, being one of the justices of the said borough of Newport, in the county of Monmouth, on the 13th Nov. 1874, contrary to the statute 24 & 25 Vict. c. 75, appointed or continued as clerk to the justices one C. B. Fox, who was at the time of such appointment or continuance, clerk of the peace of the county in which the said borough is situate, whereby he the said defendant became liable to forfeit and forfeited the sum of 100*l.* to the said plaintiff.

The declaration dated 19th Jan. 1875, in which the plaintiff sued, as well for himself as for the treasurer of the said borough of Newport, charged that the defendant, being one of the justices of and for the said borough, to which borough a separate commission of the peace had been theretofore granted under the provisions of the Municipal Corporations Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76), heretofore, to wit on the 13th Nov. 1874, after the passing of the Municipal Corporations Act Amendment Act (1861) (24 & 25 Vict. c. 75), then being and acting as one of the justices of the peace for the said borough, did appoint one C. B. Fox to be clerk to the justices of the said borough, he, the said C. B. Fox, being at the time of the said appointment the clerk of the peace of and for the said county of Monmouth aforesaid, contrary to the form of the said statute, whereby, and by force of the said statute, the defendant became liable to forfeit, and forfeited, the sum of 100*l.*, one moiety thereof being payable to the said treasurer, and the other moiety thereof to the plaintiff; and thereby and by force of the statute an action hath accrued to the plaintiff, who sues as aforesaid, to demand and have the said sum of 100*l.* of and from the defendant. The second count of the declaration charged that the defendant, being and acting as such magistrate as aforesaid, wilfully and unlawfully continued the said C. B. Fox as clerk to the said justices, between the 30th June 1874 and the 13th Nov. 1874, after the passing of the said last-recited statute, and contrary to the form thereof, whereby and by force of the said statute, the defendant became liable to forfeit, and forfeited, 100*l.*, and an action has accrued to the plaintiff as aforesaid. Claim 200*l.*

Plea, not guilty (by Statutes 24 & 25 Vict. c. 75 (public Act), ss. 5, 8; 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76 (public Act), ss. 102, 133; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 44 (public Act), ss. 8, 9, 11, 12 (added by amendment).

The plaintiff's points: First, that the appointment of the said C. B. Fox as clerk of the peace for the said county, vacated the office of clerk to the justices of the borough of Newport. Secondly, that the said C. B. Fox was, from the 24th June 1874, incapacitated from filling the office of clerk to the justices. Thirdly, that the re-appointment of the said C. B. Fox to the said office was an offence on the part of all persons taking part therein, within the meaning of the statutes in such case made and provided. Fourthly, that acting as a justice of the peace for the borough of Newport, with the said C. B. Fox as clerk, was, after the said 24th June 1874, an offence within the meaning of the statutes in such case made and provided. Fifthly, that the same, after the 9th Nov. 1874, was an offence. Sixthly, that the plaintiff is entitled to the judgment of the court upon the facts stated in the case. Seventhly, that the notice of action is sufficient.

The defendant's points.—First, that the appointment of the said C. B. Fox as clerk of the peace for the county of Monmouth did not vacate the office of clerk to the justices of the borough of Newport; secondly, that the said C. B. Fox was not, from the 24th June 1874, incapacitated from filling, or disqualified for being reappointed to the office of clerk to the justices; thirdly, that it was competent to the said justices, under the circumstances stated in the case, to reappoint the said C. B. Fox as their clerk, under the proviso contained in the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 75, s. 5; fourthly, that the declaration discloses no cause of action against the defendant; fifthly, that no offence against the said statute appears upon the facts stated in the case to have been committed; sixthly, that no sufficient notice of action was given to the defendant, pursuant to 24 & 25 Vict. c. 75, s. 5; and 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 133; and 11 & 12 Vict. c. 44, s. 9; seventhly, that an informer has no right to bring twenty-six actions for thirty-five penalties for one and the same alleged offence; eighthly, that the defendant is entitled to the judgment of the court.

The following is the section of the Municipal Corporations Act Amendment Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 75), on the construction of which the question in the case turned:

Sect. 5. Whereas, by the 102nd section of the principal Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76), it is enacted "that it shall not be lawful for the justices of any borough to appoint or continue as such clerk to the justices, any alderman or councillors of such borough, or clerk of the peace for such borough, or partner of such clerk of the peace, or any clerk or person in the employ of such clerk of the peace; and that it shall not be lawful for the said clerk to the justices, by himself or his partner, to be directly or indirectly interested or employed in the prosecution of any offenders committed for trial by the justices, of whom he shall be such clerk as aforesaid, or any of them, at any court of gaol delivery, or general or quarter session; and that any person being an alderman, or councillor, or clerk of the peace of any borough, or the partner, or clerk, or in the employ of such clerk of the peace who shall act as clerk to the justices of such borough, or shall otherwise offend in the premises, shall, for every such offence, forfeit and pay the sum of 100*l.*, as therein mentioned." And whereas the said provisions have been found to be insufficient for preventing the mischief intended to be prevented, it is hereby enacted that the said provisions of the 102nd section of the principal Act shall be repealed, and from and after the passing of this Act it shall not be lawful for the justices of any borough to appoint or continue as their clerk, any alderman or councillor of such borough, or the clerk of the peace of such borough, or of the county in which such borough is situate, or the partner of any such clerk of the peace, and it shall not be lawful for the clerk to the justices of any borough, by himself or his partner, or otherwise, to be directly or indirectly employed or interested in the prosecution of any offender committed for trial by the justices of such borough or any of them at any court of gaol delivery or general or quarter sessions. And any person who shall in any wise offend in the premises shall, for every such offence, forfeit and pay the sum of 100*l.*, one moiety thereof to the treasurer of such borough, to be paid over to credit and account of the borough fund, and the other moiety thereof, with costs of suit, to any person who may sue for the same in any of His Majesty's Courts of Record at Westminster. Provided, that nothing herein contained shall prevent the justices of any borough reappointing as their clerk any clerk of the peace or partner of such clerk of the peace of their borough, or of the county in which such borough is situate, who at the time of the passing of this Act shall be, or who shall not at the time of such reappointment, have ceased to be, the clerk of such justices.

A. T. Lawrence (with him was Patchett) for the plaintiff.—The question arises under sect. 5 of the Municipal Corporations Act Amendment Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 75). Sect. 5, the general effect of which section is to prevent justices appointing as their clerk one who is also a clerk of the peace for the county. The appointment of Mr. Fox as clerk of the peace for the county, in June 1874, ipso facto vacated his previous appointment of clerk to the justices, so that after that date he continued to be their clerk no longer. Moreover, I contend that, on the passing of the Act of 1861, he ceased to be justices' clerk, because, by the operation of the Act, being at that time the partner of the then clerk of the peace, he was disqualified for the office of clerk to the justices. Upon the passing of that Act, therefore, he was reappointed justices' clerk under the proviso in sect. 5, and so continued until his partner's death in 1874, when he was appointed clerk of the peace, and by accepting that office he vacated the office of clerk to the justices. That, I contend, is the effect of these Acts of Parliament. [POLLOCK, B.—If that be so, the effect would be that a person in that position would not only be liable to a penalty, but all his acts as clerk to the justices would be ipso facto void, and he would cease to be clerk; whereas the statute seems to contemplate a person holding the office and by doing so becoming liable to a penalty.] He vacates the office to this extent, that he must be reappointed, and if reappointed he is liable to a penalty, as also are the persons appointing him. The Act expressly says it shall not be lawful for the justices to "appoint or continue" as their clerk, &c. [KELLY, C.B.—Where is it found that they continued him as clerk after June 1874? The case seems to be silent as to the interval between June and Nov. 1874, when he was, as it is termed, reappointed.] It is clear, I submit, and found by paragraphs 8, 9, and 10 of the case, that he continued to act as justices' clerk from 24th June to his reappointment in November. That reappointment was a nullity and unlawful. The proviso, which was inserted to save vested interests existing at the passing of the Act, was exhausted, and to all purposes satisfied and fulfilled once, and for all, by his reappointment as justices' clerk in 1861. By sect. 102 of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 76 (the Municipal Corporations Act), the justices are required to appoint a clerk; but by a proviso in that section certain persons are disqualified for the appointment, but not clerks of the peace for the county. Then sect. 5 of the Act of 1861, enlarged the area of disqualification, and included clerks of the peace for the county therein, with the proviso, however, saving vested interests then existing. By sect. 66 of the original Act, compensation was given to persons whose office should be abolished, or who should be removed from office by the provisions of the Act, or who should not be reappointed, and there was, therefore, no necessity for a proviso to sect. 102 in that Act similar to that in sect. 5 of the Act of 1861. But, if the defendants' contention is right, the effect will be that a proviso intended simply to save existing vested interests will operate to repeal, not only the provisions of the Act itself, but also the Municipal Corporations Act, because, according to the defendant's view, it will be competent by the use of that proviso, to appoint, at any time, and from time to time, a person to fill these two offices together, by first appointing him clerk to the justices, and then clerk of the peace, and then reappointing him as clerk to the justices. [POLLOCK, B.—Oh, no. What is meant is that he shall not, at the time of such appointment, have ceased to be the clerk of such justices. The whole proviso was clearly meant to provide for the case of a person who at the date of the Act was a justices' clerk. If it be, as you contend, that he ceased to be so on appointment as clerk of the peace, you would be entitled to succeed; but if it be a continuous holding of the appointment, and he did not cease to be clerk to the justices, then he comes within the proviso, and the reappointment must be taken together with his holding of the office at the date of the Act.] The penalty is recoverable, and the action is for continuing him in his office. If the proviso is to be read disjunctively and literally, according as the words are, the effect will be to repeal the Act; but ample force is given to it by reading it as securing Mr. Fox's vested interests from 1861 to 1874. [CLEASBY, B.—Sect. 102 deals with clerks of the peace for boroughs, and sect. 5 extends to that office in counties. By its express terms the section supposes that that a borough clerk of the peace can act as justices' clerk, for he is to forfeit 100*l.* if he does so. He can act, therefore, as such clerk, and the office, therefore is not de facto vacated.] Whatever the status of the person taking the office may be, and whether his acts be lawful or not, the justice who continues him in the office is liable to the penalty. [CLEASBY, B.—The notice of action is for one act of appointing or continuing on the 13th Nov. and you cannot go back to the interval from June, and say they continued him. POLLOCK, B.—You are confined to the dates in the paragraph when the defendant took part in the meeting of the 9th Nov.] Unless justified by the proviso they are liable; but the proviso applies to re-appointing only. If the office was not vacated in June 1874, it was only because they continued him; then they re-appoint him, and say it is within the proviso, because he never ceased to be their clerk, thus setting up their own illegal act. The day before re-appointment he either was or was not their clerk. If he was, no re-appointment was necessary, and if he was not, it could only be because the accepting and acting in the office of clerk of the peace vacated the other office. He referred to the cases of

H. Mattheus, Q.C. (with him Jelf), for the defendant, contra.—The justices, who re-appointed or concurred in re-appointing Mr. Fox on the 9th Nov., acted within the proviso in sect. 5, and the defendant is not liable to this penal action, even assuming him to be within the penal portion of the section. Now in 1861, Mr. Fox was clerk to the borough justices, and therefore, on the face of the proviso, the act in which the defendant concurred is within its terms. But says the plaintiff, the word "or" in the proviso must be read "and," and the whole proviso be read as "who at the time of the passing of this Act shall be, and who shall not at the time of such reappointment have ceased to be, the clerk of such justices." Now such a change in the language of a penal statute might at once be demurred to; but it will not help the plaintiff, because Mr. Fox had not de facto ceased to be justices' clerk. My friend says that the legal operation of his appointment as clerk of the peace was to affect his other office, and that, eo instanti, he ceased to be justices' clerk. But if so, the proviso would be inopportune and incapable of operation in every case. There could be no case immediately after the passing of the Act in which it could have operated, because, according to the plaintiff's contention, immediately upon the passing of the Act the holding the office of clerk of the peace, or being partner of one who held it, would vacate the office of justices' clerk, and so, eo instanti, there would be a break in the continuity of the holding of the latter office, and Mr. Fox's reappointment in 1861 would be, therefore, bad, and not justified by the proviso. But a reasonable time must always elapse before the justices can meet and resolve whether they will act upon the proviso and reappoint their old clerk or appoint some other person. The plaintiff's construction is neither a reasonable nor a right one, and it would be monstrous to say (as it must be said if that construction is to prevail) that because a justices' clerk was appointed clerk of the peace on one day, and a justice was suddenly called on the next day to do some necessary magisterial act, and, there being no other person to act as his clerk except the clerk so appointed clerk of the peace, therefore the justice is to be held to have "continued" the man as clerk, and to be liable to 100*l.* penalty for so doing. No doubt the main intention of the proviso was to save vested interests, but it gave the justices the power to reappoint their existing clerks with whom they were satisfied, if they or their partners should afterwards become clerks of the peace. It does not require, as the plaintiff contends, that at the date of the Act the person to be reappointed should have held both offices together. But it says in effect, "If you were justices' clerk at that time, inasmuch as a new enactment is introduced which may deprive you of that office, we will leave it in the justices' power who have employed you continuously to reappoint you." And it then goes on to say, "You must not have ceased to be clerk to the justices." (He was here stopped by the court.)

BROWN v. EVANS.

Lawrence, for the plaintiff, did not reply.

KELLY, C.B.—I think that in an action for penalties like the present one, we must really look to the substance of the provisions of the Act, and unless something is there found which compels us, applying the ordinary rules of construction to the language of the Legislature, to hold that this gentleman has become liable to the penalty which is here sought to be enforced against him, that we should hold him not liable and say that he is entitled to the judgment of the court. Now the general effect of these Acts is this, that these two offices of clerk of the peace and clerk to the borough justices cannot be held together; that is to say, that the office of clerk to the borough justices shall not be held by anyone who is either clerk of the peace for the borough, or clerk of the peace for the county in which such borough is situate, or a partner of the one or the other of such officers. The question is, whether anything has been done here in violation of the evident general intention of the Legislature to prevent these two offices being held together by the same individual. And if within the Act of Parliament we find any provision which, as I have said, applying the ordinary rules applicable to the construction of the language of the Legislature, compels us to come to such a conclusion, we must conform to the law. We have then to consider whether this case comes within the words of the Act of 1861. Now, no doubt when we look at the 5th section of that Act of Parliament, we find a direct enactment that it shall not be lawful for the justices of a borough to appoint or continue as their clerk (among other persons described) "any clerk of the peace for the county in which such borough is situate." Now, here there can be no doubt that the borough justices have not only continued but they have actually appointed a person who at the time he was so appointed, and at the time he was re-appointed, as it has been called, to the office of clerk to the borough justices, held the office of clerk of the peace for the county in which the borough is situate, and therefore it would clearly be within that provision. It is unnecessary to consider whether the mere continuing the clerk to the justices without more, without any formal appointment or re-appointment, would be within the Act, because this is not an action for penalties incurred between June 1874 and Nov. 1874, the times respectively when he was appointed clerk of the peace for the county, and re-appointed clerk to the justices of the borough; therefore I offer no opinion upon that. It must not be supposed, however, that I think any penalties could have been recovered, although I do not say that they could not have been, in respect of acts done during that interval of time. But he has been reappointed. He was appointed clerk of the peace for the county in June 1874; he was appointed, or reappointed, I care not which, clerk to the borough justices in Nov. 1874; and the question is whether that latter appointment or reappointment is within and authorised by the proviso which we find at the end of the fifth section of the Act of Parliament. Now, the words of that proviso are these: "Provided that nothing herein contained shall prevent the justices of any borough re-appointing as their clerk any clerk of the peace or partner of such clerk of the peace of their borough, or of the county in which such borough is situate, who," and here come the important words upon which the question whether the appointment or re-appointment is valid or void really depends, "who at the time of the passing of this Act shall be, or who shall not at the time of such re-appointment have ceased to be, the clerk of such justices." Now, I do not enter into the question whether this gentleman had ceased to be the clerk to the justices. Nothing can be more clear than that he was at the time of the passing of this Act clerk to the justices. Whether he has continued such during the whole interval or not is not the question, unless the learned counsel for the plaintiff is right in saying that the word "or," in the proviso should be read "and." I take the words as I find them, and nothing can be clearer than this—if the validity of this appointment or reappointment depends upon the very words of this section, it clearly appears within these very words, that Mr. Fox was, at the time of the passing of this Act in 1861, clerk to the borough justices. Then it is said that we are to read the word "or" as "and,"

BROWN v. EVANS.

and that both requisites must concur, namely not only that he should have been clerk to the borough justices at the passing of the Act in 1861, but also that he should not at the time of such re-appointment have ceased to be such clerk. I do not think that in an action for penalties, where really there has been no violation of anything obviously within the intention of the Legislature, we should be justified in substituting the one word for the other in order to make a gentleman liable to penalties for an act which is within the words of the whole of the Act or Acts of Parliament taken together, and which is in itself entirely blameless and, for aught that we know, expedient and necessary, in the state of the county in which the appointment has been made. Upon this ground, therefore, that we must read the Act as we find it, although the holding of these two offices together by one individual is illegal within the general purview of the two Acts of Parliament read together, yet finding that by the express words of the proviso in the 5th section of the Act of 1861, the act of appointment is rendered lawful by reason that the gentleman in question was, at the time of the passing of that Act, clerk to the borough justices. I am clearly of opinion that his re-appointment in Nov. 1874 was lawful, and that from that time forth he acted as clerk to the borough justices, and, consequently, that the act of re-appointment itself by the magistrate in question is not a subject of an action for penalties.

CLEASBY, B.—I am quite of the same opinion. The case depends entirely upon the proviso in the 5th section of the 24th & 25th Vict. c. 75. A person who is clerk of the peace for a county or borough is in general disqualified for being clerk to the justices, and the appointment of such a person would be altogether illegal. It might be void possibly, but would be altogether illegal. But previous to this Act there is no disqualification, and therefore a person might have had the status of clerk to the justices with the right to appointment as clerk of the peace for the county. That was the position of this gentleman. It seems to me pretty obvious that it was thought not to be right to deprive such a person of that which was, to a certain extent, annexed to that status, as they would be depriving him of it without compensation; and therefore the proviso is framed to meet that particular case. Now, what would properly take place, I apprehend, upon the appointment as clerk of the peace of a person who was clerk to the justices, would be that, as he held that latter office during the pleasure of the justices, the justices would at their first meeting displace him and appoint another person. That would be the ordinary course of things, and what ought to happen, and what would ordinarily happen. But the proviso gives them another alternative, and this particular proviso, which is a proviso in the penalty clause, is, no doubt, according to the ordinary rules of construction, to be read either strictly or literally as far as it is to the interest of the person who is sued to read it so. This proviso is in the terms which have been referred to, and it is contended on the part of the defendant that, being within the first part of the proviso, is of itself sufficient. But, says the learned counsel for the plaintiff, you ought not, where you have an alternative introduced by the word "or," to read it in any other way than as a complete alternative, or to make it a separate case. There is something to be said in favour of that, no doubt. But if you were to read the first part as separate you must read the second part as separate too. I must say that the learned counsel for the plaintiff has produced a conclusive argument to show that you cannot read the second part of that alternative separately, as enabling the appointment of any person who, at the time of the re-appointment, happened to be clerk to the justices. It seems to me to be quite a satisfactory argument, and it would really be in a roundabout way defeating the intention of the Act of Parliament altogether to enable them to have a fresh person—it might be clerk to the justices who was appointed from time to time clerk of the peace. I have, therefore, very great difficulty in acceding to that part of the argument of the learned counsel for the defendant. It is sufficient, however, to refer to the first alternative. We must look at the whole proviso, and it appears to me that the real and the only question in this case is, whether the operation of this proviso had been exhausted by the reappointment of Mr. Fox after the passing of the Act of 1861. I think there is a good deal to be said in favour of that, and much also against it. If you look at the words, they would seem rather to point to one appointment. All it says is that nothing therein contained shall prevent the justices from doing this act, that is from reappointing as their clerk any clerk of the peace. As soon as they have reappointed the act is done. Then it is said, on the other side, that that would be giving a limited meaning to the section. But we must, of course, have some regard to the nature of the proviso; and the conclusion at which I have arrived is that it is not confined to one act of appointment or re-appointment, and that they may reappoint from time to time a person who fulfilled the conditions therein mentioned. A man might have two or three partners. He might be clerk of the peace and he might be clerk to the justices at the time the Act was passed, and one of his partners might be appointed clerk of the peace of the county. Soon afterwards he might die and another of his partners might be appointed clerk of the peace of the county. It strikes me that the rational construction would be to say that we will still give him the privilege which he would have had but for this Act being extended to clerks of the peace of the county, as long as he fulfils the conditions of being clerk to the justices at the time of the passing of the Act, or clerk to the justices at the time when the office of clerk of the peace was accepted; and that this re-appointment might still be made. I do not feel any difficulty whatever as regards Mr. Fox's appointment between June and November 1874, because some time must reasonably and necessarily be allowed to elapse between the acceptance of the one office and the appointment to the other.

POLLOCK, B.—I also think that the plaintiff here has failed to make out any case against the defendant, under this Act of Parliament. Looking at the facts which are here stated, it seems to me to be unnecessary to consider what is the precise status of a clerk to the justices, who is also appointed a clerk of the peace anterior to his re-appointment as clerk to the justices, because the only case which could be made out against the present defendant upon the present facts, is the charge that he appointed one C. B. Fox to be clerk to the justices of the said borough. That, of course, is pointed to his reappointment, which is alleged in the case to have taken place upon the 9th Nov. 1874. Now, was that reappointment one that could be legally made or not? To answer that question, I think we must consider what was the intention of the 5th section of the Act of 1861. There seems to me to be, by the express words of that section, two clear intentions of the Legislature, and if that be so, we must follow those intentions to see how far they govern, so far as intentions can govern, the different parts of the section. Now the first intention is that a person who is a clerk to the justices ought not to hold certain other offices besides that office, one of which other offices is the office of clerk of the peace of the county. But the other intention, which is equally clear, is to protect, as is common in cases of this kind in this country, what are called vested interests. The vested interests of whom? Not the vested interests of the clerk of the peace, for this Act has nothing to do with that, but it is the vested interests of the clerk to the justices, and that, therefore, would require that the person, who accepts the office of clerk to the justices previous to the passing of this Act in 1861, should never have taken from him the opportunity of holding jointly with that office the other office which he might, previously to and but for this Act, have held. Otherwise it might be argued, and the ordinary argument might fairly be used, that he was induced to accept an office, and, having accepted it, and having given up other things for it, was cut down by the Legislature without compensation. That being so, I do not myself see that there is any very great difficulty in saying, that being the object and intention of the clause, that the words, "who at the time of the passing of this Act shall be," &c. of course mean that he must hold the office at the time of the passing of the Act. That this gentleman did; "or who shall not, at the time of such reappointment, have ceased to be the clerk of such justices." As I said before, I consider it unnecessary here to consider what his status was after his accepting the appointment of clerk of the peace, and before his reappointment as clerk to the justices. Although I should not, I confess, have much difficulty in dealing with that question if the facts were clear. It appears to me that the words "or who shall not at the time of such reappointment have ceased to be," &c., mean that he shall be a person who held the office at the time of the passing of the Act, and who has, either by resignation or otherwise, ceased to hold it, and then has been reappointed. If he had ceased to hold it voluntarily, and was unduly reappointed, any status or right which he might enjoy by way of vested interest would have ceased to exist, and the proviso in this section of the Act would not apply. In this case it appears to me that he has not, by anything which has occurred, ceased to be a clerk to the justices within the meaning of this section or the proviso, and that, therefore, the case against the defendant fails.

REDGATE (app.) v. HAYNES (resp.)

Licensing Act 1872, s. 16, sub-s. 1—"Suffering" gaming by connivance of servant—Evidence of connivance.

In order to convict a licensed person of suffering gaming within the meaning of the 16th section of the Licensing Act 1872, it is not necessary to show actual knowledge. It is enough to show connivance, and the connivance of the servant is the connivance of the master.

R. kept an hotel at Epsom, in which a gentleman from Newmarket took three rooms, and invited a trainer and a jockey to stay with him. R. went to bed at 11 p.m., leaving a hall porter in charge of the house.

The porter retired to the extreme end of the house for the night. While the porter was so stationed the guests above-mentioned played cards for money, with much noise, but no interruption on the part of R. The justices drew the inference that the porter had retired at the instigation of R., and in order that he might not hear what passed.

Held, that it could not be said that there was no evidence from which the justices might draw such inference, and a conviction of R. for suffering gaming affirmed.

This was a case stated under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, by two justices for the county of Surrey, and the following are the material parts of such case:

The respondent was a sergeant of the Metropolitan Police Force, stationed at Epsom, and the appellant the landlady of the King's Head Hotel, High-street, Epsom.

The information was laid under sect. 17, sub-sect. 1, of the Licensing Act 1872, which enacts as follows:

If any licensed person suffers any gaming to be carried on on his premises, he shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding for the first offence 10l.

It was proved on the part of the respondent, by three witnesses, that, whilst standing in the public street, at the window of the room where the play took place, they could hear the conversation, owing to the loud tone of voice in which it was conducted. That three persons, one a horse trainer, called James Nightingall, and another, a jockey, called Henry Constable (both being inhabitants of Epsom), were, together with Charles Groucock, gentleman, of Newmarket (temporarily staying at the King's Head Hotel), playing at cards for money in a room in the house of the appellant, between 1.30 and 2.30 a.m. on the 7th Jan. 1875. It was subsequently admitted by the said Charles Groucock, who was called as a witness for the defence, that he and the said James Nightingall and Henry Constable were at such time and place playing at cards for money.

No direct evidence was given that the appellant knew of the gaming, and it was contended on her behalf that she was in ignorance that play for money was going on in her house at the time stated, and, therefore, that she did not suffer gaming within the words of the Act.

The appellant gave evidence in her own defence, and also called the witnesses whose names and depositions are hereinafter stated.

Q.B. Div.]

REDGATE (app.) v. HAYNES (resp.)

1. Elizabeth Redgate, the appellant, deposed :

That she was defendant in the case. She had a gentleman of the name of Groucock, who had, on the 30th Dec. last, taken a sitting room and two bedrooms, and, on the evening of the 6th Jan., had taken another bedroom. He had been a visitor in the house before; he was, on the evening of the 6th, an occupier of rooms in the house. The house was closed at eleven o'clock on the 6th; she went into the room on the right hand side of the hall, a little before eleven o'clock, to ask if any refreshments were required before closing. Mr. Nightingall and Mr. Groucock were then in conversation, and they did not require anything. She afterwards closed the house, and did not go into the room again; she saw no cards, and did not supply any; she had no cards in the house, and had never seen any, and did not know of any card playing. As she came away she told the hall porter she was going to bed; she then locked up the bar and went to bed. Mr. Groucock had engaged two bedrooms, and then a third for that night, and all three gentlemen stayed in the house that night. Mr. Groucock had the exclusive use of the room for the seven days mentioned, and he was still there. One night Mr. Nightingall was there. The said bedrooms were occupied by Mr. Groucock and Mr. Constable, and the third by Mr. Nightingall.

2. John Matthews deposed :

That he was hall porter at the King's Head. It was his duty to close the house, and attend on customers. betting and gaming were strictly prohibited in the house and notices similar to that produced, which was in the following words, "Subscribers and visitors are respectfully informed that betting cannot be permitted," were hung around the billiard room. On the night of the 6th Jan. Mr. Groucock had the occupation of the room on the right hand side, with Mr. Constable; he had the exclusive use of it. A little before eleven o'clock, on the evening of the 6th, he saw Miss Redgate go to this room, and when she came away she said she was going to bed. She then closed the bar and went to bed. He (John Matthews) closed the house and retired to his own chair, in a parlour beyond the bar, at the extreme end of the house. He attended the door, and saw the police come in.—He knew nothing whatever of any gambling, and did not go into the room after eleven o'clock till Mr. Groucock went to bed, when he turned the light out.

3. Charles Groucock deposed :

That he resided at Foley House, Newmarket, and was of independent means. On the 6th Jan. he was residing at the King's Head; he came there on the 31st Dec. 1874, and took a sitting room and two bedrooms, and Mr. Constable was with him the whole time. He (Mr. Groucock) had one, and Mr. Constable the other bedroom. On the evening of the 6th Mr. Nightingall was with him (Mr. Groucock). Just before eleven o'clock Miss Redgate came into his room, to know if he wanted anything more. He asked his guests, and they said no. They were then in conversation. She said she was going to bed. After that they began to play at cards, but Miss Redgate knew nothing whatever of it, and they played till the police came in. There was no concealing the cards; they played for money.

On the above evidence, the justices were of opinion that the appellant knew that gaming was intended to be carried on in her house, and that she instructed the hall porter, who waited up, to go to the parlour beyond the bar, at the extreme end of the house, where it was impossible that he could hear the loud talking that took place, instead of being in his usual position in the hall, where he could have heard everything; that, in fact, the appellant purposely took pains not to know what her guests, two of whom were residents in Epsom, were doing, and therefore it was by her own wilful neglect of proper precautionary measures and provisions on her premises, and through her own default, that the gaming took place. They were also of opinion that, as the word "knowingly" was inserted in the form of licence given in the schedule, and directed to be used by the Act 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, which Act was in force up to the year 1872, the Legislature, by leaving out the word "knowingly" in the Act of 1872, intended to cast upon the licensed persons the onus of taking active measures to prevent gaming on their premises, and that it was not necessary to have stronger and more direct evidence than they had in support of the information, and they thought this view was supported by the fact that in the section immediately preceding the one in question, viz., the 16th section, a penalty is imposed for "knowingly" harbouring a constable.

The decision, therefore, was that the defendant be convicted of the offence with which she was charged, and that she pay a penalty of 5*l.* and costs.

The question of law for the opinion of the court was, whether proof of actual and direct knowledge on the part of the appellant or her servants that play for money was going on on her premises at the time hereinbefore stated, was necessary to support the conviction under sub-sect. 17 of the Licensing Act 1872.

If the court should be of opinion that the said conviction was legally and properly made, the said conviction to stand; but if the court should be of opinion otherwise, the information to be dismissed.

The case came on to be argued before the Court of Queen's Bench on the 12th June 1875, when it was ordered to be restated "specially with reference to any evidence of the hall porter having been sent to an unusual place." The following additional statement was accordingly submitted:—"There was not any direct evidence that the hall porter was sent to an unusual place. His own evidence was that he retired to his own chair, in a parlour beyond the bar, 'at the extreme end of the house.' As the usual place for the hall porter is in the hall, and he stated before us that part of his duty was to wait upon the guests in the sitting room, we drew the inference that the removal of the chair to the greatest possible distance from the room was in order that he might not hear what passed there, and that such removal was directed by the appellant."

Willis, for the appellant, argued that, to bring the appellant within the terms of sect 17, sub-sect. 1, of the Licensing Act 1872, it was necessary to show that the gaming was with the permission of the appellant, and that the case did not disclose any evidence of such permission. He cited Bosley app. v. Davies, resp. (33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 528). In that case a party of gentlemen were playing cards for money in a room of the appellant's licensed premises, and were disturbed by a police constable, who heard them from outside. The appellant's manager knew nothing about it, and it did not appear that any waiter came into the room whilst they were playing. It was held by the court (Cockburn, C.J. and Mellor and Quain, JJ.) that it must appear that there was gross negligence or wilful ignorance on the part of the licensed person or his servant, in order to support a conviction for "suffering gaming." There was no such gross negligence in the present case, and no evidence to warrant the inference which the justices have drawn.

The Attorney-General (Sir J. Holker, Q.C.), for the respondent, argued that there was evidence of constructive knowledge on the part of the appellant, and that she was liable for the acts and omissions of her hall porter, whom she had left in charge of the house.

WEST HAM LOCAL BOARD v. MADDAMS.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of opinion that our judgment ought to be for the respondent. I think that there was evidence on which the justices might draw the conclusion that the appellant had suffered gaming within the meaning of sect. 17, sub-sect. 1, of the Licensing Act 1872. The conviction was for suffering gaming, and that there was gaming in fact is perfectly clear. But the mere fact of the gaming having taken place is not enough; it must be also shown that it took place by the fault or with the connivance of the party convicted, and whether it so took place is a question of fact. But if the landlord goes away, or goes to bed, and leaves another person in charge, he is answerable for the whole conduct of the person so left in charge, and is liable for the connivance of such person. Now what were the facts here? It appears that a gentleman of independent means connected with Newmarket, takes three rooms in the hotel of the appellant, and invites two other persons, the one a jockey the other a trainer, to stay with him in those rooms. Now I do not say that there is any inference in law that three such persons would engage in gaming. But what I do say is, that it is not improbable they would do so. The landlady, knowing the character of these persons, goes to bed leaving the hall porter in charge of the house. Here comes the important part of the case. It was the duty of the hall porter to sit up and look after the wants of all the guests at the hotel. Now upon the first statement of the case, the justices find that the hall porter went away to the furthest part of the house, so that he did not hear the noise made of the gamblers which was heard in the street, and would have been heard by him if he had not changed his place. The justices drew the inference that he went away on purpose, and holding that his connivance was the connivance of his mistress, convicted her. In the amended statement I find they say that there was no direct evidence that the porter went away to an unusual place; but that the evidence was that he retired to the extreme end of the house, and that, "as the usual place for the hall porter's chair is in the hall," and his duty was to wait on the guests in the sitting-room, the justices drew the inference that he retired for the express purpose of not hearing what passed. Now I do not think that the necessary inference was that he went away on purpose. Nor was there any duty upon him to enter the room where the gaming was going on, or to listen at the door. But as his duty was to stay within call and he did not stay within call, might not the justices draw the inference that he went away for the express purpose of not being able to know of the gaming if it should take place? Whether I should draw such an inference myself I am not sure. But I think that Epsom justices might draw such an inference.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. It was not necessary to prove actual knowledge. The offence of "suffering" may be committed by connivance, and the connivance of the servant is the connivance of the master. Now there was some evidence of the connivance of the servant in this case. The justices might, and indeed were bound, to use their general knowledge, and we may assume that they had a general knowledge of the proper place for the hall porter's chair. Whether I should draw the inference which the justices have drawn I do not know. It is enough for us to say that there was some evidence on which they might have drawn it.

WEST HAM LOCAL BOARD v. MADDAMS.

Limitation—Debt upon a statute—Concurrent remedy with summary proceedings (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, s. 69; 24 & 25 Vict. c. 61, s. 24).

By sect. 69 of the Public Health Act 1848, a local board can recover expenses, to be paid by owners in default, in a summary manner; the limitation for such recovery being, by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 11, six months.

By sect. 24 of a similar Act of 1861, proceedings for the recovery of demands below 20l. may, at the option of the local board, be taken in a County Court as upon a debt.

Held, upon appeal from a County Court, that proceedings under the last-mentioned section are barred by a six months' limitation, in the same way as if they were taken in a summary manner.

APPEAL from the Middlesex County Court holden at Bow.

This was an action brought to recover the sum of 13l. 18s. upon the following particulars:

This action is brought to recover a sum of 13l. 18s. payable by the defendant as the owner of certain premises in a certain street, called Victoria Dock-road, as the amount of a certain contribution towards the expenses incurred by the plaintiffs in sewerage, levelling, paving, flagging, and channelling the said street, after notice in writing duly given pursuant to the Public Health Acts and the other Acts incorporated therewith, to the owners and occupiers of the premises adjoining, fronting, and abutting upon such part of the said street as required to be sewered, levelled, paved, flagged, and channelled pursuant to such Acts, such contribution being the proportion settled by the plaintiff's surveyor according to the frontage of the defendant's said premises as the amount to be paid by the owner of the said premises. And the plaintiffs claim the above amount by virtue of the various Public Health Acts, the Local Government Acts, and the West Ham Local Board of Health Act 1867 and the Acts incorporated therewith.

The cause was tried on the 2nd July 1875.

No witnesses were called, but the case was decided on admissions, and the following are the facts of the case:

The defendant was on the 9th Sept. 1862 and still is the owner of certain premises situated in a certain street called Victoria Dock Road, and the plaintiffs are the local board of the district in which the said house and street are situate.

Previously to the 9th Sept. 1862 the said street was not sewered, levelled, paved, flagged, and channelled to the satisfaction of the plaintiffs.

On the 9th Sept. 1862 the plaintiffs duly passed a resolution, conformably with their statutable powers, that the said street should be made up and properly sewered, levelled, paved, flagged, and channelled.

The defendant's house and premises fronted adjoined, and abutted upon the part of the street requiring the above work.

Due notice in writing was given by the plaintiffs to the defendant upon the 20th Sept. 1862, according to the statute, requiring the defendant to sewer, level, pave, flag, and channel, the parts of the said street on which his lands and premises abutted within the time specified in the notice.

The defendant did not execute the said work.

The plaintiffs, under the powers given to them by statute, thereupon proceeded to execute the said work, and their surveyor, upon the 6th Sept. 1865, settled the proportion of the expenses incurred by the plaintiffs in executing the above works to be paid by the defendant, according to the frontage of his premises, at the sum of 13*l.* 18*s.*, and no dispute ever arose between the plaintiffs and the defendant as to the amount.

On the 5th Jan. 1872, the plaintiffs demanded the said sum from the defendant.

No proceedings were taken by the plaintiffs against the defendant until this action was brought on the 26th May 1875.

The defendant gave notice of a special defence, that the cause of action did not arise within six years.

Upon the hearing, it was contended before the said County Court judge, on the part of the plaintiffs, that the action was founded on a statute, and that the period of limitation was twenty years. On the part of the defendant, that it was the same as upon a summary application before justices, and that the option given by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 61, s. 24, must be exercised within six months, and that the plaintiffs were accordingly barred.

In order to enable the case to be put in train for discussion, the judge decided all the points in favour of the defendant, but gave the plaintiffs leave to appeal, it being agreed that the court should have power to make such order as he ought to have made.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether, upon the facts above stated, the right of the plaintiffs to recover the amount was barred by lapse of time. Judgment was to be made as the court should direct.

Day, Q.C. (with him W. G. Harrison) argued for the plaintiffs, the appellants.—The sole question is what period of limitation governs an action of this kind. The plaintiffs are right if the ordinary period in respect of a debt upon a statute—viz., twenty years, is the only limitation (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 3; see Shepherd v. Hills, 25 L. J., Ex. 6.) The Public Health Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict., c. 63), s. 69, enacts that in case any present or future street, or any part thereof (not being a highway) be not sewered, levelled, paved, flagged, and channelled to the satisfaction of the Local Board of Health, such board may, by notice in writing to the respective owners or occupiers of the premises fronting, adjoining, or abutting upon such parts thereof as may require to be sewered, levelled, paved, flagged, or channelled, require them to sewer, level, pave, flag, or channel the same within a time to be specified in such notice. And if such notice be not complied with, the said local board may, if they shall think fit, execute the works mentioned or referred to therein; and the expenses incurred by them in so doing shall be paid by the owners in default, according to the frontage of their respective premises, and in such proportion as shall be settled by the surveyor, or, in case of dispute, as shall be settled by arbitration (having regard to all the circumstances of the case) in the manner provided by this Act, and such expenses may be recovered from the last mentioned owners in a summary manner, or the same may be declared by order of the said local board to be private improvement expenses, and be recoverable as such in the manner hereinafter provided." By 11 & 12 Vict., c. 43, s. 11, it is enacted, "That in all cases where no time is already or shall hereafter be specially limited for making any such complaint or laying any such information in the Act or Acts of Parliament relating to each particular case, such complaint shall be made and such information shall be laid within six calendar months from the time when the matter of such complaint or information respectively arose." Under these two statutes this debt was created, and a special remedy supplied, subject to a six months' limitation. [BLACKBURN, J.—And no action for the debt could lie.] Perhaps so. Then by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 61, s. 24, "Proceedings for the recovery of demands below twenty pounds, which local boards are now empowered by law to recover in a summary manner, may, at the option of the local board, be taken in the County Court as if such demands were debts within the cognisance of such courts." The demand in this case must be treated as any other debt of like kind, that is, a debt upon a statute. The limitation of six months was a mere incident of the summary remedy, and no part of the cause of action. When another remedy was given, there was no application of the limitation to the new remedy. It could not be contended that if the summary remedy had been abolished simply that the debt could not be recovered at all; and in that case the previous limitation would go with the remedy.

Grantham, appeared for defendant.

BLACKBURN, J.—We need not call upon the other side. It is clear to us that the County Court Judge was right in deciding for the defendant. 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, s. 69 enacted that these expenses might be recovered in a summary manner, and gave no other remedy. The Legislature thereby limited the period of such recovery to that which was incident to a summary remedy. Mr. Day argues that if the summary remedy given by this Act had been repealed without any further enactment concerning the debt, an action would lie for twenty years; and, therefore, when a power to recover by action is added to the summary remedy, the result is the same. Whatever might have been the effect of a simple repeal of the summary remedy we need not consider. The later Act, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 61 s. 24, gives local boards an option to recover demands below £20 either in a County Court or in a summary manner as before. It says proceedings may be taken in the County Court as if such demands were debts within the cognisance of such courts. It does not say that a local board may have its choice of the limitation to its demand; such a power to choose would be unreasonable; and there would follow this unreasonable and absurd effect, that if the demand were over £20 the limitation would be six months, if under 20*l.* it would be twenty years. I think the statutes themselves sufficiently show by the words used that the six months' limitation applies to recovery in a County Court as well as in a summary manner, and this

WEST HAM LOCAL BOARD v. MADDAMS.

Limitation—Debt upon a statute—Concurrent remedy with summary proceedings (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, s. 69; 24 & 25 Vict. c. 61, s. 24).

By sect. 69 of the Public Health Act 1848, a local board can recover expenses, to be paid by owners in default, in a summary manner; the limitation for such recovery being, by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 11, six months.

By sect. 24 of a similar Act of 1861, proceedings for the recovery of demands below 20l. may, at the option of the local board, be taken in a County Court as upon a debt.

APPEAL from the Middlesex County Court holden at Bow.

This was an action brought to recover the sum of 13l. 18s. upon the following particulars:

This action is brought to recover a sum of 13l. 18s. payable by the defendant as the owner of certain premises in a certain street, called Victoria Dock-road, as the amount of a certain contribution towards the expenses incurred by the plaintiffs in sewerage, levelling, paving, flagging, and channelling the said street, after notice in writing duly given pursuant to the Public Health Acts and the other Acts incorporated therewith, to the owners and occupiers of the premises adjoining, fronting, and abutting upon such part of the said street as required to be sewered, levelled, paved, flagged, and channelled pursuant to such Acts, such contribution being the proportion settled by the plaintiff's surveyor according to the frontage of the defendant's said premises as the amount to be paid by the owner of the said premises. And the plaintiffs claim the above amount by virtue of the various Public Health Acts, the Local Government Acts, and the West Ham Local Board of Health Act 1867 and the Acts incorporated therewith.

The cause was tried on the 2nd July 1875.

FIELD, J.—I am of the same opinion, and on the same grounds. I observe that by the new Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 150, the old state of things is re-established, and the recovery of expenses can now be only in a summary manner.

REG. v. JUSTICES OF TYNEMOUTH.

Justices—Discretion to refuse summons—Sufficient explanation of grounds of refusal—11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, s. 9.

Justices were applied to for summonses for a conspiracy to break the peace and to do grievous bodily harm to persons at a public meeting, upon statements which those who made them were present to swear. The statements, if true, clearly established such conspiracy, but the justices refused the summonses. Upon a rule for a mandamus to hear and determine the matter, the justices answered by affidavit that they heard the application at length, fully considered and discussed it amongst themselves for about fifty minutes, and then came to the determination that they should not be justified in granting summonses for conspiracy, as the facts before them were not in their opinion sufficient to establish that charge. They further said that two summonses for assault, arising out of the same events, had been granted against some of the persons charged with this conspiracy, and had both failed; that the applicant did not desire to be bound over to prosecute on the refusal of the summonses; and that they were willing to grant further assault summonses if the applicant had so requested.

Held that the evidence in the statements was so strong that the justices must have acted upon some extraneous consideration; that they thereby practically declined to exercise their jurisdiction on the merits of the matter; that their answer was not a sufficient explanation; and that the rule must be made absolute.

THIS was a rule nisi obtained by Philbrick, Q.C. on the 18th Nov., calling upon the mayor and other magistrates of the borough of North Shields, in the county of Northumberland, and also fourteen persons whose names were stated, to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue, directed to the said magistrates, commanding them or some of them to proceed to hear and determine the matter of an application by Roland Kiley for a summons against the said fourteen persons for unlawfully and wilfully combining and conspiring to break the peace and to do grievous bodily harm to several persons at the Albion Assembly Rooms, the Albion Hotel, and elsewhere at North Shields on the 14th Oct. last.

It appeared from affidavits that on the 2nd Nov. last, Mr. Edmund Kimber, the solicitor of the said Roland Kiley, the prosecutor, appeared before the said magistrates at their court of petty sessions, and read over certain written statements made and signed by the prosecutor and five other persons, all of whom were there present and prepared to swear to the truth of the same. He applied for summonses against the said fourteen persons upon the charge stated in the rule, but the magistrates refused the application.

The prosecutor's statement was that he was a member of the Magna Charta Association, and that the association had hired the Albion Assembly Rooms for the evening of the 14th Oct. for the purpose of a lecture by Dr. Kenealy upon the Tichborne case. The meeting was advertised by public placards, and the charges for entrance were 2s, 1s, and 6d. The rooms were much crowded at the time of the lecture, and before it commenced a general row and free fight took place, in which the said fourteen persons charged were all concerned. They were in time turned out of the rooms, but they waylaid and assaulted the prosecutor and Dr. Kenealy, as the latter afterwards entered the Albion Hotel, where they were staying.

One of the other persons who made statements alleged that he picked a piece of gun cotton out of a crevice between the floor and skirting board, by which some of these fourteen persons had attempted to set the assembly rooms on fire. Another alleged that he saw one of them throwing cayenne pepper about the place, making many persons sneeze violently, and others letting off crackers and other fireworks in the rooms. It was also alleged by two of the persons, whose statements were read, that one of the fourteen charged, named Short, invited them beforehand to join his party; that Short before the meeting stood liquor at the Albion Hotel to about twenty people, and gave them instructions to go to the meeting and kick up a row. He also said "You must get hold of Dr. Kenealy and break his head; kill him if you can. You need not be frightened, as I will pay all damages and expenses." Some of these twenty people were afterwards seen dividing some money which Short had given them. One of the statements was made by John Mitcheson, the keeper of the hall and assembly rooms, who corroborated what the others stated concerning the rioting at the meeting, and added that one of the fourteen named Pye assaulted him and was summoned by him in consequence; that Pye's solicitor came to him the day before the hearing of the summons and offered him 2l. to withdraw the case; that at the last moment Pye would not agree to the terms proposed by his solicitor, and in consequence his (Mitcheson's) witnesses were not all present when the case came on to be heard. The Bench refused an adjournment and dismissed the case.

The justices of the peace for the borough of North Shields, who were sitting at petty sessions on the 2nd Nov., made an affidavit in answer to the rule.

After setting out the charge and application for summonses, this affidavit proceeded:

3. North Shields is in the borough of Tyne-mouth, and there is no borough of North Shields.

4. The said E. Kimber addressed us at considerable length, and referred to facts which he stated he was in a condition to prove, and read to us at length the whole of the statements comprised in the exhibit to the affidavits of R. Kiley and others dated the 4th Nov. last, and referred to in the rule in this case. He [redacted] upon such statements, and argued [redacted] to grant summonses against the persons charged for the offence mentioned. He also addressed us as to the law of conspiracy.

5. At the conclusion of the address of the said E. Kimber, we retired to consider the application, we fully considered and discussed amongst ourselves and with our clerk the matters brought before us by the said E. Kimber for about fifty minutes, and then came to the conclusion that we should not be justified in granting summonses against any of the said persons for the offence of conspiracy, as the facts brought before us were not in our opinion sufficient to justify us in summoning the said persons, or any of them, to answer for such offence. On our return into court this deponent, H. E. P. Adamson (the then mayor), informed the said E. Kimber that the bench declined to grant the application.

6. We further say that we did, on the 2nd Nov. last, fully hear and determine the matter of the application made by the said R. Kiley through his solicitor the said E. Kimber for a summons against the said persons charged with the offence mentioned.

7. No sworn informations were laid before us in due form, but we did not refuse the application on that ground, as the said E. Kimber stated that the persons who had signed the statements which he read to us were prepared to swear to the truth of them.

8. We further make oath and say that no application was made to us on the refusal of the summonses or at any other time to take the recognisances of the said R. Kiley or any other person to prosecute the said persons charged with the offence, mentioned, under and in pursuance of 22 & 23 Vict. c. 17.

9. In answer to the statement of J. Mitcheson referred to in the said affidavit of R. Kiley and others, we say that on the 15th Oct. last the said J. Mitcheson informed the said E. Young, one of the deponents that J. Pye did, on the 14th Oct. last in the said borough, assault and beat the said J. Mitcheson. The assault referred to being an assault which was alleged to have been committed by the said J. Pye on the said J. Mitcheson at the meeting held at the Albion Assembly Rooms, and referred to in the affidavits and statements on which the rule was moved. The said E. Young at once granted a summons against the said J. Pye which was returnable on the 20th Oct. last at the police court aforesaid.

10. On that day the said J. Pye duly appeared in pursuance of the said summons before the said H. E. P. Adamson, one of the deponents, and others of Her Majesty's justices of the peace for the said borough, being the justices of the peace for the said borough then assembled and sitting, and the said J. Mitcheson and one T. Ellison were called as witnesses in support of such summons and others, G. Hodge and R. Atkinson, were called as witnesses on behalf of the defendant. After hearing the said case the said justices then sitting dismissed the said summons on the merits.

11. We further say that we were not aware that any offer had been made to settle that case out of court. An adjournment of the case was refused by the said justices then sitting, because they were of opinion that the complainant had had every opportunity of preparing his case between the date of the application for the summons, viz. 15th Oct. last, and the said 20th Oct. last, and further that there was no sufficient cause shown to them why the same should be adjourned.

12. In addition to the summons before referred to, the said E. Young, one of the deponents, granted a summons against R. Kidd the younger, on the said 15th Oct. last for an assault, alleged to have been committed by him on the said R. Kiley at the said meeting on the 14th Oct. last.

13. This summons was returnable on the 20th Oct. last at half past ten o'clock in the forenoon, and the defendant duly appeared in pursuance thereof, when it was called on in its turn for hearing at about eleven o'clock; but the said R. Kiley, the informant, although duly called, did not appear by himself or his attorney, but some person in court, a barber by trade, applied to the justices then sitting, as a friend of the said R. Kiley, to adjourn the hearing of the summons. The said defendant objected to the adjournment, and stated that he was there ready with his witnesses to go into the case on the merits, and as no notice of an intended application for an adjournment had been previously given, and as no sufficient reason was given why the said R. Kiley was not in attendance to support his information, the said summons was dismissed.

14. And we further say that we were willing to grant summonses against any persons who had committed any assault or breach of the peace at the said meeting, and to fully hear and determine the case on the merits, but we declined to grant any summonses for conspiracy as requested, on the ground that the said R. Kiley had failed to satisfy us that there was sufficient evidence to warrant us in so doing.

15. No other summonses were applied for than those before mentioned.

Poland (with him Hawkins, Q.C.) showed cause. —Justices are the sole judges of whether a prima facie case is made out; and if they hear and determine the matter, no appeal lies from their decision. The words with which sect. 9 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42 commences are "That upon such information and complaint being so laid as aforesaid, the justice or justices receiving the same may, if he or they shall think fit, issue his or their summons or warrant respectively as hereinbefore is directed, to cause the person charged as aforesaid to be and appear before him or them" . . . "to be dealt with according to law." Here the justices did not think fit to issue summonses, and this court cannot interfere. Even if it be considered that these statements disclose an indictable offence, the justices, being without limit as to their discretion, might well have applied their knowledge obtained on the previous assault summonses, and have deemed the statements so exaggerated as to be insufficient to establish even a prima facie case. A further objection to this rule is that another remedy was open to the prosecutor. He might have applied to be bound over to prosecute under the Vexatious Indictments Act 1859. [BLACKBURN, J.—Does that provision apply where the summons is refused?] By the second section (22 & 23 Vict. c. 17) it is enacted "That where any charge or complaint shall be made before any one or more of Her Majesty's Justices of the Peace that any person has committed any of the offences aforesaid within the jurisdiction of such justice, and such justice shall refuse to commit or to bail the person charged with such offence to be tried for the same, then in case the prosecutor shall desire to prefer an indictment respecting the said offence, it shall be lawful for the said justice and he is hereby required to take the recognizance of such prosecutor to prosecute the said charge or complaint, and to transmit such recognizance, information, and depositions, if any, to the court in which such indictment ought to be preferred, in the same manner as such justice would have done in case he had committed the person charged to be tried for such offence." [BLACKBURN, J.—Can a prosecutor claim to be bound over when a summons is refused?] The words "depositions, if any," in this section go to show that the provision was intended to apply before as well as after the taking of depositions. With respect to this section, in the case of Ex parte Wason (L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 573), Cockburn, C.J., said, "I entirely agree that, supposing the matter brought before the magistrate had been matter cognisable by the criminal law, and upon which an indictment might have been prepared, the magistrate would have had no discretion, but would have been bound to proceed as directed by the statute; and if in such a case the magistrate had refused to receive the information, it would have been the duty of this court ex debito justitiae to grant a rule or issue a mandamus commanding the magistrate to take the recognizances."

The Solicitor General (Sir Hardinge Giffard, Q.C.) supported the rule.—Sect. 9 of Jervis's Act no doubt gives to magistrates a discretion as to granting or refusing summonses; but in this case it may be said they exercised no discretion at all, or at any rate on no legal grounds. This distinction was drawn in Reg. v. Boteler (4 B. & S. 959), where justices had refused to issue a warrant against the overseer of an extra-parochial place, which had just been made a parish, for levying the amount of a contribution order by the Union under 2 & 3 Vict. c. 84, s. 1. Justices are thereby empowered to issue such warrant if they "shall think fit." The only objection by the overseer was that the order was unjust and unreasonable, the new parish having no paupers of its own; the justices refused the warrant, as they stated, in the exercise of their discretion. Cockburn, C.J., asked during the argument, "Is not the refusal to issue the warrant virtually declining jurisdiction?" And he said in his judgment, at p. 364, "I do not intend in the slightest degree to encroach upon the doctrine that, where magistrates have a discretionary power to decide whether they will do an act or not, this Court will not order them to do it when they have exercised their discretion upon the merits of the matter. But it is clear upon the facts of the present case that they have not exercised that discretion which in law they would have been justified in exercising." In all these cases the limit of discretion must be a question of degree, and here the statements so clearly establish a prima facie case of conspiracy that the justices must have acted upon some other than legal grounds in refusing summonses. [COCKBURN, C.J.—We might think the magistrates were wrong, but can we review their decision? Can there be an appeal in this way from an erroneous act of discretion? BLACKBURN, J.—Probably the magistrates thought it better to put a stop to any further litigation about the matter. May not they exercise their discretion on that ground? Poland.—That is not the ground they give. They say they decided upon the merits.

[BLACKBURN, J.—Unless these statements are false, there was clearly a conspiracy.] It is not for magistrates to put a stop arbitrarily to legal proceedings. They here give no grounds for this exercise of their discretion. Why are they to be, therefore, in a better position than if their admitted grounds were insufficient? They probably thought the applicant did not deserve any favour from them; but they ought not to have refused him justice.

COCKBURN, C. J.—Upon the whole, although this is a matter of some perplexity, I am of opinion that the rule should be made absolute. Nothing can be more clear than that this court has no appellate jurisdiction to review a decision of magistrates on a question of fact, after they have once heard and decided it in a manner within their authority. In a case like this, in which the statutes have given us no appellate power, if I could see my way to the conclusion that the magistrates had considered and acted upon this evidence, I should certainly say that, in conformity with the principles upon which we have always acted, we could not interfere further nor send the matter before the magistrates again. The Solicitor General, however, has called our attention to the statements upon which the charge was made, and it appears to me that the evidence they contain is very strong. And I cannot help thinking that when the magistrates refused to issue summonses upon it, they must have acted upon something of an extraneous and extra-judicial character which ought to have influenced their decision. If so, they have practically declined to exercise their jurisdiction on the merits of the matter as it was then before them. If they had this evidence from the witnesses on oath, after having issued the summonses, and had then determined that the witnesses were not trustworthy, and they did not believe their sworn testimony, the matter would have been one entirely in which they were the sole judges, and this court would have been precluded from interfering. But our conclusion is, that the magistrates here did not so consider the trustworthiness or credibility of the evidence before them. I dare say they thought they were acting rightly and for the good of the community; they were probably of opinion that the sooner the whole affair was buried in oblivion, the better for everybody concerned; and they were probably somewhat influenced by a perhaps justifiable distaste for the particular views and doctrines of the persons who were instigating them to move the law against their opponents. But these are considerations which ought not to have affected them at all. A meeting, convened for any purpose which is not a violation of the law, is entitled to the protection of the law, and persons holding such a meeting are not to be put down by clamour and violence, or by a breach of the peace. On the evidence contained in these statements we think the magistrates ought to have issued summonses to answer the charge preferred; in refusing to do so, they must have been influenced by extraneous considerations, and their answer to the rule is not a sufficient explanation. They have therefore declined the jurisdiction which they ought to have exercised. I think it would be more satisfactory if the matter could be taken before other magistrates than these, whose minds must be imbued with their previous knowledge; but that is for the consideration of the prosecutor. All we have to say is that the answer of the magistrates is not sufficient to lead the court to believe that they have exercised their discretion upon the facts presented to them.

MEDWAY NAVIGATION v. BROOK.

BLACKBURN, J.—I have hesitated a good deal, but I agree that we may be justified in interfering. By the early law, which is re-enacted by Jervis's Act, when a magistrate refuses to hear a matter within his jurisdiction, we can clearly compel him; but when he hears and determines a matter we cannot overrule the exercise of his discretion. My difficulty here is to see how it can be that the magistrates have not exercised their discretion. If the charge preferred were that of attempting to blow up the Albion Assembly Rooms, or of a conspiracy to kill Dr. Kenealy, the justices might fairly say this is not evidence even for the granting of summonses; but it seems to me that these statements contain very clear evidence of a conspiracy to commit a breach of the peace. The magistrates do not say they disbelieve the statements, but they seem to have acted on the impression that they did not disclose even a prima facie case. Whether or not they have exercised some discretion in what they have done, we can sufficiently see that they must have acted upon some grounds not contained in the evidence before them, and the effect is the same as if they had declined jurisdiction. I fully concur in my Lord's recommendation to take further proceedings before other magistrates.

FIELD, J.—I am of the same opinion. I should be the last person to come to a determination which could tend to make us a court of appeal from magistrates on questions of fact. I think, however, that the magistrates in this case did not consider and determine the question submitted to them. They had to say whether these statements made a prima facie case of conspiracy against the persons charged. Had the magistrates been able to say they did not believe the statements, I would not have interfered with them. But I think they must have acted upon impressions produced from outside, and have not heard and determined the point before them upon the evidence.

Rule absolute.

MEDWAY NAVIGATION v. BROOK.

River tolls—Fractional parts of mile—Description of boundaries—Local Act.

By the plaintiffs' Local Act of 1739, sect. 23, the plaintiffs are empowered to take from every person conveying goods upon the said river between Maidstone and Forest-row, or any part thereof (which all person and persons should and might lawfully do), such rates and duties for lockage and riverage as the plaintiffs should think fit, not exceeding the sum of 4d. per mile for every ton weight of goods from Maidstone up the river to Branbridge, and not exceeding the sum of 6d. per mile for every ton weight of goods from Branbridge up the river to Forest-row, and so in proportion for a greater or less quantity.

By sect. 28, the plaintiffs are from time to time to publicly fix up the duties for lockage and riverage charged by them.

By sect. 31, nothing in the Act is to be construed to extend the plaintiffs' authority to the execution of any works below Mrs. Edmonds' wharf in Maidstone.

By sect. 38, any action, suit, or information for anything done in pursuance of this Act, or in relation to the premises, shall be commenced within three months after the facts committed.

Maidstone extends along the river upwards about three furlongs from Mrs. Edmonds' wharf to the College lock, constructed by the plaintiffs, Maidstone bridge being between the two. Plaintiffs, besides other works on the river, had scoured a shoal between the said bridge and Mrs. Edmonds' wharf, and on their annual survey they always disembarked at that wharf.

In 1874, plaintiffs amended their toll list, so as to charge, for the first time, tolls proportioned to a fractional part of a mile traversed.

Defendant, owner of oil mills situate on the Medway, less than a mile above the College lock, but more than a mile above Mrs. Edmonds' wharf, refused to pay to the plaintiffs any toll upon barges coming up the river to his mills.

Held that the plaintiffs were entitled to charge tolls proportioned to a fractional part of a mile traversed since the amendment of their list, without reference to the three months' limitation provided by sect. 38.

Held (per Blackburn, J.) that they could charge only from College lock.

Held (per Lush, J.), that they could charge from Mrs. Edmonds' wharf.

THIS was an action to recover the amount of certain tolls and dues claimed by the plaintiffs from the defendant as being payable in respect of the navigation by the defendant of a certain portion of the River Medway under the circumstances hereinafter mentioned.

The writ in the action was issued on the 12th Jan. 1875.

The declaration was for money payable by the defendant to the plaintiffs for certain tolls, rates, and duties, due and by right payable by the defendant to the plaintiffs for lockage and riverage under and by virtue of an Act of Parliament made and passed in the 13th year of the reign of his late Majesty King Geo. the Second, intituled "An Act to revive, explain, and amend an Act made and passed in the 16th and 17th years of the reign of his late Majesty King Charles the Second, intituled "An Act for making the River of Medway navigable in the Counties of Kent and Sussex," and otherwise for and in respect of goods, wares, merchandizes, commodities, and other things carried and conveyed by or caused to be carried and conveyed by upon and along the said river and navigation within the limits of the said navigation for the use whereof, within such limits, the plaintiffs are authorised by the said Act to charge such rates, tolls, and duties by the defendant, to and from certain mills known as the Tovil Oil Mills upon the said river and navigation; and for the use by the plaintiffs' permission of the said river and navigation within the limits appointed by the said Act.

The defendant pleaded—

Firstly, That he never was indebted as alleged; secondly, that the alleged causes of action did not accrue within six years of the commencement of the action; and, thirdly, that the alleged causes of action did not accrue within three months of the commencement of the action.

The plaintiffs joined issue on all the pleas, and also demurred to the third plea.

The plaintiffs delivered particulars of their demand, in which they stated their claim to be for rates, tolls, and dues, in respect of all goods carried or conveyed along their navigation by or for the defendant, either to or from his mills at Tovil from the date at which he became the occupier of the said mills up to the 17th Aug. last.

The rate of toll upon which they claimed was stated in the particulars to be calculated on the distance from the site formerly known as Mrs. Edmonds' Wharf, but now sometimes called Vincent's Wharf, but in the present occupation of Mr. Wood, coal merchant, in Maidstone, to the said mills, that is for 1 mile 290 yards, or from such other point as the plaintiffs are entitled to measure the distance from at the following rates per ton per mile, and so on for the proportionate part of a mile, viz.: 1½d. per ton per mile completed, and a rate per ton in proportion to the above rates calculated on every ¼th of a mile completed, every fractional part of a farthing being charged as a full farthing.

The particulars also claimed specifically a sum of 30l. 15s. 11½d. as due for tolls from the 17th Aug. 1874 upon 142 barges containing in all 5913 tons, at the rate of 1½d. per ton for ¼ths of a mile, being the distance from College Lock to Tovil Oil Mills, and the plaintiffs further claimed to measure the distance from and to Mrs. Edmonds' Wharf, and to charge a proportionate sum in addition in respect of the additional distance.

The cause came on for trial before the Lord Chief Justice of England and a special jury, at the Maidstone Spring Assizes 1875, when a verdict by consent was taken for the plaintiffs subject to a special case.

The following case has accordingly been stated:

1. The plaintiffs are a company constituted and incorporated by an Act of Parliament made and passed in the year 1739, being the 13th year of the reign of his late Majesty King Geo. the Second, entitled "An Act to revive, explain, and amend an Act made in the 16th and 17th years of the reign of his late Majesty King Charles the Second, intituled 'An Act for making the River of Medway navigable in the Counties of Kent and Sussex,'" and the said company was in the said Act of Geo. 2, expressed to be constituted for the better carrying on, making, completing, and maintaining the navigation of part of the River Medway, as appears by sect. 2 of the Act. Copies of this Act and of the Act of Charles II. recited therein are to be taken as part of this case.

2. The defendant is the owner and occupier of the Tovil Oil Mills, which are situated on the Tovil Brook, a stream flowing into the River Medway, and were in existence prior to the year 1734. (The position of these mills is more particularly shown on the plan which accompanied and was to be taken as part of this case.)

3. The said mills were on the 7th June 1834, purchased by Mr. Steinmetz from the then Lord Romney. On the 29th Sept. 1858, the said Steinmetz leased the said mills to the defendant who thence continuously occupied them until the 24th Dec. 1862, when the defendant purchased the said mills of the said Steinmetz. Neither the said Steinmetz nor the defendant were ever called upon by the plaintiffs to pay tolls for the navigation of the said river to the said mills, nor was any formal claim ever made upon either of them until the 13th Aug. 1874, when a claim was made by the plaintiffs on the defendant as hereinafter appears, but the matter was the subject of discussion between them in the course of the previous year.

4. By sect. 23 of the said Act of 13 Geo. 2, it was enacted that in consideration of the great charges and expenses the said company of proprietors, their successors and assigns, would be put to in making the said River Medway and streams navigable, and in repairing and keeping the same fit for such navigation, it should and might be lawful to and for the said company of proprietors, their successors and assigns, and they were thereby authorised and empowered at all times from and after the 20th May 1740, to keep boats, barges, lighters, or any other sort of vessels, and by themselves, their agents, workmen, servants, or any other person or persons, to employ and work the same for the carriage of all sorts of goods, wares, merchandise, commodities, and other things whatsoever as well upon such part of the said river and streams as should be by them made navigable as on any other part and parts thereof which were then navigable and passable, and to take and receive to their own proper use the profits, benefits, and advantages thereof, and also to ask, demand, receive, recover, and take of and from all and every person or persons who should carry or convey, or cause to be carried and conveyed, any goods, wares, merchandise, commodities, or other things whatsoever upon the said river and streams between Maidstone and Forest Row aforesaid, or any part thereof (which all person and persons should and might lawfully do) such rates and duties for lockage and riverage as the said company, their successors or assigns, should think fit, not exceeding the sum of 4d. per mile for every ton weight of goods, wares, merchandises, commodities, or other things which should be carried on any part of the said river between Maidstone and Branbridge, in the parish of Yalding, either upwards or downwards, and not exceeding the sum of 6d. per mile for every ton weight of goods, wares, merchandise, commodities, or other things whatsoever which should be so carried on any part of the said river or streams between Branbridge and Forest Row aforesaid, either upwards or downwards, and so in proportion for a greater or less quantity. Provided (sect. 24) that no toll rates or duties should be demanded or taken by the said company of proprietors of any person or persons navigating the said river until the same should be made navigable for boats carrying 40 tons from Maidstone to Branbridge aforesaid.

5. By the 25th section of the same Act it was enacted that all and every person and persons whatsoever should and might at all times thereafter have the free use and navigation of the said river, or any part thereof below East Farleigh Bridge, with boats, barges, lighters, or any other vessels coming to fetch or being loaded with stones or gunpowder, or any sort of materials for making gunpowder, without paying or allowing anything for their passing or repassing in by or through any of the locks, weirs, or pens for water to be erected by the said company by virtue of that or the said former Act, anything in either of the said Acts to the contrary notwithstanding.

6. By the 28th section of the said Act it was enacted that to the end that the navigation of the said river might be equally beneficial to all traders thereon, the said company of proprietors, when and as soon as they shall have made the said river navigable to Branbridge aforesaid, and from time to time as they should proceed to make the same navigable higher, should fix and settle the prices which they intended to charge and receive for lockage and riverage to be charged on all other persons navigating the said river for the like sorts of goods, wares, merchandise, and commodities, not exceeding the respective sums thereby authorised to be demanded and received, and that the said duties should be respectively entered in a book or books, to be kept or used by the said company of proprietors for that purpose, and should likewise be publicly fixed up at the several places where such duties should be demanded or received, and so, from time to time, as often as the said company of proprietors should think fit to alter or reduce such duties, and that they should charge and receive the said duties for lockage and riverage equally from all persons navigating the said river.

7. By sect. 31 of the same Act it was provided that nothing in that Act or in the said in part recited Act contained should extend or be construed to extend to authorise or empower the said company to cleanse, scour, dig, widen, or deepen the said river, or any part thereof below the lower part of Mistress Edmonds' Wharf in Maidstone aforesaid, or to authorise or empower the said company to erect, build, set up, make or hire any warehouses, storehouses, wharves, cranes, or other erections, to lay, load, or unload any iron, ordnance, timber, or other goods whatsoever, within the said parish of Maidstone aforesaid, or to authorise or empower the said company to erect, build, or set up any lock, wear, dam, or pen for water below the wall belonging to the gardens of the college near Maidstone Church.

8. By sect. 38 of the same Act it is provided :

That if any action, suit, or information shall be brought or commenced by or against any person or persons, or by or against the said company of proprietors of the said river Medway, for anything done in pursuance of this Act, or in relation to the premises, every such action, suit, or information shall be brought or commenced within three months after the facts committed, and not afterwards, and shall be laid and brought in the said counties of Kent and Sussex respectively, where the matters in dispute shall arise, and not elsewhere; and the defendant or defendants in such action or suit shall and may plead the general issue, and give this Act and the special matter in evidence at any trial to be had thereupon, and that the same was done in pursuance and by the authority of this Act, and if the same shall appear to be so done, or if any such action or suit or information shall be brought or commenced after the time before limited for bringing or commencing the same, or shall be laid or brought in any other county or place than where the matter in dispute shall lie, then the jury shall find for the defendant or defendants, or if the plaintiff or plaintiffs shall become non-suited, or suffer a discontinuance of his or her or their action or actions, or if verdict shall pass or judgment upon demurrer be given against the plaintiff or plaintiffs, the defendant or defendants shall have such remedy for the same as any defendant or defendants hath or have or may or can have for costs in any other cases by law.

9. Under and in accordance with the said powers and provisions, and the other powers and provisions contained in the said Acts, or one or other of them, the said company executed various works authorised by the said Acts, or one or other of them, and made the said river navigable both to Branbridge and afterwards as high as Tonbridge. Their first lock was constructed at a point opposite the wall belonging to the gardens of the college near Maidstone Church aforesaid. This lock is known as the College or Church Lock, and is marked on the aforesaid plan by the name of College Lock. The company also constructed other locks at other points higher up the river, and from time to time executed and maintained whatever works appeared to them necessary for making and keeping the river navigable between Maidstone Bridge and Tonbridge aforesaid for the barges used on that portion of the river, in accordance with the provisions of the said Acts.

10. As evidence of their having executed works between Maidstone Bridge and Mrs. Edmonds' Wharf, the plaintiffs tendered three entries in a ledger belonging to them, under the respective dates 1742, 1743, and 1749, of payments made to persons employed by them for scouring Maidstone Shoal, which is between Maidstone Bridge and Mrs. Edmonds' Wharf. The court is to determine whether those entries are admissible as evidence on behalf of the plaintiffs. If they be not admitted there was no evidence of the company ever having caused any works to be executed, or any repairs to be done, between Maidstone Bridge and Mrs. Edmonds' Wharf. But they had for many years been accustomed, upon a fixed day in every year, to descend the river from Tonbridge in a barge, for the purpose of making an annual survey of the portion of the river over which they exercised control, and on such occasions they always disembarked at the Mrs. Edmonds' Wharf, where their survey was concluded.

11. The company further, in accordance with the provisions to that effect of the said Act of Geo. 2, fixed and settled from time to time the prices for lockage and riverage to be charged upon persons navigating the said river, in respect of the various sorts of goods, wares, merchandise, and other commodities for which they are authorised to take toll under the provisions of the said Act.

12. Upon the 10th Oct. 1742, the company passed a resolution ordering that the full tollage or riverage allowed by the Act of Parliament, viz., 4d. per ton per mile, be demanded and taken of all persons who shall navigate the river. The company have caused from time to time toll boards containing a list of the prices to be charged for lockage and riverage to be publicly fixed up at the College Lock aforesaid, and at the wharves of the said company at Branbridge and Tonbridge aforesaid.

13. During the whole period over which the claim in this action extends, until the revision of the rates hereinafter mentioned, the list or schedule of rates and tolls exhibited was in the form shown in schedule B to this case annexed, which is to be read as part thereof.

14. Since the dates of the said Act of Car. 2 and of the said Act of Geo. 2, although the town of Maidstone has very much increased in area and extent, yet it has not extended along the banks of the Medway upwards beyond College Lock.

15. The parish of Maidstone extends on the north bank of the said river to Farleigh Bridge aforesaid, a distance of 2 miles, 3 furlongs, and 154 yards from Mrs. Edmonds' Wharf, and on the south bank to a point at about 1 mile 5 furlongs, and 161 yards from the said wharf. The boundaries of the borough are the same as those of the parish.

16. The said Tovil Oil Mills are at a distance above the said College Lock of 5 furlongs and 91 yards, and above Maidstone Bridge of 6 furlongs and 132 yards, and the distance between the said College Lock and Mrs. Edmonds' Wharf is 3 furlongs and 141 yards or thereabouts.

17. At the time of the passing of the Act 13 Geo. 2. the wharf called Mrs. Edmonds' Wharf, and the site where the College Lock now is, were at the extreme ends or nearly so, respectively, of the river frontage of Maidstone town. The plaintiffs in their annual survey have always surveyed the river downwards as far as the site of Mrs. Edmonds' Wharf. This wharf adjoins the site of the wharf which in the preamble of 5 Geo. 4, c. 148 (local and personal) hereinafter referred to is called the Lower Town Wharf on the eastern side.

18. The distance of the river from College Lock to Tonbridge is between 15 and 16 miles. Within the memory of persons now living there were milestones along the towing path from College Lock to Tonbridge, some of which are still in existence. These milestones were intended to mark the distance in measured miles from College Lock to Tonbridge. Upon the 15th milestone, counting from College Lock, there is the date 1750. There was no evidence as to by whom they were erected. The first of these milestones, counting from College Lock, is near a place called Pine Shoot, which is about a quarter of a mile above the Tovil Oil Mills.

19. Upon the 10th July 1874, the plaintiffs held a meeting, at which an amended toll list was read and approved, and ordered to be published. A new toll board was also ordered to be set up at the Church Lock, and the old board to be carefully retained by the manager, and an attested copy of the toll printed thereon made by the solicitors. And it was also ordered that as soon as the new toll board at Church Lock should be erected claim for toll should be made on Mr. Brook (the defendant in this action).

20. A new list of tolls was accordingly, on or about the 9th Aug. 1874, set up upon the toll boards at the plaintiffs' locks and wharves. Such list was in the form shown in schedule D annexed hereto, and is to be taken as part of this case.

21. Up to the said 9th Aug. 1874, the plaintiffs had never claimed to charge tolls proportioned to a fractional part of a mile traversed. Nor had they ever, until the year 1869, charged any toll where the whole distance traversed was less than a mile. When the distance traversed consisted of one or more completed miles and a fractional part of another mile toll had not been charged for the fractional part, unless such part exceeded half a mile, in which case it was charged as for a further mile completed.

22. In March 1869, the company instructed their lock keeper at College Lock to charge a toll of $\frac{1}{4}$ d. per ton on goods conveyed to a general landing wharf, which had been made some years before at Tovil, and was situate a short distance above the defendant's oil mills, but nearly a quarter of a mile below the first milestone at Pine Shoot. This toll was from that time paid upon goods conveyed to that wharf, but no notice of the charge was placed on the toll boards or otherwise publicly fixed up.

23. Until within the last ten years Tovil Oil Mills was the only place between College Lock and the first milestone at Pine Shoot on which goods could be landed. No toll was ever charged on goods conveyed to the Tovil Oil Mills until after the 9th of Aug. 1874.

24. During a considerable period, while Lord Romney owned the Tovil Mills (which were originally and at the time of passing the Act of 13 Geo. 2, used for the manufacture of gunpowder, but were afterwards converted into oil mills), the barges of his tenant for the time being passed to and from those mills without payment of any toll.

25. The defendant has constantly, since his occupation of the Tovil Mills, carried goods to and from the said mills along the said river and navigation through the said College Lock past Mrs. Edmonds' Wharf to and from various places down the Medway and thence into the Thames and elsewhere.

26. On the 13th Aug. 1874, the plaintiffs gave notice to the defendant that they should in future charge toll for all goods landed or shipped at the said Tovil Oil Mills, and carried upon the river, and that a settlement would have to be come to for past dues.

The defendant at once disputed his liability to pay such tolls, and has not paid them.

27. Since the publication of the said revised list of tolls in August 1874, and before action, the defendant has as heretofore used the navigation, passing through the College Lock, and to and from the point called Mrs. Edmonds' Wharf and Tovil Mills, but he has refused to pay tolls in respect to the passage of his goods, whether before or since the revision of the tolls.

28. In the year 1792 an Act of Parliament was passed, viz., 32 Geo. 3, c. 105, for the purpose of improving the navigation of the river Medway between the lock in the town of Maidstone, and a point in the said Act called the lower part of the orchard then in the occupation of G. Hunt, the younger, below Aylesford Bridge.

29. In the year 1802 the last mentioned Act was repealed by a further Act of Parliament, viz. 42 Geo. 3, c. 94, entitled "An Act for repealing an Act passed in the 32nd year of His present Majesty's reign for improving the navigation of the river Medway from the town of Maidstone through the several parishes of Maidstone, Boxley, Allington and Aylesford, in the county of Kent, and for the better and more effectually improving the navigation of the said river," whereby certain persons were incorporated by the name of the Company of Proprietors of the Lower Navigation of the river Medway. The navigation of the river below the point called Mrs. Edmonds' Wharf is under the control of that company.

30. In the year 1824 a further Act of Parliament, 5 Geo. 4, c. 148, was passed, entitled "An Act for the more effectually improving the navigation of the river Medway from Maidstone to Halling in the county of Kent, and to alter and enlarge the powers of an Act of the 42nd year of His late Majesty, for improving the navigation of the said river," whereby further powers were given for the improvement and maintenance of the lower navigation.

Either party is at liberty to refer to the above-mentioned Acts as part of this case.

31. The Lower Navigation Company have

Q.B. Div.]

MEDWAY NAVIGATION v. BROOK.

[Q.B. Div.]

always caused to be executed whatever works appeared to them necessary for keeping the river navigable between Mrs. Edmonds' Wharf and Maidstone Bridge. They also on several occasions caused a shoal or bank to be removed from the bed of the river between Maidstone Bridge and the College Lock, where the river Len flows into the Medway, which shoal or bank interfered with the free passage of the barges of the Lower Navigation Company, which were larger and of greater draught than those of the plaintiffs. But they did no other repairs, nor otherwise interfered with the part of the river between Maidstone Bridge and the College Lock. The Lower Navigation Company have always charged a tonnage and not a mileage rate.

32. The lock in the town of Maidstone mentioned in sect. 1 of the 32 Geo. 3, c. 105, and also in sect. 1 of 5 Geo. 4, c. 148, is the same as the College Lock above mentioned. Hunt's orchard, mentioned in the same Acts, is about four miles below Maidstone bridge.

33. The court is to have power to draw all inferences of fact, and to make all necessary amendments.

The Ordnance Map, showing the course of the river Medway between Farleigh Lock and Aylesford Bridge, may be referred to by either party on the argument of this case.

The questions for the opinion of the court are:

First, whether the plaintiffs are entitled to recover in this action;

Secondly, what point the plaintiffs are entitled to measure from in computing the distance by which to estimate the amount of toll to be paid;

Thirdly, at what rate (if at all) the plaintiffs are entitled to recover tolls from the defendant, and Fourthly, for what period of time (if at all) anterior to the date of the writ, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover toll from the defendant.

If the court shall be of opinion that the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover any tolls from the defendant up to the date of the action brought, judgment is to be entered for the defendant with costs.

If the court should be of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover any tolls, the amount to be recovered is to be ascertained, if the parties cannot agree, by an arbitrator, in accordance with the judgment and opinion of the court upon the questions submitted to them, and judgment is to be entered for the plaintiffs for the amount so to be ascertained, with costs.

By order of the Committee of Proprietors,

Cohen, Q. C. (with him F. M. White), argued for plaintiffs.

Brown, Q. C. (with him A. L. Smith) for the defendant.

The arguments on both sides are repeated in the judgments of the court.

BLACKBURN, J. — This case, which has been argued at some length, turns upon the construction of an Act of Parliament, and there are two points which we have to determine, one of which my brother Lush and myself are agreed upon. We think that the true construction of the 23rd section, imposing the rate is that, whatever be the limits within which it is to be imposed, all ships and barges carrying goods are to pay a rate proportionate to the distance they go; and that it is not the true construction of the Act to say that the toll is only to be placed upon them for every entire mile they go, the fraction of a mile being left untouched. The object of the Legislature, when we look at the words of the Act, seems to have been to impose a tax upon all barges carrying goods on the river between Maidstone and Forest Row. The words of the section are, "such rates and duties for lockage and riverage as the said company of proprietors shall think fit, not exceeding the sum of 4d. per mile for every ton weight of goods, wares, merchandizes, commodities, or other things which shall be carried on any part of the said river between Maidstone and Brandbridge, in the parish of Yalding, either upwards or downwards, and not exceeding the sum of 6d. per mile for every ton weight of goods, wares, merchandizes, commodities, or other things whatsoever which shall be so carried on any part of the said river or streams between Brandbridge and Forest-row aforesaid." So that the tax put upon barges going along the Medway from Maidstone to Brandbridge is 4d. per ton per mile, and from Brandbridge to Forest-row, or any part of it, is 6d. per mile for every ton. I think it is clear that the tax is to be at that rate. It was never meant that they were to leave two fractions of a mile, one above Brandbridge and the other below, together making more than a mile, untouched, but that there was to be a rate at which barges were to be taxed according to the distance travelled—if above Brandbridge, 6d., and if below Brandbridge, 4d. I think that is the sense in which it is to be looked at. But then the objection is made that when the Legislature said for every ton so and so shall be paid, they have thought fit to add “and so in proportion for a greater or less quantity.” I think there is some force in the observation that has been made that, though the Legislature could use language to make it perfectly clear that there should be a proportionate quantity charged for, they have not used such language as to make it perfectly clear about the miles. That is true; but, as Mr. Cohen has said, it required language to be used with reference to the quantity, in order to make it clear and intelligible, whilst it did not require such words with reference to a proportionate part of a mile. All I can say upon that is this: It seems to me that tolls for a fraction of a mile within the limits are to be taken at that rate just as much as tolls are to be taken for a proportionate quantity. However, the Medway Company can only recover those fractions at the rate at which the company has thought fit to charge. It appears that, until Schedule D came into operation, they never thought fit to charge for a fraction, and they cannot therefore recover for a fraction before the time that came into operation. For a fraction of a mile within the limits from that time afterwards they would be entitled to recover, and for the entire mileage within the proper limits they are entitled to recover, subject to the six years' limitation, as to which there is no dispute. Now, with reference to the other point which arises on the construction of the Act, unfortunately there is a difference of opinion between my brother Lush and myself. If our decision was final, or likely to be final, we should, under the circumstances, have been obliged to adjourn the case, and to have had it reargued, which would have necessitated a good deal of expense and trouble to the parties; but as the case can now be cheaply and quickly taken to the Court of Appeal, we do not think it necessary even to take time to consider our judgment, because each of us has looked at the matter carefully, and there is no reason to think that our opinions would, by a more mature consideration, be changed. We therefore think it better for each of us to give our reasons now, so that the case can, if necessary, be more quickly taken to the Court of Appeal than if the case were determined after reargument by a court differently constituted. It is for these reasons that we do not delay giving our judgment. Now this question entirely turns upon the construction of the 23rd section. Of course in interpreting the 23rd section we should look at the whole of the Act, and all the circumstances that were before the Legislature in order to see what the 23rd section means. The 23rd section gives the company of proprietors a right to levy tolls on every person or persons who shall carry or convey, or cause to be carried and conveyed, any goods and so on upon the said river and streams between Maidstone and Forest Row. The question raised before us, and it is one of some difficulty, is where the terminus at Maidstone is to be considered to begin. Is it to begin, as the defendant avers, (and which in my opinion is the true construction) at College Lock, for that is what it practically comes to, and go upwards, or is it to be interpreted as meaning (and that is the contention on the other side) from Mrs. Edmonds' wharf upwards? I will now render my reasons for thinking that it is to be from College Lock, which is the upper part of the town of Maidstone. It is found in the case that the town of Maidstone was in the 13th Geo. 2 the same as it is now in the sense of continuous buildings; that it ended where College Lock was placed, and still ends where college lock is placed. Now we have to consider whether that is the sense in which the words “between Maidstone and Forest Row” are used. For that purpose it is necessary to see how the Act is framed, how it is worded, and how it came to be worded in that way. There had been an Act passed in the reign of Charles II., incorporating a body of commissioners to whom powers were given to improve the navigation of the whole of the river Medway, and all streams flowing into the river Medway in the counties of Kent and Sussex, and so flowing down into the Thames. Power was given to improve the navigation, and then it was enacted that when the commissioners had improved it, provided they began it within one year, and for such portion as was completed within seven years (and they were to go no further than that), they were to reap a reward by having the monopoly of being carriers, subject to this condition, that they should not be able to hinder persons from using or employing boats of such burthen as had been used or employed before the passing of that Act. So that evidently what was then intended was this: you, the commissioners, having improved the river Medway and made it navigable for big vessels, where only little vessels could go before, shall have a monopoly with reference to big vessels, but little vessels are still to have the advantage which they had before. That would seem to have been an ingeniously contrived plan for raising contentions and disputes when that Act came into operation, but the commissioners did nothing, and it therefore becomes an immaterial consideration, except so far as this, that the river remained only partially navigable, though it was intended that the navigation should be improved. Then there came in the reign of Geo. 2. the present Act. It commences with a recital of the former Act, and then, having recited that former Act, sect. 1, says: “The proprietors and commissioners hereinafter mentioned constituted and appointed, shall have full power and authority to do and perform, and shall and may respectively do and perform all act and acts, deed or deeds, in such manner, and by the same power and authority as the proprietors and commissioners by the said before mentioned Act, nominated, constituted, and appointed, were respectively entitled to do and perform (save in such particulars as by this present Act is or are hereinafter altered, explained, or amended.)” Had that section stood without that parenthesis, it would have given the commissioners power to do anything to the river Medway down to the Thames, but the exceptions which are mentioned afterwards clearly show they are not to do so.

MEDWAY NAVIGATION v. BROOK.

[Q.B. Div.]

Then comes the second section, beginning with this recital: "And whereas the several persons hereinafter particularly named are desirous at their own proper costs and charges to begin, carry on, and complete the navigation of such part of the ancient river Medway and streams falling thereinto, as run down from Forest Row, in the county of Sussex, to the town of Maidstone, in the county of Kent." Unless there be something therefore in the context, or something in that which follows, that puts a different sense upon it, that means their object and wish to be incorporated was to improve the navigation down to the town as it then existed, and unless there is something in the context to show that the words go further, that would show that they were not desirous of doing anything within the town of Maidstone at all, but that that which they were going to do would only come down to that which, as it is found in the case, was the terminus of the ancient town of Maidstone—viz., College Lock. It then recites that such laudable purposes should be carried out, and that to that end certain persons should be formed into a company, "for the purposes of making, completing, and maintaining the said navigation in manner as the proprietors in and by the said in part above recited Act," that is, the Act of Car. 2, "were authorised and empowered to do, and more particularly for making, carrying on, and completing such navigation from Forest-row to Maidstone aforesaid, according to the rules, orders, methods, and directions hereinafter expressed and laid down." Therefore the first section having said that all powers should be revived and given to the commissioners, except so far as specified, the 2nd section, after reciting that the commissioners were desirous of improving the navigation down to Maidstone, says—you, the commissioners, shall have certain powers, subject to certain exceptions that come afterwards, you shall have all the powers that the Act of Car. 2 gave you, and you shall use and exercise those powers for improving the navigation down to Maidstone, which is what you are desirous of doing. That, if it stood unlimited, would give them also power to make any improvements where they liked, down to the Thames. But now I come to the 31st section, and though it is not next in order, yet I think it is material to see what happens. The 31st section shows what the exceptions alluded to in the parenthesis at the end of sect. 1 are. "Nothing in this or the said in part recited Act contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, or authorise or empower the said company of proprietors to cleanse, scour, dig, widen, or deepen the said river, or any part thereof, below the lower part of Mistress Edmonds' wharf in Maidstone aforesaid." I pause here to say, that that says they shall not dig or interfere with the river at all, not below Maidstone, but below Mistress Edmonds' Wharf in Maidstone; the previous section having said as I understand it, You, the commissioners, are desirous of improving the navigation down to Maidstone, we will therefore give you, subject to the exceptions that are mentioned afterwards, all powers to do that down to Maidstone, and we will give you powers extending down to the Thames, such as the commissioners formerly had, subject to certain exceptions. Then there comes this exception: You, the commissioners, shall not "cleanse, scour, dig, widen, or deepen the said river, or any part thereof, below the lower part of Mistress Edmonds' wharf in Maidstone aforesaid." Then it goes on to say, "this Act shall not authorise or empower the said company of proprietors to erect, build, set up, make, or hire any warehouses, storehouses, wharves, cranes, or other erections, to lay, load, or unload, any iron, ordnance, timber, or other goods whatsoever within the parish of Maidstone aforesaid." That extends considerably above the town; then there can be no doubt that their powers are limited, though tolls in every construction of the Act are imposed on boats travelling on the part of the river that runs in the parish of Maidstone. The latter part of that section says that they shall not on any account erect, build, or set up any lock, weir, dam, or pen for water below the wall belonging to the gardens of the college near Maidstone Church, which, as we find from the statement in the case was then and is still part of the town of Maidstone. Now, taking it in that way, it seems to me the effect of the legislation is this, that they having stated that they were, as a commercial undertaking, desirous of maintaining the river to the place where College Lock is placed, had power given them to do it, and to make locks, and to do everything above that, and though they had incidentally left to them the power of deepening the river down as far as Mistress Edmonds' wharf in Maidstone, yet the great object of the enactment was to enable them to fulfil their undertaking and to make the river navigable above Maidstone Lock. Then comes the 23rd section upon which the question turns. Let us see what that is? It says first, that in consideration of the charges and expenses to which the commissioners are to be put, and I may say at once that it does appear that some charges were incurred by the commissioners above Mistress Edmonds' wharf and below College Lock, power is given to take tolls, but it seems to have been thought necessary to give them power to act as carriers "as well upon such part of the said river and streams as shall be by them made navigable as on any other part and parts thereof which are now navigable and passable." That, I think, means clearly enough that they are to act as carriers on the whole of the River Medway down to the River Thames, not only the parts that they are going to make navigable but all parts that were then navigable. Then the language is changed, "and also to ask, demand, and receive, recover, and take of and from all and every person or persons who shall carry or convey, or cause to be carried and conveyed" any goods and so on upon the said river and streams between Maidstone and Forest-row as aforesaid. Now what does that mean? Prima facie the meaning of the words between Maidstone and Forest-row would be from the top of Maidstone, from the College Lock to Forest-row; but what is there to oblige us to say that from Maidstone means from Mistress Edmonds' wharf as it is called in the recital of the Act which is lower down the river and would include part of Maidstone. It is so contended on this ground, as I understand this argument, and this is the most plausible ground upon which it can be put, that it was only reasonable and proper that tolls should be taken in all parts on which the proprietors expended money. It is true there is nothing objectionable in that, but the scheme of the Act is not that at all. Tolls are to be taken all over the river though there may be reaches and places where the navigation has not been touched at all. It is a very common thing in English rivers to find shoals which make navigation very bad, except for very small vessels, although there may be a space for miles where the river is deep and can be navigated very well. The enactment is not that the proprietors shall take tolls for only those parts that they improve, but that they shall take tolls from all those who use the river between Maidstone and Forest-row, whether they improve it or not. It would also seem intelligible to say that though you, the proprietors, expend some money in improving the navigation between the beginning of Maidstone and Mistress Edmonds' Wharf, yet you shall not be entitled to charge tolls on that portion of the river, and for this reason: we will not let the trade of Maidstone be worried by having to pay the tolls of that part of the river where you do not do much good, but you shall have power to improve the navigation if you please, and your reward for that, so far as tolls go, is to be, that all who use the navigation between Maidstone and Forest-row shall pay tolls whether it be for a portion of the river on which you have spent money or not. I can find words that seem to indicate an intention to say, if you do not spend money on parts of the river between Maidstone and Forest Row you shall not levy tolls on the party who uses that part of the river between Maidstone and Forest Row, but I do not see anything to enable me to say that the words "to Maidstone" are to be changed, and that by these words it was meant "to Mistress Edmonds' wharf in Maidstone." There are several sections in the Act where the terminus is given. The section which recites what it is that the undertakers undertake to do says that they are desirous at their own proper costs and charges to begin, carry on, and complete the navigation of such part of the ancient river Medway and streams falling thereunto as run down from Forest Row in the county of Sussex to the town of Maidstone. The words used there are such as to show that it was clearly the town of Maidstone and not Mistress Edmonds' wharf. Now in another part the words used are "between Maidstone" and "from Maidstone." I do not know that one phrase throws more light upon it than the other, except that, primâ facie, the meaning of the words is "to the town of Maidstone," and I can see nothing to change that. I think there is nothing in the other sections of the Act material to consider. Something was said as to the 29th section. I own I do not think that the construction of that section is necessary for the decision of this case. I do not think that it at all bears on this question. That section stipulates that the bargeman shall, if required, inform the collector of tolls where he is going to take the goods on board his barge; and whether he can ask the bargeman when he has got into their part of the navigation or can ask him below, does not bear upon this question. As I said before, for the reasons which I have endeavoured to express, it seems to me the plaintiffs are wrong in saying that they can charge a toll for any portion of the distance that lies below College Lock. I think they are right in saying that they are entitled to charge for a fractional part of a mile according to their scale above College Lock; and I think they are right also in saying that it is not a three months' limitation, but that they can go back six years to recover whatever may be due to them. I suppose it is not a sum of any great consequence. They cannot recover the fraction before that time, because they failed to put up a schedule in which they stated the fractions. I need further hardly say that I disregard altogether, and that I do not care what the Legislature or those framing private Acts afterwards stuck into them. I look back and construe this Act as if I had been sitting to decide this case in the year 1780, although I should then have had the advantage of getting more accurate information as to the degree to which the river was navigable before the 13 Geo. 2. The second Act does not take away any right that did exist, nor give the commissioners any right that did not exist. My brother Lush takes an opposite view to that which I have endeavoured to explain. I am, therefore, far from expressing my opinion without doubt. This is the result I have come to; and if the parties wish to have the matter settled, it can be done as quickly and as cheaply by taking the case to the Court of Appeal as if it were reargued here.

LUSH, J.—I also think that we are not at liberty to look at subsequent private Acts in order to enable us to put a meaning on the Act in question. If there had been anything in the subsequent private Acts to say that these particular Medway navigation proprietors should not be entitled to take tolls over the spot in question, or if there were any declaration that such was not intended, or anything of that kind, that would, of course, have controlled the meaning of this section. But nothing of that kind is to be found, and, therefore, we are not at liberty to argue one way or the other upon the construction of the Act from any recitals or ambiguous phrases in a subsequent Act. Now, as regards one point that has been argued, viz., that the company are entitled to charge for a fractional portion of a mile, I agree with my learned brother. I do not think that is a question which admits of any reasonable doubt. I quite adhere to the principle of construction established in the case of Barrett v. Stockton and Darlington Railway Company (2 M. & G. 134); but it does not appear to me, on reading the clause in question, that there is any ambiguity at all. It seems to me to be plain what the intention of the Legislature was, and that being so, we are bound to give effect to it. It appears to me that the Act by sect. 23, does in terms provide for the fractional distance as well as for the fractional quantity, that it is to be at the rate (for that is what the words mean) of 4d. or 6d. per mile per ton whether you go a shorter distance than a mile or not, or whatever part of the river you traverse you shall pay at that rate, and whatever quantity of goods you carry you shall pay at that rate. Now I wish I could concur in the opinion of my learned brother upon the other point, because I think it is not satisfactory that we should be unable to come to the same conclusion upon this Act of Parliament. However I have formed an opinion upon it, and it is that opinion that I am now bound to express. I quite agree with my learned brother that it is more expedient, considering the present facilities for going to the Court of Appeal, and that it would be less expensive to the parties and occasion less delay, if we at once pronounce our different opinions, and so leave one party or the other to go to a Court of Appeal at once rather than incur the expense and delay which would be occasioned by a rehearing of the case. I will now shortly express my reasons for thinking that the Medway Company are entitled to compute the distance from Mistress Edmonds' wharf. The Act of Geo. 2, which has been so often referred to, evidently treats it as a very desirable thing to open the navigation of the river Medway, and after reciting an Act of Parliament which had passed in the time of Car. 2, and become abortive, there being nothing done under it, and after reciting the expediency of having the navigation improved, it says, "Whereas the several persons herein-after particularly named, are desirous, at their own proper costs and charges, to begin, carry on, and complete the navigation of such part of the ancient river Medway, and streams falling thereinto, as run down from Forest Row, in the county of Sussex, to the town of Maidstone, in the county of Kent. To the end, therefore, that so good an undertaking may be carried on to advantage and put in full force and execution, be it further enacted;" then it authorises that a number of persons, their successors, or assigns. "shall be united into a company for the better carrying on, making, completing, and maintaining the said navigation in manner as the proprietors, in and by the said in part above recited Act were authorised and empowered to do, and more particularly for making, carrying on, and completing such navigation from Forest Row to Maidstone aforesaid, according to the rules, orders, methods, and directions hereinafter expressed and laid down." Then it says they shall be incorporated. They are then authorised to "cleanse, scour, dig, widen, and deepen the said river and streams, and to cut, dig, and make new new channels, trenches, and water-courses," and so on; and to erect locks, weirs, and so on, and to do whatever is necessary "to make the same navigable, passable, and portable for boats, barges, lighters and other vessels." Now the termini are, therefore, from Forest Row, in the county of Sussex, to the town of Maidstone, in the county of Kent. Prima facie those words would exclude the town of Maidstone itself. Then, in order to see what part of the town of Maidstone was meant, we must look either to the context of the Act or the locality, because a reference to either would, I apprehend, enable us to put a construction on those words, and see what part of the town of Maidstone was meant. The object was to open the navigation to the traders of Maidstone, amongst other things, and surely it would not be enough to accomplish that end if the navigation was made complete up to the extremity of the town, unless that happened to be where the wharves were. If it turned out, as it is found in the case, that there was below the lock in question and between College Lock and the bridge and Mistress Edmonds' Wharf (and the term Mistress Edmonds' Wharf denotes that that is the business part of Maidstone), a shoal that required constant attention in order to keep clear and not impede the navigation, I should have said, looking at the locality, and having that explanation before me, the meaning was this, that they were authorised to do so much as would be necessary in order to open the navigation to the business part of the town so that the business part of the town would have the advantage of the new navigation. But that is put beyond all doubt to my mind by the 31st section, because it must be read as a proviso to the 2nd. The 2nd section, as my learned brother observed, in the early part of it, apparently gives power to do all that the former persons had power to do under the Act of Car. 2. Then there comes in a proviso to that, which is in these terms: "That nothing in this or the said in part recited Act contained shall extend or be construed to extend to authorise or empower the said company of proprietors to cleanse, scour, dig, widen, or deepen" (those are the very words used in the 2nd section) "the said river, or any part thereof, below the lower part of Mistress Edmonds' wharf, in Maidstone, aforesaid." Putting that as a proviso to the 2nd section, if nothing else could be referred to. I should say that, by implication, not only authorised them to go as far as Mistress Edmonds' wharf, but it shows that what they meant by the words "town of Maidstone" was that part of the town of Maidstone where the wharves are, and which would make the navigation a real improvement to the town. I therefore read it thus, that it authorises them to make the river navigable from Forest Row to Mistress Edmonds' wharf, in Maidstone. Now there is a further part of the 2nd section which has been referred to. It goes on to say, "And the said river and streams, so to be made navigable, and all lands, tenements, and hereditaments to be by them made use of for the benefit of the said navigation by virtue of the former and this present Act shall be and are hereby vested in the said company of proprietors." By a decision of this court which took place some years ago, which I remember I argued for Lord Romney, this court held that that vested absolutely the river in the proprietors, so that the county could not abstract the water from the river without the consent of the proprietors. Now if the proprietors did undertake and did act upon that 31st section, and scoured, cleansed, dug, widened, or deepened the river, or any part thereof, below the College Lock, then I think that from that time that part of the river became vested in them. Now I find by the statement of the case that there is evidence that they have from time to time made payments to persons employed by them for scouring a shoal which is between Mistress Edmonds' wharf and the bridge. So it appears that there was, as I have said, a shoal which impeded the navigation, which would have rendered the improvement of the other part of the river useless for the town of Maidstone, unless that was removed; they did take upon themselves to clear that away, and in doing so opened the navigation down to Mistress Edmonds' wharf, because they took away every impediment between the lock and the wharf. It appears to me therefore that they thereby acquired that legal property in the river which is given them by the 2nd section, that being a portion of the river which they were authorised to deal with. Now comes the question are they or are they not entitled to take toll upon that part of the river? I must say it does appear to me to be clear upon the reading of that toll clause 23. The words are these: They shall be entitled "to ask, demand, and receive, recover, and take of and from, all and every person, or persons, who shall carry or convey, or cause to be carried or conveyed, any goods, wares, merchandizes, commodities, or other things whatsoever upon the said river and streams between Maidstone and Forest Row aforesaid."

MEDWAY NAVIGATION v. BROOK.

Now that must mean between that part of Maidstone in which the navigation has been opened and Forest Row aforesaid, "such rates and duties for lockage and riverage as the said company of proprietors, their successors, or assigns, shall think fit, not exceeding" so much per mile. That I think would give them a toll up to Mistress Edmonds' wharf, and I cannot conceive that it was ever intended that they should go to the expense of keeping the navigation open down to that wharf, and take no toll whatever for that portion of the stream. I do not see any reason for it. The language of the 23rd section makes persons who navigate any part of the river liable to toll. I do not see any reason whatever for importing an exception that they should not pay within the limits of the town. It has been urged that there is a hardship on the townspeople to have to pay for navigation that was free to them before, but the answer to that is this, the Act considered it a public advantage to deepen the river to make it navigable for larger vessels up to the business part of the town, and the price that they have to pay for that advantage is the toll. My view is further fortified by reference again to the 31st section. The 31st section imposes restrictions upon the proprietors. It says they shall not interfere with the trade of the town of Maidstone because, although they are empowered to go and deepen the river down to Mistress Edmonds' wharf, they are not allowed to "build, set up, make, or hire any warehouses, storehouses, wharfs, cranes, or other erections, to lay, load, or unload any iron or ordinance timber or other goods whatsoever within the parish of Maidstone aforesaid, or to authorise or empower the said company of proprietors to erect, build, or set up any lock, weir, dam, or pens for water below the wall belonging to the gardens of the college near Maidstone church." So that they are prohibited from interfering with the established trade and business of the town, and I should have thought that if the intention had been that they should not take a toll or have any compensation whatever for the expenses they were to undergo in keeping clear the river between the lock and the bridge, it would have been found in this very clause. Nothing of the kind is inserted here. On the contrary, in my view, the scheme of the Act is that the public who are to receive great benefit from the improvement of this navigation are to pay toll for every part of the river improved by or under the directions of these proprietors. Upon these grounds it is that I am unfortunately led to differ from the opinion expressed by my learned brother, and to think that the distance ought to be computed from Mistress Edmonds' Wharf, and not from College Lock.

Judgment for plaintiffs on the first third, and fourth questions.

BAKER v. OVERSEERS OF THE PARISH OF BEYFORD.

Rating Act 1874—Woodlands and sporting rights
—"Let and occupied in natural and unimproved state."

The appellant was rated in respect of woods and shooting in his occupation. Appeal against the rate on the ground of its being excessive. According to the Rating Act 1874, the woods ought to have been rated as if the land was let and occupied in its natural and unimproved state, that is, as mere waste, irrespective of the value of the right of sporting thereon.

Held, that the objections were valid, and rate accordingly decreased.

AN appeal by William Robert Baker, of Bayfordbury, against a poor rate made by the overseers of the parish of Bayford, on the 9th Oct. 1875.

W. A. Clark (with him Croome) for the appellant.—The principal objection to the rate is that the appellant has been overrated in respect to woodlands, which were called the Bayford and Black Tan Woods, of which the estimated extent is 306 acres, the gross estimated rental 229l. 10s., and the rateable value 220l.; and also in respect to the shooting rights thereon; the woods are rated at 15s. per acre, and it is assumed that the sporting rights are assessed at 2s. 6d. and the woods themselves at 12s. 6d. per acre. It is contended that instead of 15s. per acre, it should be 4s. or 5s. at the utmost.

The rate in question has been made under the Rating Act 1874, the object of which was to make certain property rateable which was not before so, and not in any way to increase the rates upon that property which was before rateable. The law of rating prior to the Act of 1874, depended upon the statute of 43rd Elizabeth, c. 2, which generally applied to lands, houses, tithes, coal mines, saleable underwood, &c., and according to the maxim of law, "Expressio unius est exclusio alterius," no other mines were rateable than coal mines, and no other wood than saleable underwood. Though the right to game was in no case separately rated, it still existed under certain circumstances, assessable, that is to say, where such rights were enjoyed in connection with the occupation of the land over which the right of sporting was, so that the land was enhanced in value, it was held that such enhanced value was to be taken into account in the assessment. For example, in the case of Reg. v. Williams (23 L. T. Rep. 76; 5 Jur. N. S. 821) the tenant, having both the land and game, was held rateable in respect of both; but in the case of Reg. v. Thurstons (32 L. T. Rep. 275, 1 E. & E. 502) it was decided that where the tenant had not the right of taking the game he was not liable to be rated for it. In the case of Reg. v. The Battle Union (15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 180; L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 8) the court held that the owner of land which he occupied and the shooting of which he leased and received rent for, would be rateable in respect of the increased value of the occupation arising from the shooting, and that he did not void his liability when he made the right a concrete thing by leasing it at a particular rent. In a subsequent case it was held that when the right of shooting was severed from the occupation of the land, it was an incorporeal hereditament not rateable at all. It is clear, therefore, that under the old law the right of shooting, if enjoyed in conjunction with the occupation of land, formed an element in estimating the rateable value of land; but that where held independently of the occupation of the land it was not so. The Rating Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 54), however, altered the law in this respect. The 3rd section of the Act extended the rateability to land used as a wood or plantation, or for the growth of any saleable underwood, and not subject to any right of common, and to rights of fowling, of shooting, of taking or killing game or rabbits, and of fishing when severed from the occupation of the land. There is no alteration in the law as regards saleable underwood except in the matter of form, and no alteration in the law as regards sporting rights when not severed from the land. Having brought two things within the ambit of rating, having made plantations and woods rateable, and the rights of sporting when severed from the occupation of the land, the Act, in subsequent sections, went on to prescribe in precise terms the mode in which these particular properties should be rated. By sect. 4 it is directed that where land is used only as a plantation or wood, and not for the growth of saleable underwood, the gross and rateable value shall be estimated as if the land, instead of being a plantation or a wood, were let and occupied in its natural and unimproved state, that the value of the land used for the growth of saleable underwood shall be estimated as if the land were let for that purpose, and that where the land is used both for a plantation or a wood, and for the growth of saleable underwood, the value thereof shall be estimated either as if the land were used only as a plantation or wood, or as if the land were used only for the growth of the saleable underwood growing thereon. With respect to the woodlands in question, the assessment committee accordingly might have assessed them either as if they were used only as a plantation or a wood, or used only for the growth of saleable underwood. They have, however, elected to assess the property as woods, and not as saleable underwood. It ought, therefore, to be assessed as if it were waste land and as if it were divested of all timber and wood of any kind, and without taking into consideration any improvement which had been made, or of which the land might be capable. The word "occupied" signifies that the capabilities of the land are not to be taken into account, and that it is to be assessed as if it was to remain mere waste; that the land must be considered as simply and absolutely waste land, and as in the same state as it existed at the date of the creation, is borne out by the circular which has been issued by the local government board for the guidance of the assessment committees(a). The value of land in its natural state, without the power of improving it or converting it to any profitable use, must be very small, particularly as the natural and unimproved state cannot include underwood.

The woods cannot be assessed as saleable underwood, as it has been decided under a former Act that shrubs and other things which happen to grow upon the land cannot be called saleable underwood. It must be underwood planted for the purpose of being saleable. Assuming that sporting rights were assessable, they must be rated as sporting rights over waste, uncultivated land, with no timber, no underwood, no cover of any sort whatever. It will simply be the right to shoot such wild birds and animals as are likely to be found on land of this description.

Bealey (with him Forrest Fulton), for respondents.—It is admitted that the respondents, in making this rate, have adopted the words of the 1st sub-section of the 4th section, and have assessed the land as if, instead of being a plantation or wood, it was let and occupied in its natural and unimproved state; but it is contended that these words do not exclude the right which existed before the Rating Act 1874, of taking into account the enhanced value of real property arising from sporting rights, though those rights could not be separately assessed. Woods and plantations having been brought within the rating area, there attaches to them, as to other realty the enhanced value arising from sporting rights. The words natural and unimproved means, according to Mr. Fry, who was an authority upon the subject, simply that the land was to be valued as if the wood was not there. If, as argued for the appellant, it is to be considered as a desert waste, dry, arid, and incapable of cultivation, it would be useless as property, and not worthy of being rated. To ascertain the true meaning of this phrase, the Act for the valuation of land and heritages in Scotland (17 & 18 Vict. c. 91), in which a somewhat similar enactment is to be found, should be referred to. Sect. 6 of that Act provides that, when land consists of wood copse or underwood, the yearly value of the same shall be taken to be the rent at which such lands might in their natural state be reasonably expected to let from year to year as pasture or grazing lands. This, therefore, is a definition of the phrase "let and occupied in its natural and unimproved state," which, it is submitted, means the natural soil of the country without drainage, bearing the natural produce of the land, i.e., grass, capable of growing underwood or cereal crops. To regard the land as unproductive and incapable of becoming productive is not a proper reading of the Act of Parliament. The land must be assessed as being in its natural and unimproved state, with all the incidents to that state, and that, it is submitted, includes the sporting rights over it.

The CHAIRMAN, in delivering judgment, said.—The decision of the court is that the value of the woods described in the rate is fixed at an excessive

(a) It will be observed that the words used are as if the land, instead of being a plantation or wood, were let and occupied in its natural and unimproved state, and the word occupied was introduced in order to show clearly that the capabilities of the land for improvement were to be excluded from consideration in estimating the rent at which it might reasonably be expected to let from year to year, and that the land was to be valued as if it would continue to be occupied in its natural state without any expenditure of capital in its improvement, or, in other words, as if it were waste lands.

Hitherto it has not been the land but its produce, viz., the saleable underwood, that has been assessable, and although the present Act reverses that rule and renders the land assessable instead, the mode of arriving at the value will virtually remain the same, as the value of the land can only be arrived at by estimating the value of its produce.

amount, and that the rate be altered by the value of the woods being estimated as though the wood, instead of being a wood in plantation, were let and occupied in its natural and unimproved state, and therefore the rate will be 5s. instead of 15s. per acre. In coming to a conclusion our task has been rendered the more difficult because we have had to suppose the land rated to be very different to what it is, and it is left to our imagination to place an interpretation upon the words, "natural and unimproved state." It would be desirable to obtain as soon as possible the opinion of a Superior Court as to the proper meaning of these words.

KEET v. SMITH AND OTHERS.

ON APPEAL FROM THE ARCHES COURT OF CANTERBURY.

Inscription on tombstone—Word "Reverend"— Nonconformist minister.

The word "Reverend" is nothing more than a laudatory epithet. It is not a title of honour to be exclusively possessed by the clergy of the Established Church, as having episcopal ordination.

The appellant was described on a tombstone as "The Rev. H. K., Wesleyan minister."

Held, (reversing the judgment of the court below,) that this was not a sufficient reason for refusing a faculty for the erection of such tombstone.

The appellant was a Wesleyan minister, residing at Owston Ferry, in the county of Lincoln, and the respondents were the vicar and churchwardens of the parish.

In 1874 a daughter of the appellant died, and was buried in the churchyard at Owston Ferry. He was anxious to erect over her grave a tombstone with the following inscription: "I.H.S. In loving memory of Annie Augusta Keet, the younger daughter of the Rev. H. Keet, Wesleyan minister, who died at Owston Ferry, 11th May 1874, aged seven years and nine months. Safe sheltered from the storms of life."

The vicar, Mr. Smith, objected to the erection of the stone, on the ground that a Nonconformist minister should not be described by the title "Reverend;" and sent a verbal message to Mr. Keet to that effect. Mr. Keet then applied to the bishop, but he took the same view as the vicar had done.

A petition was thereupon presented to the Chancellor of the Diocese, Dr. W. G. F. Phillimore, praying him to grant a faculty to erect the said tombstone, bearing the said inscription. The learned chancellor, after hearing counsel in support of the petition, declined to issue the citation as prayed. An appeal was then brought to the Court of Arches.

The learned Dean of Arches, Sir Robert Phillimore, gave judgment on the 31st July 1875, when he expressly declined to pronounce any opinion as to whether a Wesleyan minister could be properly described by the title "reverend;" but he laid down that, the churchyard being the freehold of the incumbent, subject to the right of the parishioners, or of strangers who may die in the parish, to simple interment, but to no more, he has a prima facie right to prohibit altogether the placing of any gravestone, subject to the control of the ordinary. He then went on to say that he did not think it proper, or consonant with the practice of the court, to overrule the direct dissent of the incumbent, and the deliberate judgment of the bishop, in a matter not of strict law, but of discretion: and declined to issue the faculty as prayed. From this judgment the present appeal was brought.

The proceedings in both the courts below will be found reported in L. Rep. 4 A. & E. 398.

The respondents did not appear, and the appeal was consequently heard ex parte.

A. J. Stephens, Q.C. and Bayford, for the appellant, argued that the only question was whether the respondent had exercised a sound discretion; the character of the discretion to be exercised by an incumbent had been considered and defined by Sir John Nicholl in Butt v. Jones (2 Hag. Eccl. 424). The learned judge of the court below, instead of exercising his own discretion, appeared to have surrendered it to the bishop. He had no right to act on a private letter from the bishop to the appellant. [The court intimated that they concurred in this view.] In Harper v. Forbes (5 Jur. N. S. 275) Dr. Lushington decided in direct opposition to the deliberate judgment of the bishop. They also referred to

Sharpe v. Hunsard, 3 Hag. Eccl. 335;

Breaks v. Wolfrey, 1 Curt. 880.

Further the word "reverend" is not exclusively applicable to ordained clergymen. In the 15th and 16th centuries many instances may be found in which it was applied to laymen, and even to women; and also many cases in which clergymen, even bishops, were otherwise designated. It was very frequently applied to the Judges of the Superior Courts. In the Church of Rome a lady abbess is so addressed at the present day. The title was not confined to the clergy before 1662 (The Act of Uniformity) at the earliest, and even then it was always applied to Presbyterian ministers. It has been given to Wesleyans by the Secretary of State on several occasions, in replying to addresses from the Wesleyan body; by the authorities of the War Office and the Admiralty, to army and navy chaplains; and in proceedings in the Probate Court. The assumption that it implies episcopal ordination has no foundation.

Their Lordships' judgment was delivered by

The Lord Chancellor—In this case the appellant is a Wesleyan minister, residing at Owston Ferry, in the county of Lincoln; and being a parishioner in that parish, and having had the misfortune to lose an infant daughter in the year 1874, who was buried in Owston Ferry churchyard, he was desirous of erecting over her tomb a tombstone in a form a facsimile of which is given in page 6 of the appendix in the case. The Rev. Geo. Edward Smith is the vicar and incumbent of Owston Ferry. How far Mr. Smith might have objected to any tombstone being erected, or how far he might have objected to the tombstone in question being erected, upon the ground that in size or composition it was unsuitable for the place where it was proposed to be erected, it is unnecessary for their Lordships to consider, because no objection upon any of those grounds has been made by the vicar. In fact, in point of form no objection has been made by the vicar at all, because he has not communicated any objection in writing to the appellant, nor has he appeared at any of the stages of the case in the court below, nor has he appeared before their Lordships upon the present occasion. The only notification we have of his mind or feeling on the subject is derived in this way. It is stated in the petition that the appellant was informed by a stonemason that the vicar objected to the erection of the tombstone, and thereupon the appellant wrote to the vicar a letter, dated the 2nd June 1874 in these words: "Sir, The enclosed is a copy of the inscription we gave to Mr. Barningham"—he being the stonemason—"to be placed on the stone denoting where the remains of my dear child lie. I have been informed by him that you have an objection to it. Will you therefore please write me on the subject at your earliest convenience?" To that letter the vicar sent no reply, and on the 8th June the appellant addressed to him another letter in these words: "Sir, Having heard from Mr. Barningham that you object to the words 'Rev.' and 'Wesleyan minister' being inserted, and as I find similar expressions on tombstones in Epworth churchyard, will you kindly give me the reasons of your objection. It will be a great disappointment not to be able to have a stone. May I beg the courtesy of a reply per bearer." It is stated and not controverted that to this letter the appellant received only a verbal reply through a servant to the following effect: "Tell Mr. Keet that I saw Mr. Barningham last week, and that I have no more to say." Under these circumstances, their Lordships are obliged to assume that the vicar has no objection in the abstract to the erection of a tombstone; that he has no objection to the particular tombstone, as to its size or composition; and that his only objection is that which appears to have been stated in conversation to Barningham, that the inscription contains the word "reverend" with "Wesleyan minister." The inscription is in this form: In "Loving Memory of Annie Augusta Keet, the younger daughter of the Rev. H. Keet, Wesleyan minister, who died at Owston Ferry, May 11th, 1874, aged seven years and nine months." And then there is added, "Safe sheltered from the storms of life." Their Lordships, therefore, have to consider in their opinion this, and this only, whether the presence of the words "The reverend" before "H. Keet, Wesleyan minister," is a sufficient justification for refusing to allow this tombstone to be erected; and whether, therefore, a faculty should not issue authorising the erection of the tombstone. This appears to have been, in the minds of both the learned judges who have dealt with this case before, the question and the only question which they had to decide. Now, it appears to their Lordships to have been considered in the court below that the words "The Reverend" or the word "Reverend" prefixed to a proper name was to be treated in some manner as a title,—a title of honour or of dignity; and that titles being, as we all know, matters of right, and, as it were, of property, no person who could not show a particular legal right to use this word "Reverend" as a title of honour or of dignity could be permitted on any public occasion to make use of it; and further, it appears to have been the opinion of the learned judges that the clergy of the Established Church in this country possessing episcopal ordination had, as holding orders, a right and an exclusive right,—exclusive, if not shared by the clergy of the Church of Rome, but in other senses exclusive,—to use that title "Reverend." In the opinion of their Lordships, the word "Reverend" is not a title of honour or of dignity. It is an epithet, an adjective used as a laudatory or complimentary epithet, a mark of respect and of reverence, as the name imports, but nothing more. It has been used for a considerable length of time, not by any means for a very great length of time, by the clergy of the Church of England; for the time has been when that title was not commonly borne by them. It has been used in ancient times by persons who were not clergymen at all. It has been used for a considerable time, and it is used at the present day, in common parlance and in social intercourse, by ministers of denominations separate from the Church of England, by ministers of the Wesleyan church, by ministers of bodies holding a congregational form of government, and by Presbyterian ministers. It is a title which in ordinary life is conceded to them, and which, as among each other, they use. Under those circumstances, it appears to their Lordships impossible to treat this word as a title of honour exclusively possessed by the clergy of the Church of England, so that a minister of another denomination claiming to place it upon a public inscription should be refused permission so to do. To this it may be added, that if ever there were a case in which no possible misapprehension could arise even in the minds of those, if those there be, who think that the Church of England alone should possess the title, it is this case; because upon the face of this inscription there is not merely the use of the word "Reverend," but there is appended to the name "The Reverend H. Keet" the words "Wesleyan minister." Therefore, the inscription in substance states that although the person placing it there uses as a prefix the term "Reverend," he does not thereby claim to be a person in holy orders, but claims to be, and to be nothing more than, what in fact he is, a minister of the Wesleyan body. Their Lordships, therefore, dealing with this, which is the only objection made to the erection of this tombstone, are compelled to say, and they say without any hesitation, that in their judgment it does not afford a sufficient reason for refusing to allow the erection of the tombstone. They are, therefore, of opinion that a faculty should issue for this purpose; and they will humbly report to Her Majesty that the suit be remitted to the Arches Court in order to give effect to this recommendation.

JENKINS v. COOK.

ON APPEAL FROM THE ARCHES COURT OF CANTERBURY.
Ecclesiastical law—Refusal to administer Communion—Rubric to Communion Service—Canon 27

—Stat. 1 Edw. 6, c. 1, s. 8—Clergy Discipline Act (3 & 4 Vict. c. 86).

The prima facie right of a parishioner to partake of the Holy Communion being distinctly declared by Stat. 1 Edw. 6, c. 1, s. 8, the only cause which is sufficient under the rubric to justify a minister in repelling him of his own authority, is that he is "an open and notorious evil liver;" and under the 27th Canon, that he is "a common and notorious depraver of the Book of Common Prayer."

The appellant, a man of irreproachable moral character, published a book entitled "Selections from the Old and New Testaments," for use at family worship, and also a book of family prayers compiled from the Prayer Book. Afterwards, at the request of the respondent, the vicar of the parish, he wrote a private letter to him in which he stated that he omitted certain parts of the Bible from his family reading because he did not concur in the construction which in his opinion was usually put upon them.

Held (reversing the judgment of the court below),

(1) that the respondent was not justified in repelling him from the Communion, either under the rubric or the canon; omission not being rejection, nor rejection necessarily deprivation. (2) That the conduct of the respondent, being unjustifiable when it took place, could not be affected by anything which occurred afterwards between him and his bishop, there being nothing in the rubric or canon to shift the responsibility to the latter. (3) That proceedings were properly taken against the respondent, under the Clergy Discipline Act, without a previous appeal to the bishop.

This was a suit under the Clergy Discipline Act (3 & 4 Vict. c. 86), in which the office of the judge was promoted by Mr. Henry Jenkins, of Clifton, against the Rev. F. S. Cook, Vicar of Christ Church, Clifton, for an offence against the laws ecclesiastical, in having illegally, and without any just cause or reason, and contrary to his duty, refused to administer to him the Holy Communion.

The case came before the Court of Arches by virtue of letters of request from the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol.

The Dean of Arches (Sir R. Phillimore), gave judgment for the respondent, and from his judgment the present appeal was brought.

The case is reported below in 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 127, and L. Rep. 4 A. & E. 463.

The facts of the case, and the whole of the correspondence which passed between the parties and the bishop, are fully set out in the judgment in the court below.

Dr. Deane, Q.C., and J. F. Stephen, Q.C., for the appellant, argued that the case was novel and of very great importance to the appellant, for if the judgment of the court below was right, a parishioner so repelled had no remedy whatever against the clergyman. The appellant has been found guilty of constructive heresy on the ground that every passage omitted from his book is, in the words of his letter, "incompatible with religion and decency," whereas by statute and the common ecclesiastical law of the land every parishioner is entitled to receive the Communion unless he falls under the classes excluded by the rubric or the 27th Canon, which we submit do not touch the appellant's case; the respondent has, therefore, committed an ecclesiastical offence, and has laid himself open to proceedings under the Clergy

Discipline Act; the only object of giving notice to the bishop is that he may proceed against the offending parishioner. The mere omission of passages is not an offence contemplated by the rubric or the canon; and there is nothing proved against the appellant except the publication of the book, and the letter of 20th July; all the rest is mere hearsay.

A. J. Stephens, Q.C. and Jeune, for the respondent, contended that the respondent had committed no breach of ecclesiastical law, and was, therefore, not liable to be proceeded against criminally under the Clergy Discipline Act. Repelling might be in two ways, either by admonition out of church, or actual repulsion in church; it is then the duty of the clergyman to report to the bishop and abide by his order and direction. The respondent had "lawful cause" for repelling the appellant; he acted bonâ fide, and took the proper steps for securing the order of the bishop. The appellant was an "evil liver," having committed a spiritual offence. The clergyman must have a discretion. The fact of the repulsion, and the reasons for it, were sufficiently notorious.

Dr. Deane, Q.C., in reply.

Feb. 16.—Their Lordships' judgment was delivered by the LORD CHANCELLOR (Cairns):—In this case the appellant, a parishioner of Christ Church, Clifton, instituted proceedings under the Clergy Discipline Act, in the Court of the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, against the respondent, the vicar of the parish, for an offence against the laws ecclesiastical in refusing to administer to the appellant the sacrament of the Holy Communion. The case was sent by letters of request to the Court of Arches, and on the 16th July 1875, a sentence was pronounced by the Dean of Arches, dismissing the suit against the respondent and condemning the appellant in costs. From this sentence the appellant appeals to Her Majesty. There are no facts in dispute in the case, and the allegations as to the refusal complained of, and as to the grounds of the refusal, are extremely simple. The appellant alleges that on the 28th Sept. 1874, he gave notice in writing to the respondent of his intention to present himself to receive the Holy Communion at the mid-day service on the following Sunday, the 4th Oct. 1874, and that having presented himself accordingly, he was, without lawful cause, repelled, and the respondent refused to administer the sacrament to him. To this allegation the respondent answers that he on the day in question did refuse to deliver to the appellant, or to permit the appellant to receive, the elements of the Holy Communion when he presented himself to receive the same, for, and on account of the writing and publishing by the appellant of certain letters particularly referred to, and for and on account of his causing to be printed and published a certain volume of selections from the Old and New Testament, and for no other cause or reason whatsoever. These allegations, therefore, raise the issue, and the only issue, between the parties. In order, however, to appreciate properly the justification relied upon by the respondent, it is necessary to refer more particularly to the letters and volume referred to in the defensive allegation, and to the circumstances under which those letters were written. [His Lordship then went through the history of the case, and the correspondence as set out in the report in the court below, and continued:] These, then, are the letters written by the appellant, and this is the character of the volume the writing and publishing of which are stated by the respondent to have constituted the only cause for which he refused to permit the appellant to partake of the Holy Communion. The question is, do they constitute a sufficient cause. The prima facie right of a parishioner to partake of the Holy Communion might probably be maintained irrespective of any specific statutory enactment; but as the right is distinctly declared by the Statute 1 of Edw. 6, chap. 1, sect. 8, their Lordships may conveniently refer to the words of that enactment as it is set out in page 530 of the first volume of the revised statutes:

And also that the preist which shall minstre the same shall at the least one day before exhorte all persons which shalbe present likewise to resorte and prepare themselves to receive the same, and when the daie prefixed cometh after a godly exhortacon by the minister made, wherein shalbe further expressed the benefitt and comforte promised to them which worthelie receive the saide hollie Sacrament, and daunger and indignacon of God threatened to them wch shall presume to receive the same unworthelie, to thende that everie man maye trye and examyn his owne conscience before he shall receive the same, the saide minister shall not without lawfull cause denye the same to any persone that woulde devoutlie and humble desire it, anny lawe, statute, ordenance, or custome contrarie therunto in any wise notwithstanding.

In the argument before their Lordships, it has not been contended that, for the purpose of this case at all events, the "lawful cause" mentioned in the statute, was to be sought for elsewhere than in the rubric of the Book of Common Prayer prefixed to the Communion Service, or in the canons of 1603, and their Lordships therefore find it unnecessary to consider whether there could be any further or other "lawful cause" within the meaning of the statute. Neither is it necessary for their Lordships to decide, and they do not decide, that the canons, which do not, as such, bind the laity, could, of their own authority, prescribe "causes" which would be sufficient or "lawful" within the meaning of the statute. In this particular case the "lawful" causes relied upon are that the appellant must be taken, under the circumstances, to have been "an open and notorious evil liver" within the meaning of the rubric, and to have been "a common and notorious depraver of the Book of Common Prayer," within the meaning of the 27th Canon. Their Lordships will assume that the last named cause, that mentioned in the canon, would be, if made out, as valid and lawful a cause as that of being "an open and notorious evil liver," within the meaning of the rubric. The learned judge, from whose sentence the present appeal is brought, has expressed his opinion upon this point in the following words: "I am of opinion that the avowed and persistent denial of the existence and personality of the devil did, according to the law of the Church, as expressed in her canons and rubrics, constitute the promoter 'an evil liver,' and 'a depraver of the Book of Common Prayer and administration of the Sacraments,' in such sense as to warrant the defendant in refusing to administer the Holy Communion to him, until he disavowed or withdrew his avowal of this heretical opinion; and that the same consideration applies to the absolute denial by the promoter of the doctrine of the eternity of punishment, and, of course, still more to the denial of all punishment for sin in a future state, which is the legitimate consequence of his deliberate exclusion of the passages of Scripture referring to such punishment." Their Lordships must, in the first place, observe that the learned judge appears to have considered that, in the rubric to which reference is here made, the words defining a cause for repulsion are "an evil liver," and, in the canon, "a depraver of the Book of Common Prayer." This, however, is not the case. The rubric after stating that "So many as intend to be partakers of the Holy Communion shall signify their names to the curate at least some time the day before," proceeds as follows: "And, if any of those be an open and notorious evil liver, or have done any wrong to his neighbours by word or deed, so that the congregation be thereby offended, the curate, having knowledge thereof, shall call him and advertise him not to come to the Lord's table until he hath openly declared himself to have truly repented and amended his former naughty life, that the congregation may thereby be satisfied, which before were offended; and that he hath recompensed the parties to whom he hath done wrong, or, at least, declare himself to be in full purpose to do so as soon as he conveniently may." The words again of the 27th Canon, which is the canon relied on, are these:—"No minister, when he celebrateth the Communion, shall wittingly administer the same to any but to such as kneel, under pain of suspension; nor, under the like pain, to any that refuse to be present at public prayers according to the orders of the Church of England; nor to any that are common and notorious depravers of the Book of Common Prayer and administration of the sacraments, and of the orders, rites, and ceremonies therein prescribed, or of anything that is contained in any of the articles agreed upon in the convocation, one thousand five hundred and sixty-two, or of anything contained in the book of ordering the priests and bishops; or to any that have spoken against and depraved His Majesty's sovereign authority in causes ecclesiastical; except every such person shall first acknowledge to the minister, before the churchwardens, his repentance for the same and promise by word (if he cannot write), that he will do so no more, and except (if he can write), he shall first do the same under his hand-writing to be delivered to the minister, and by him sent to the bishop of the diocese, or ordinary of the place. Provided, that every minister so repelling any, as is specified either in this or the next precedent constitution, shall, upon complaint, or being required by the ordinary, signify the cause thereof unto him, and therein obey his order and direction." The "cause," therefore, which under the rubric is sufficient to warrant a minister of his own authority, and without any trial, in repelling a parishioner from the Holy Communion is that he is "an open and notorious evil liver," who thereby gives offence to the congregation, and, under the Canon, that he is "a common and notorious depraver of the Book of Common Prayer." Their Lordships therefore will proceed to consider whether the appellant is brought under either of these descriptions. And in the first place their Lordships must observe that if they had here to examine whether the appellant has in point of fact either entertained or expressed the opinions attributed to him by the learned Judge, or if they were called upon to decide that those opinions or any of them could be entertained or expressed by a member of the Church, whether layman or clergyman, consistently with the law and with his remaining in communion with the Church, they would have looked upon this case with much greater anxiety than they now feel in its decision. They desire to state in the most emphatic manner, both that there is not before them any evidence that the appellant entertains the doctrines attributed to him by the Dean of Arches, and that they do not mean to decide that those doctrines are otherwise than inconsistent with the formularies of the Church of England. This is not the subject for their Lordships' present consideration. What, and what alone they have to inquire is, whether the appellant can be properly held to be "an open and notorious evil liver" within the meaning of the rubric, or whether in the words of the canon he was "a common and notorious depraver of the Book of Common Prayer." As to the first of these inquiries there is absolutely no evidence whatever that the appellant was an evil liver, much less an open and notorious evil liver. The term "evil liver," according to the natural use of the words, is limited to moral conduct, and the distinction between conduct and belief is clearly recognised in the canons, especially in the contrast between the 109th and 110th. Against the moral character of the appellant there is no evidence and no imputation; and it appears from statements which are uncontroverted to have been irreproachable. Their Lordships therefore put aside this justification of the respondent as wholly inapplicable to the case, and they can only express their regret that through an inaccuracy in the use of words an imputation so misplaced and so irksome in its nature should have been made. Is, then, the appellant a common and notorious depraver of the Book of Common Prayer? The only specific reference to the Book of Common Prayer which is traced to the appellant is the statement that the Book of Family Prayer already mentioned was compiled by him entirely from the Book of Common Prayer, and that in a letter from him to the bishop, dated in Sept. 1874, he writes that he values the Book of Common Prayer "only second to the Bible itself." The mode, however, in which it is said that the appellant was a depraver of the Book of Common Prayer is this: It is assumed that all parts of the Holy Bible not printed in the "Selections" are omitted because they are rejected on the ground of the doctrine which they teach, and it is said that some parts so omitted are found in the Book of Common Prayer, or that doctrines in the Common Prayer are supported by some of these omitted passages. And it is contended that omission is rejection, and rejection depravation. In none of these propositions, nor in their logical connection can their Lordships concur. Omission is not rejection. If it were, the Lectionary in the Prayer Book would be open to this grave charge. Nor is rejection, however censurable or heretical, necessarily depravation. The terms "deprave or depraver," in their more ancient signification, are now little used, but their meaning in the sixteenth century may be well collected from the statute of Edw. 6, already referred to, where we find these expressions applied to the Sacrament of the Holy Communion:—"Whatever person shall deprave, dispise, or contempe the saide moste blessed Sacrament by any contemptuouse wordes, or by anny wordes of depravinge, dispising, or reviling, shall suffer imprisonment," &c. But was the appellant "a common and notorious depraver of the Book of Common Prayer?" Now, it was admitted in the court below, and in the argument before their Lordships, that the publishing and circulation of the book termed "Selections" could not possibly amount of itself to a depravation of the Book of Common Prayer, and could not indeed be construed to be an offence of any kind. But it was contended that these selections, coupled with the expressions in the letter of the 20th July, 1874, amounted to the offence in question. That letter must be construed with reference to the interview between the respondent and Mrs. Jenkins, which took place on the same day, and out of which interview the writing of the letter arose. It is obvious that the words, "the parts I have omitted," cannot refer to all the portions of the Bible not printed in the Selections; but must be limited to those parts which were more particularly referred to by the respondent at the interview. Construing the letter in connection with what passed at the interview, the expressions in it, which are not very distinct or intelligible, do not go farther than this, that the construction which the appellant placed upon certain parts of the Bible not being the same as the construction which, in his opinion, was generally placed upon those parts, he omitted them from his family reading. What his own construction is, or what he supposes to be the generally received construction, is not stated, and it would not be allowable, even if it were necessary, to arrive at either construction by surmise or suspicion. But it does not appear to their Lordships to be necessary to criticise more minutely the expressions in this letter, for the important question still remains, whatever be the construction of the letter, can the appellant in consequence of it be said to have been "a common and notorious depraver of the Book of Common Prayer?" Now the letter was not written by the appellant spontaneously. A message was sent to him through Mrs. Jenkins inviting him to write a letter to the respondent. It was proposed that the letter should be, and the letter was sent as, a friendly and private, as it was also a solicited, communication. It appears to their Lordships that even were there anything in the letter which could amount to a depravation of the Book of Common Prayer, which they do not suggest or think there is, still it would be impossible to hold that the writing of such a letter, under the circumstances which they have mentioned, could make the appellant "a common and notorious depraver." These observations would dispose of the case, were it not that their Lordships think that they should notice an argument much pressed at the bar, but to which their Lordships can attach no weight, namely, that by reason of the intervention, or possible intervention, of the bishop of the diocese, another remedy was, or might have been, open to the appellant, and that he ought not to have taken proceedings under the Clergy Discipline Act. This argument in fact divided itself into two parts. It was said, in the first place, that the respondent had duly reported to the bishop the grounds on which he had repelled the appellant from the holy communion, and that he was then entitled to wait until he received some order from the bishop on the subject, and that no such order was given. The other form of the argument was that the appellant had, under the rubric and canons, a right of appeal to the bishop personally, and that he either had not so appealed, or, if his communications with the bishop amounted to an appeal, the bishop had expressed his opinion against the appellant, and in favour of the respondent. As to the first part of this argument, their Lordships are clearly of opinion that the repelling by the respondent of the appellant must be judged of at the time when it took place, and could not be affected by anything afterwards occurring between the respondent and the bishop. At the time it took place it was either justifiable or unjustifiable. If justifiable, the respondent is, of course, entitled to succeed; but, if unjustifiable, the appellant must be immediately entitled to a remedy, and their Lordships can discover nothing which shifts the responsibility from the respondent and places it upon the bishop. Their Lordships also think that the remedy to which the appellant is entitled is that which in this case he has sought for. He complains that the respondent has committed an offence against the laws ecclesiastical by wrongfully refusing him admission to the holy communion, and he has followed the process prescribed by the Clergy Discipline Act. Their Lordships do not find in the rubric prefixed to the communion office any indication of an appeal to the bishop by a parishioner repelled from the communion. They find that an intimation is to be given to the bishop by the minister, but this is apparently for a purpose entirely different, namely, that the bishop may proceed against the person repelled to punish him pro salute animæ. With regard to an appeal under the canon, their Lordships do not understand how an appeal given by a canon, even if it were given, could take away a higher right to maintain proceedings for a violation of a right protected by statute. But their Lordships do not understand that the canon referred to in this case, the 27th, professes to give the repelled person any right of appeal; and even if it did, the Bishop in the present case appears throughout to have expressed the opinion that he ought not himself to decide the question between the appellant and the respondent, but that it should be decided in proceedings such as have been taken. On the whole, their Lordships are of opinion that they must advise Her Majesty to reverse the sentence of the Dean of Arches, and in remitting the cause to admonish the respondent, the Rev. Flavel Smith Cook, for having, on the 4th Oct. 1874, without lawful cause, refused to deliver to the appellant, or permit the appellant to receive, the elements of the Holy Communion, and, further, to admonish him to refrain from committing the like offence in future. Their Lordships have no doubt that the respondent has acted throughout in good faith, and in the conscientious belief that he was discharging a duty imposed him, and they have also not failed to observe that this controversy appears to have been preceded by an uncalled for, and, as they think, uncourteous letter, written by the appellant to the respondent, his minister, protesting against and condemning a sermon preached by him. Their Lordships cannot, however, hold that there is in these circumstances sufficient to warrant them in departing from the general rule according to which the respondent must pay the costs in the court below and on appeal.

COURT OF APPEAL.

SITTINGS AT WESTMINSTER.

Reported by GILBERT G. KENNEDY, Esq., Barrister-at-law.

Tuesday, Jan. 18, 1876.

(Before Lord COLERIDGE, C.J., JAMES and MELLISH, L.J.J., BAGGALLAY, J.A., and CLEASBY, B.)

PYM v. HARRISON.

ERROR FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH.

Devise of right of way before Wills Act—Words of limitation—Intention of testator—Personal privilege—Excessive user.

Plaintiff's and defendant's lands adjoined each other, plaintiff's land being on the south and defendant's on the north, and about the middle of the boundary was a gate into defendant's land at the end of a lane or road leading to this gate from the public street, and passing through the plaintiff's land. On the eastern side of the defendant's land adjoining the highway, was a house in a ruinous state, which was once, in 1830, a dwelling-house, and in the centre of defendant's land, equidistant from the gate and the house, and surrounded by a garden, was a separate building, then used as a kitchen for the house. The remainder of defendant's land had been partly and at different times garden, orchard, grass, &c. The owner of plaintiff's and defendant's premises, who died in 1830, by his will devised to his nephew, the defendant's predecessor, the said kitchen and garden. The will then continued as follows: "I will and direct that my said nephew, John Harrison, shall have the privilege or right of a road for loading coals and dung, and other necessary things, through the said gate, to the said kitchen and garden."

This right of a road, which was the lane or road above mentioned, was at that time the only approach to the said kitchen and garden. Shortly afterwards the remainder of the premises now occupied by defendant came by inheritance into the possession of John Harrison, whereby he had other access to the highway through the ruined dwelling-house, though the only approach for a horse and cart was through the way in dispute. The defendant, who carried on the business of a coal higgler, used the said kitchen as a stable for his horse, and made use of the said way with his cart and horse.

Held (reversing the decision of the Queen's Bench); that this grant of a right of way was merely a personal privilege for the life of the grantee; for that by the words of the devise merely a life estate in the easement passed, and it was manifestly the intention of the testator that the right should not extend beyond the lifetime of the devisee.

This was an action of trespass brought by the plaintiff against the defendant. The action came on to be tried before Baron Pollock at the Derby Summer Assizes, 1873, when, by order of the learned judge and by consent of the parties, a case was stated for the opinion of the court without pleadings.

The three questions in dispute were: First, the right of defendant to use a private roadway over ground occupied by plaintiff; secondly, if he had the right whether the user was excessive; and, thirdly, whether the defendant had, by non-interference on the part of the plaintiff and his predecessors, obtained a prescriptive right to use this road.

The plaintiff's and defendant's lands adjoin each other along their greatest length, the plaintiff's land lying to the south, and coloured green on the plan annexed to the case, the defendant's land lying to the north, and coloured pink, orange, and blue on the plan; both lands extended to the east as far as a public street and highway. About the middle of the boundary is a gate at the end of the lane or road leading to this gate from the said highway over the plaintiff's land.

On the defendant's land, opposite and close to the said gate, is a separate building (coloured pink), surrounded by a garden (also coloured pink); on the eastern side of defendant's land abutting on the said highway is a house (coloured blue), and extending from this house westward, up to, and beyond the said separate building is the property of the defendant (coloured orange).

In 1786, Abraham Harrison the elder, surrendered a messuage, bakehouse, and garden, coloured orange on the plan hereto annexed, to the use of himself for life, and after his death to the use of his son, Abraham Harrison the younger, for his life, and after his death to the use of Elizabeth, the wife of Abraham Harrison the younger, for her life, and after her death and the death of the survivor of Abraham Harrison the younger and Elizabeth his wife, to the use of the heirs of the body of Abraham Harrison the younger, and in default of such issue, to the use of his own right heirs.

At the same time, Abraham Harrison the elder surrendered the messuage coloured blue on the said plan, to the use of Ann Harrison, his daughter-in-law, for her life, and after her death to the use of John Harrison, her eldest son, and the heirs of his body, and for default of such issue to the use of his own right heirs.

The said Abraham Harrison the elder, died in or about the year 1787.

The said Abraham Harrison the younger, in addition to the life estate in the property coloured orange, to which he succeeded on the death of his father, Abraham Harrison the elder, was also entitled to the copyhold property coloured pink and green on the said plan.

During the life of the said Abraham Harrison the younger, the building shown on the property coloured pink, was used by him as a kitchen, the eastern half of the property coloured pink on the said plan was used by him as a garden, while the western half was used by him as a croft. Access to the garden was obtained over the road marked on the plan, which was used by the said Abraham Harrison the younger soon after he acquired the property coloured pink, and which has been used since the death of the said Abraham Harrison the younger, in manner hereinafter mentioned.

Abraham Harrison the younger, by his will dated the 25th Jan. 1830 (the material parts of which are set out in this paragraph) devised to his wife, Elizabeth Harrison, for her life, with remainder to Thomas Richardson and the heirs of his body, the dwelling-house, crofts, outbuildings, and appurtenances, and piece of land therein described (being the premises coloured green in the said plan appended to this case), and, after making several other devises, the testator gave and devised all his other freehold and copyhold hereditaments unto his executors thereafter named, during the life of his wife, in trust, to apply the rents and profits for the purposes of his will, and after the decease of his wife the testator gave and devised to his nephew, John Harrison, and to his heirs and assigns for ever, all that kitchen standing behind a dwelling-house wherein Thomas Herrod then lived (such dwelling-house being the premises coloured orange on the plan), and also the garden behind the said dwelling-house and premises occupied by the said Thomas Herrod, and so much of the upper and lower croft adjoining as would enlarge the garden so as to extend to the bottom of the lower croft, and so as to be eighteen yards in width from the top or kitchen end all the way down to the bottom (the kitchen and garden so devised to the said John Harrison, form the part coloured pink in the plan). The said will then proceeds as follows:—"And I will and direct that my said nephew, John Harrison, shall have the privilege or right of a road for loading coals and dung and other necessary things, through the large gate opening from Bridge-street, near to the cow-house in the said upper croft over the said upper croft to the said kitchen and garden."

The said testator, Abraham Harrison, died on the 6th Feb. 1830, and his will was proved in the same year.

The testator's widow, the said Elizabeth Harrison, entered into possession of the premises so devised to her, and died on 9th Nov. 1839. Thereupon the said Thomas Richardson was admitted on 2nd March 1841, to hold as customary tenant in tail the lands and tenements devised to him as aforesaid according to the custom of the manor of Beaureper, and the said John Harrison entered into possession of the lands and tenements respectively devised to him in the said will.

Upon the death of Elizabeth Harrison, the tenant for life, John Harrison became entitled as customary heir of Abraham Harrison the elder, and entered into possession of the property coloured orange, but was not formally admitted until 17th July 1852.

Upon the death of his mother Ann Harrison in 1831, the said John Harrison entered into possession of the property coloured blue on the plan to which he had become entitled under the surrender made by Abraham Harrison the elder in 1786, but was not formally admitted until 17th July 1852.

On 17th July 1852, John Harrison surrendered the property coloured blue to uses to bar the estate tail therein.

From the death of Elizabeth Harrison in 1839, down to the year 1860 or 1861, John Harrison or his tenant used the road in question in connection with their use and occupation of the building on the property coloured pink as a kitchen, and of the remainder of the property coloured pink as a garden and orchard in the manner hereinafter mentioned.

In 1860 or 1861, the said kitchen ceased to be used as a kitchen and became a pig-stye, and from 1871 until the present time has been used as a stable. From and after such change of user in 1860 or 1861 down to the death of the said John Harrison, which took place on 7th March 1865, the said John Harrison or his tenants used the road in question in connection with their use and occupation of the said building as a pig-stye, and of the remainder of the property coloured pink, as a garden and orchard in manner hereinafter mentioned.

John Harrison, by his will dated 7th May 1861, devised the properties coloured blue, orange, and pink respectively, to Joseph Wright and Michael Jessop, upon trust to sell the same, and the said Joseph Wright having disclaimed the property so devised to him, the said Michael Jessop was admitted alone on 10th May 1866.

On the same day Michael Jessop surrendered the properties so devised to him in trust for sale to Joseph Wright, in fee, to whom he had sold the same. The defendant is and was at the time of the alleged trespass the tenant to Joseph Wright of the properties coloured blue, orange, and pink.

From the death of John Harrison down to the sale to Joseph Wright, Michael Jessop, and from the sale to Joseph Wright down to 1871, Joseph Wright or their respective tenant used the road in question without interruption in connection with their use and occupation of the said building as a pig-stye, and from 1871 to 12th June 1872 as a stable, and of the said remainder of the land coloured pink as a garden and orchard.

From 1839 to 1848, whilst the defendant's premises were in the occupation of one Thomas Herrod as tenant, the road in question was constantly used by him for the purposes of driving cows, sheep, and pigs, and for carrying cabbages, manure, straw, coals, firewood, and other things of like character in a wheelbarrow. The said road was also used by him with his horse and cart at the time of hay harvest when he carried his hay from some other grass land in his possession and stacked it upon the said croft coloured pink.

From 1848 to 1868, whilst the defendant's premises were in the occupation of one George Berresford as tenant, the said road was constantly used by him for the purposes for which the said Thomas Herrod constantly used the same as in the last paragraph mentioned. Bricks, sand, mortar, lime, and stone, had also at one or more times been carried in a cart drawn by a horse along the said road for the purpose of being worked up or used by him upon the said croft in the way of his trade as a stonemason, but such user was not shown to be of a general or continuous character, but was of an exceptional and temporary character in connection with some temporary arrangements with regard to his said trade as a stonemason.

No interruption, interference, or dispute of any kind had at any time arisen with respect to the said road until after the plaintiff had entered into possession in June 1872, nor had any notice whatever been given to the owners from time to time of the premises now in the occupation of the plaintiff of any difference in or enlargement of the user of the said road until after the plaintiff had entered into possession in June 1872.

Save the road in question there is not now and never has been any access for carts, horses, or cattle to the said property coloured pink, and save the road in question there is not and never has been any access for persons on foot to the said property except through the sitting-room of the house coloured orange. The said house is now in a ruinous state, and can be and has occasionally been used as a passage for persons on foot passing from the High Street to the said property, and cows can be and have occasionally been driven down the said passage and through the said sitting-room. The said passage is too narrow to admit of the passage of a cart.

The property so as aforesaid devised to the said Thomas Richardson (coloured green upon the plan accompanying and part of this case), included the upper croft, and now belongs to the plaintiff's landlords, viz.: the Right Honourable Lord Belper, Anthony Radford Strutt, Esquire, and George Henry Strutt, Esquire, as tenants in common, they or their predecessors in title having purchased it from the said Thomas Richardson, who had previously made a surrender on the 6th July 1852, of the premises with a view to cutting off the entail created by Abraham Harrison's will. A copy of the court roll containing such surrender accompanies and forms part of this case.

The plaintiff became tenant to Lord Belper and Messrs. Strutt, of the premises coloured green on the plan in 1872, and sues for the injury done to his occupation by the use of the road in question by the defendant as hereinafter mentioned.

The defendant, who is a coal higgler and stationer, uses the building upon the property coloured pink, as a stable for the horse kept by him in the way of his business, and places his cart in the garden coloured pink, and the defendant makes use of the said road in question passing over the same to and from the said stable and garden with his cart and horse.

Mellor, Q.C. and G. G. Kennedy for the plaintiff, the present appellant. — This will was drawn before the Wills Act, and according to the then strict construction of law, "that a devise without words of limitation conveys but a life estate to the devisee," John Harrison, under whom the defendant claims, took but a life estate in this right of way. But more than that, it is evidently the intention of the testator that nothing more than a life estate or personal privilege in this easement shall pass to John Harrison. The testator, or the person who drew up his will, must have been some one conversant with legal words, and one who knew the effect of such words, for the will abounds with words of art and other limitations, such as "heirs," "heirs-at-law," "to the use," "tenants in common," and there is also another right of way devised in fee. [MELLISH, L.J.—Had John Harrison any other access to the property? Not at that time. [COLERIDGE, C.J.—If the testator had meant to give this road unto John Harrison until he had other access, he might have said so.] But we contend he has impliedly said so, for the testator must be taken to have known, at the time he made his will, that John Harrison was entitled, subject to the life estate of his mother, to the property coloured blue as tenant in tail, and to the property coloured orange, as heir-at-law of Abraham Harrison the elder, and that therefore John would in all probability shortly come into possession of the properties coloured blue, orange, and pink, whereby he would have other access to the kitchen; these devolutions of property did in fact take place during the lifetime of John Harrison; so that the intention of the testator to give this right of way for a short time proved sufficient for the purpose for which it was intended, namely, to give John Harrison access to the property over the defendant's land, until he came into property which would give him access through land of his own. The use he is to make of this right of way strengthens this contention, it is not a general right of way, but a way for limited purposes. [MELLISH, L.J.—Where there is a devise of land in fee, and also of something appurtenant to that land, is not the devise of the thing appurtenant coextensive with that of the land?] Not always; in the case of a rentcharge it is not: (Nichols v. Hawkes, 10 Hare 342.) [MELLISH, L.J.—That would not be the same thing. JAMES, L.J.—Suppose a devise of land in fee, and with it a devise of hedge bote and fire bote out of an adjoining close?] In that case the devise of the hedge bote and fire bote would be for life only: (Reay v. Rawlinson, 30 L. J. 330, Ch.) Secondly, there has been an excess of user by the plaintiff, whereby the easement has been rendered more burdensome to the servient tenement than the testator intended it should be, and the easement is thereby extinguished.

Hemming v. Burnett, 8 Ex. 1;

Allen v. Gomms, 11 A. & E. 760;

Williams v. James, L. Rep. 2 C. P.;

Wood v. Saunders, L. Rep. 10 Ch. 582;

Cooling v. Higginson, 4 M. & W. 245.

Wills, Q.C. (Cave, Q.C. with him), for the defendant.—The intention of the testator was to grant this right of way as appurtenant to the land. [MELLISH, L.J.—Did Abraham Harrison the younger use this way?] Yes, he had no other access. If this way had not been mentioned, there would have been a devise of a kitchen and garden without any access at all, and this shows that the way was not meant to be a mere personal privilege. [JAMES, L.J.—Supposing the land belonged to John Harrison, how would you then construe the devise of this way?] In that case the land would be land without any access. [MELLISH, L.J.—Is it not the law that the way of necessity ceases when the necessity ceases?] In all the cases in which that has been decided, the land over which the way has led fell into the possession of the person claiming the right of way. [MELLISH, L.J.—How did the owner of orange get through the highway, but through blue?] It is found in the case there is no way for carts through blue. We have also a right by prescription. [MELLISH, L.J.—If you prove a right by prescription, do you prove a right for all purposes?] For all purposes. [BAGGALLAY, J. A.—I find in the will a devise of another right of way for the owners and occupiers of certain other property devised by the testator in fee.]

Mellor, Q.C., in reply.—It is decided in Holmes v. Goring (2 Bing 76), that the way of necessity will cease when the necessity ceases. On the question of prescription, no amount of user without the knowledge of the owner can bind the servient tenement.

COLERIDGE, L. J.—In this case we have to construe a provision in a devise of the year 1830, and therefore a devise before the Wills Act came into operation; consequently we have to be guided by the rules of law existing at that time. We have, moreover, to deal with matters of a complicated nature, but which when explained and arranged by counsel are clear, and form themselves into four distinct matters of devise. They are distinguished on the plan by the colours blue, orange, pink, and green, and it appears that John Harrison, under whom the defendant claims, took in various ways the lands coloured blue (the ruined dwelling-house), pink (kitchen and garden), and orange (the remainder of the property); he never had green, and the question is to what extent had he a right of way over green to pink? He took pink by devise, and orange at the same moment by inheritance as right heir of the settlor, by a settlement which had been made in 1786. He was also tenant in tail to blue with remainder to himself in fee under the settlement, but he did not come into possession of blue at the same time with pink and orange. Such being the state of the property, the defendant under and by virtue of the proviso in the will, claims to be entitled to this right of way, as a way for all purposes, and at the same time a more convenient way to the kitchen and garden; this claim is now in dispute, and we find that, although the way was more convenient, yet that he now has other access to the property through the ruinous house which is coloured blue, though, at the date of the testator's will, this road in dispute was the only access to the property. Such being the state of things, the question arises what is the effect which the court is to give to the following devise? "I will and direct that my said nephew, John Harrison, shall have the privilege or right of road for loading coals and dung, and other necessary things, through the large gate opening from Bridge-street near to the cow-house in the said upper croft over the said upper croft to the said kitchen and garden." There can be no doubt that at the time the will was written, according to the rules of law which then existed (before the Wills Act had come into operation), the words in dispute would not have been sufficient to convey the fee to John Harrison, and the court is bound to give effect to those rules unless, from an inspection of the whole document, it is apparent that the intention of the testator would be frustrated, and in that case, if it was evidently the intention of the testator to pass the fee, the court would give effect to such intention. Here, however, the court have looked into the will itself, which appears to have been drawn by someone conversant with terms of art, and it appears, moreover, that the devise of this right of way occurs between two separate devises in fee. [His Lordship read from the will.] In addition to that, as Sir Richard Baggallay has pointed out, in other parts of the will rights are bequeathed in which legal terms are used, and in another part of the will there is a devise of a right of way which is distinctly granted as appurtenant to certain premises devised. At the same time other estates in fee are also created, showing that the will we have to deal with was drawn up by some person who knew the effect of legal terms. The inflexible rule of law is that legal words are to be given their legal interpretation, and seeing that in this will there is nothing to compel or induce the court to turn aside from the ordinary rules of interpretation, I come to the conclusion that when the testator uses the words "I will and direct that John Harrison shall have the privilege or right of road, &c.," he means what he says. It has been suggested, very reasonably, that a way of necessity must be given, because, without any mention of a right of way, the law would have put one in as a way of necessity, but if this were so, I am not sure but that would only apply to a certain reasonable length of time, namely, up to the time when John Harrison came into possession of pink, orange, and blue. The moment he became possessed of all these properties, he would have other access, and the right would cease, and authority has pointed out that the way would cease when the necessity ceases; in point of fact, in five or six years the necessity for this way would have ceased, and John Harrison would have other access to it. I say now, what I said in the argument on the limited construction of this devise, John Harrison got all the testator meant to give him, he meant at all events that John Harrison should have this right of way for his lifetime. He knew that John Harrison would soon have other access to the property, and it seems to me, by the true construction of the will, that the right and privilege was limited to the lifetime of John Harrison, and that therefore the defendant cannot succeed. Then it has been suggested that the defendant can make out the right he claims by-user, because there has been from 1839 to 1868 a user by John Harrison or John Harrison's tenants sufficient to gain the right. Now without going into the difficult and unsettled question of what would be the effect of coming into a limited right, and then endeavouring by user to enlarge such right, or what effect a tacit assent might have on such user I do not say, but I conceive it to be impossible for the defendant to enlarge this from a personal right to a fee, which is the only effect such user could have; and I come to the conclusion that whether under the will or not, nothing has been made out to justify the defendant's right to use this way.

JAMES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It was conceded that if at the time of the direction in this will relating to the right of way in dispute, John Harrison had been possessed in fee of the land to which the way leads, that then these words, "I will and direct that John Harrison," &c., would not have given anything more than the right to John Harrison for himself. But let that be so, how are we to give a different meaning to these words than that which they ordinarily would bear? Is there any inference we can draw from the will to say that something else was the meaning of the testator? It would be very singular for the testator simply to give this right for life, when he could have easily expressed a larger right; he might have known that John Harrison would not abuse this right. We have no means of knowing this one way or the other, for we are dealing with words themselves, and the meaning of those words is to give the right to John Harrison alone, and not to John Harrison, his heirs and assigns. On the first point, therefore, I am unable to agree with the Court of Queen's Bench. With regard to the second point, which was, assuming this right of way to be a right in fee simple, whether, originally a gift for limited purposes, it has been altered by user? With regard to that, there was a case recently decided by the Court of Appeal with reference to a right of way over Wimbledon Common, and there, entirely adopting the rule of law as laid down in Williams v. James (ubi sup.), we decided that the use must be limited to the reasonable use, for the purposes of land in the state in which it appeared to be when the right arose(a).

MELLISH, L. J.—We have here to decide whether a devise of a right of way is to be construed to be a way for all purposes and for all times, whether by the will or by user, or by necessity, or whether it is to be a right limited to the lifetime of the devisee. The material matter on which we have to proceed is the will, and this, beyond all question, uses words which, according to their natural interpretation, would give an interest for life only. Whether this way is appurtenant or not is not necessary to decide. This case is not alleged to belong to that class of cases decided before the Wills Act in which the courts have enlarged the estate devised; still, if from reading the whole will we can discover any intention to grant a larger estate than here is strictly given, we would decide in favour of such intention; but when we look at the will, and the reasons for conferring on the devisee an estate only for life, we cannot but come to the conclusion that that is all the testator meant to give. The reason given against this is, that, if we do not hold this to be a devise in fee, on John Harrison's death, the way would be a way of necessity, and the testator could not have contemplated that. Now if there really had been no other way, then considerable weight would attach to that argument, but the strong probability was that John Harrison before his death would come into the blue property as tenant in tail. He was possessed in fee of the remainder of the property, and therefore on his death this would not be a way of necessity. It therefore comes to be a question of probability. Are these probabilities sufficient to induce the court to hold this to be a devise in fee, or are they not? I am of opinion they are not. There is then under the will no such right of way as is claimed. Is there then a right of way by necessity? It is clear there is not. It is no answer to this to say there is another way only narrower, because in such case the owner can enlarge it. In the next place, is there any way by user? John Harrison did not get this right of way for all purposes, and in that case no user would give any greater right. No doubt there is the question whether the change in the premises has not affected the right, but it is not necessary to decide that, as there must be a substantial change. It is not necessary to give an opinion on this, because the inference of fact we should draw is that the user was intended to be a user under the will, and was so understood by all parties.

BAGGALLAY, J. A.—I am of the same opinion and for the reasons given.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

DIVISIONAL COURT FOR APPEALS FROM INFERIOR COURTS.

Reported by M. W. McKELLAR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Thursday, Jan. 27, 1876.

SAUNDERS v. WHITTLE.

Master and servant—Leaving service—Wages of current week.

Plaintiff was hired by defendant as a painter, by the week, his wages to be sevenpence per hour, payable every Saturday at noon. The full week was fifty-four and a half hours, concluding at 5.30 p.m. on each Friday, but overtime was paid at the same rate. The engagement was determinable by either party at a week's notice.

Plaintiff left the service without notice, on a Friday at noon, having completed fifty-seven hours, including overtime, since the previous Friday.

Held, upon appeal from a County Court, that the plaintiff could not recover his wages for the current week of his leaving the service.

APPEAL from the County Court of Lancashire, holden at Warrington.

This was an action brought to recover the sum of 1l. 13s. 3d., claimed by the plaintiff as due to him from the defendant for wages.

The plaintiff is a journeyman painter, and the defendant a painter, plumber, and glazier, carrying on business at Warrington, in the county of Lancaster.

Plaintiff was hired by defendant as a painter, by the week. His wages were to be 7d. per hour, payable every Saturday at noon. Either party was to be at liberty to determine the engagement by giving to the other one week's notice of his intention to do so.

The plaintiff entered upon the service, and a time sheet, showing the number of hours worked by the plaintiff during the week, was brought in every Saturday morning by the plaintiff, and the amount of wages he received varied according to the hours he had made during the week. The full week consisted of fifty-four hours and a half, calculated from 6 a.m. on Saturday to 5.30 p.m. on the following Friday; overtime was paid for at the same rate per hour as the ordinary time. The hours of each day were calculated from 6 a.m. to 5.30 p.m., except Saturday, which ended at noon, and Monday, when the hours were calculated from 7 a.m. instead of 6 a.m.

In the course of a week defendant had occasion to complain of plaintiff's work, and the latter took offence and refused to finish the job in hand, and left at mid-day on a Friday, without having given defendant any notice.

The amount sought to be recovered by the plaintiff in the action was for fifty-seven hours work, calculated (including some overtime) up to noon on the Friday.

On the trial of the action, on the 12th Aug. last, it was contended on behalf of the defendant that the plaintiff, by leaving his work unfinished and before the expiration of the current week, and without notice, had forfeited any right to be paid for the hours he had worked up to the time of his so leaving, inasmuch as, although the plaintiff's wages were to be calculated at a certain price per hour, the engagement was in fact a weekly one, with all the consequences incident to such a hiring.

On the other hand, it was contended, on behalf of the plaintiff, that the hiring was of such a character as to entitle the plaintiff to his wages for the hours which he had actually worked, so that, although he had left his work without notice, he was entitled to be paid for every complete hour that he had worked up to the time of his leaving, and Button v. Thompson (L. Rep. 4 C. P. 330) was relied on. His Honour the judge, concurring in this view, gave a verdict for the plaintiff.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether, on the facts as stated in this case, the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

B. Pollock argued for appellant, the defendant. —The case referred to, Button v. Thompson, is not in point; the plaintiff was a sailor at monthly wages, and all that was held, even by the majority of the court, was that he was entitled to wages for the month preceding that during which he was left behind by his ship through his own misconduct. Brett, J., considered he was not entitled to any wages unless he completed the voyage. Walsh v. Walley (L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 367) was decided upon an agreement that wages should be forfeited under the circumstances which took place; but in his judgment Cockburn, C.J., said, "the wages of the current week would have been forfeited by the general law." The old cases are all cited in the notes to Cutler v. Powell (2 Sm. L. Cas., 7th edit., pp. 11 to 49).

No one appeared for the respondent.

CLEASBY, B.—This question is concluded by the statement of the case. The plaintiff was employed by the week, although his payment was computed by the hour. Button v. Thompson merely decided upon a peculiar contract, that a servant was entitled to wages earned during the month before that in which he absented himself. It is no authority that he would have been entitled to his current wages. Here the plaintiff was engaged by the week, and having left his service during a week, he could have no claim for the wages he would have earned at the end of it.

GROVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. This case is not touched by Button v. Thompson, but is clearly within the well established rule of the other authorities cited.

CLEMSON (app.) v. HUBBARD (resp.)

Employers and Workmen Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 90), s. 4—Dispute under the Act—Breach of contract—Summary jurisdiction.

Sect. 4 of the Employers and Workmen Act 1875 enacts, that a dispute under the Act (defined by sect. 3 as any dispute between an employer and a workman, arising out of or incidental to their relation as such) may be heard and determined by a court of summary jurisdiction.

Held, upon a case stated by justices who had declined jurisdiction, that a dispute under that section included a claim by an employer for damage caused by his workman's absence without notice, no explanation having afterwards taken place between them; and that the justices must hear and determine it.

DIV. APP.]

CLEMSON (app.) v. HUBBARD (resp.).

[DIV. APP.]

THIS was a case stated pursuant to 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, by three justices for the borough of Derby.

On the 29th Sept. 1875, John Clemson, of the said borough, boot manufacturer, applied at the court of petty sessions for the said borough, for a summons against Edward Hubbard, a workman then in his employment, and delivered, pursuant to rule No. 1, made under the Act 38 & 39 Vict. c. 90, the following particulars of his cause of action :

Edwd. Hubbard,
1875. Dr. to Mr. John Clemson.
Sept. 27. To damage and loss caused by your absenting yourself from my employment from this date, without giving previous notice, and whereby I have suffered damage to the amount of 5l. and upwards £5

Summons having been thereupon issued and served, the said Edward Hubbard, pursuant thereto, appeared before us at the Police Office, Town Hall, in Derby aforesaid, on the 6th Oct. 1875. The attorney for the said John Clemson opened his case by stating that the proceedings were under the Employers and Workmen Act 1875; that the then defendant had contracted with the plaintiff, his client, as a cutter-out in his trade of a boot manufacturer, at weekly wages; that on Saturday, the 25th Sept. 1875, the defendant having finished his current week's work, and received his wages, but having given no notice or intimation whatever of his intention to leave the complainant's service, had absented himself on Monday morning, the 27th, and had not afterwards resumed his work, nor offered any explanation of his conduct; that by this sudden and unexpected absence the defendant had occasioned serious inconvenience and loss to the plaintiff, who would have suffered little or none if the defendant had given (as it was contended he was bound to have done) a week's notice of his intention to leave the plaintiff's service.

Hereupon the defendant's attorney objected that the plaintiff, on his own showing, was out of court; that here there was no dispute (in the words of the Act) arising out of or incidental to the relation of employer and workman, inasmuch as the defendant, until the present moment, had had no distinct intimation that the plaintiff claimed from him a week's notice, and hence had had no opportunity of disputing that claim; that the foundation of the justices' jurisdiction, in all cases under the Act, is the fact of the existence of such a "dispute;" that here the plaintiff's particulars showed that the present was a simple action for damages for breach of contract, which the County Court might well entertain under its Common Law Jurisdiction, but which neither it nor the justices had power, under the Employers and Workmen Act, to try. The plaintiff urged that a dispute in fact existed, sufficient to found the magistrates' jurisdiction, or, at all events, would do so if the other side would now pro forma do what it did in fact, viz., deny the plaintiff's claim. The defendant's attorney, however, declined either to admit or deny the claim, and contended that, even if he should deny it, his denial would not give the court jurisdiction, inasmuch as the cause of action would then be something which had arisen since, and which did not exist when the action was brought by the entry of the plaint; that the only question was, whether a dispute existed at that time, and that it was immaterial whether a dispute existed at the present moment or not.

It appearing to the justices that the objection urged on behalf of the defendant to this jurisdiction was well founded, and that the intention of the Employers and Workmen Act 1875, as indicated in its title, and all its provisions, is not to give justices any general authority like that possessed at common law by the County Court to try actions for breach of contract, but to confer upon them conjointly with the County Court an entirely new jurisdiction, viz, to arbitrate in an equitable rather than strictly legal sense "disputes" between employers and workmen who are unable to adjust them amicably, the justices dismissed the case.

Lawrance argued for appellant, the complainant. —The sole question is, whether this was such a case as was intended to be included in the summary jurisdiction given to justices by sect. 4 of the Employers and Workmen Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 90). The words are: "A dispute under this Act between an employer and a workman may be heard and determined by a court of summary jurisdiction, and such court, for the purposes of this Act, shall be deemed to be a court of civil jurisdiction, and in a proceeding in relation to any such dispute the court may order payment of any sum which it may find to be due as wages, or damages, or otherwise, and may exercise all or any of the powers by this Act conferred on a County Court: Provided that in any proceeding in relation to any such dispute the court of summary jurisdiction—(1) shall not exercise any jurisdiction where the amount claimed exceeds 10l.; and (2) shall not make an order for the payment of any sum exceeding 10l., exclusive of the costs incurred in the case; and (3) shall not require security to an amount exceeding 10l. from any defendant or his surety or sureties."

Buszard appeared on behalf of the justices, and argued in support of their decision for the defendant.—The justices' jurisdiction in this case depends upon the meaning of "a dispute under this Act." It is explained in the 3rd section, where such matters as this are expressly provided to be determined in a County Court. The words are: "In any proceeding before a County Court in relation to any dispute between an employer and a workman arising out of or incidental to their relation as such (which dispute is hereinafter referred to as a dispute under this Act), the court may, in addition to any jurisdiction it might have exercised if this Act had not passed, exercise all or any of the following powers; that is to say—(1) It may adjust and set-off the one against the other all such claims on the part either of the employer or of the workman, arising out of or incidental to the relation between them, as the court may find to be subsisting, whether such claims are liquidated or unliquidated, and are for wages, damages, or otherwise; and (2) if, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, it thinks it just to do so, it may rescind any contract between the employer and the workman upon such terms as to the apportionment of wages or other sums due thereunder, and as to the payment of wages or damages, or other sums due, as it thinks just; and (3) where the court might otherwise award damages for any breach of contract it may, if the defendant be willing to give security to the satisfaction of the court for the performance by him of so much of his contract as remains unperformed, with the consent of the plaintiff, accept such security, and other performance of the contract accordingly, in place either of the whole of the damages which would otherwise have been awarded, or some part of such damages." A further explanation of a dispute under this Act may be obtained by considering the words used in previous statutes upon this subject; by 20 Geo. 2, c. 19, s. 1, "all complaints, differences, and disputes" between employers and workmen were to be heard and determined by justices; 31 Geo. 2, c. 11, s. 3, uses the same words. By 4 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 3, a further power is given to justices to hear and determine upon complaint of employers certain breaches of contract, besides their previous jurisdiction. And the last Act before this of 1875 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 141), gives by sect. 4, jurisdiction on breach of contract, "or wherever any question, difference, or dispute shall arise as to the rights or liabilities of either of the parties, or touching any misusage, misdemeanor, misconduct, ill treatment, or injury to the person or property of either of the parties under any contract of service." It is clear that the Legislature intended to materially limit the justices' jurisdiction by the Act of 1875; and as "a dispute" alone can now be heard and determined by them, and then they are to be deemed a court of civil jurisdiction, it must follow that sect. 4 relates to arbitration by a justice upon a submission made by both parties, not to such matters as a breach of contract, which can be settled under the ordinary jurisdiction of a County Court. Sect. 9 introduces the 5th section of the Debtors' Act 1869, therefore a court of summary jurisdiction can enforce its orders by imprisonment. This was never intended except with the consent of the parties. If such a claim as this can be so determined, the workmen will be worse off than they were before.

CLEASBY, B.—I do not think we need hear Mr. Lawrance in reply. The question is, whether this claim for damage, caused by a workman's absence from his employment without notice can be recovered by the employer from the workman under the summary jurisdiction granted by sect. 4 of the Employers and Workmen Act 1875? It turns upon the meaning of "a dispute between an employer and a workman arising out of or incidental to their relation as such." The argument for the respondent is, that as two minds must consent to a contract, so there must be two consenting minds to constitute a dispute. I think it a monstrous interpretation to put upon this legislation that the summary remedy provided for an aggrieved person should be available only if both parties consent. Such a construction of the word "dispute" would nullify many of the provisions of the Act; it is sufficient to refer to the 1st sub-section of sect. 3: The additional or equitable powers given to a County Court Judge by sect. 3 can be exercised only in a proceeding in relation to the same disputes under this Act which can be heard and determined by a court of summary jurisdiction under sect. 4; one of these powers is by the 1st sub-section, to "adjust and set-off the one against the other all such claims on the part either of the employer or the workman arising out of or incidental to the relation between them as the court may find to be subsisting, whether such claims are liquidated or unliquidated, and are for wages, damages, or otherwise." There is nothing there about agreeing to dispute such claims, and it would be impossible to apply that clause with any effect if it were necessary to obtain such agreement. We can see what was the summary jurisdiction of justices in these matters before the Act of last year, by referring to sect. 4 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 141. It seems to me that the extent of the jurisdiction has not been altered at all, and that it would be unreasonable to hold that the word dispute has the limited sense suggested. Although the justices here have acted with prudence and propriety in doubting their jurisdiction under this new legislation, yet this case must be remitted to them to try it on its merits.

GROVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. It would be very peculiar if a dispute which justices have power to decide were to arise upon a notice of leaving, and not upon an absence without leave. The summary jurisdiction is not merely by consent; a dispute would come within it if caused by words between the parties or by the acts of either of them, or if it arose from a breach of contract. The statutes authorise imprisonment only when a person, upon whom a penalty is imposed, has means and refuses to pay. Both employers and workmen are liable for damages for breach of contract, and such damages are recoverable by summary jurisdiction. The case must go back.

FIELD, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and clearly so, for the reasons given. I merely add, that it would be a bad day for workmen if for all small claims by or against them they were compelled to go to the County Courts.

Refreshment house—Entertainment—23 Vict. c. 27, s. 6.

The appellant's shop, which he kept open until two or three o'clock in the morning, consisted of one room only, open in front, without seats of any kind; and the persons who frequented the shop simply drank ginger beer or lemonade at the counter and went away.

Held, by Grove and Field, JJ. (Cleasby, B., dissenting), affirming the conviction of a magistrate, that this was a shop kept open for public refreshment, resort, and entertainment, within 23 Vict. c. 27, s. 6, and required a licence as a refreshment house.

This court will hear only one counsel on each side upon appeals from inferior courts.

This was a case stated under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 48, by Ralph Benson, Esq., one of the magistrates of the police courts of the Metropolis, sitting at the Southwark Police Court.

The appellant, upon the 30th March 1875, and by various adjournments to the 12th May 1875, appeared before the said magistrate on a summons taken out against him by the respondents, and framed on the 6th section of the Act 23 Vict. 2. 27, which summons was as follows:

excise, in and by which information it is alleged that, after the passing of a certain Act of Parliament, made and passed in the year 1880, and intituled "An Act for granting to her Majesty certain duties on wine licences and refreshment houses, and for regulating the licensing of refreshment houses and the granting of wine licences," and within six calendar months before the day of exhibiting the said information, to wit, on the 21st Feb. now last past, and within the limits of Chief Office of Inland Revenue in London, to wit, at the parish of St. George the Martyr, Southwark, in the county of Surrey, you kept a refreshment house, for which a licence was and is required by the said Act, without taking out or having taken out or having in force, a proper licence in that behalf, granted to you under the authority of the said Act, whereby and by force of the said Act you have forfeited a sum not exceeding 20l. And you will further take notice, that the said information is appointed to be heard, adjudged, and determined, on Tuesday, the 30th March now instant, at two of the clock in the afternoon of the same day, at the Metropolitan Police Court at Southwark, in the said county and district, before such Metropolitan Police magistrate as shall be then and there present and have jurisdiction to hear and determine the same; at which time and place you are to appear, and plead to and attend the hearing of the said information, to make your defence, or otherwise the said magistrate will proceed to the hearing and determination thereof as if you were present.

Dated at the Metropolitan Police Court aforesaid, in the said county and district, this 17th March 1885.

RALPH A. BENSON.

To Mr. James Howes.

If you have any witness who can disprove or extenuate the offence imputed to you, you must bring them with you at the time appointed for the trial.

If you bring counsel or attorney, you are requested to give four days' notice to the Solicitor of Inland Revenue at Somerset-House.

The said magistrate convicted the appellant of the said offence, and adjudged him to pay a penalty of 5l.

The following facts were either proved or admitted before him by both parties on the hearing of the complaint:

That the appellant was not licensed for the sale of beer, cider, wine, or spirits respectively, and had not taken out any licence to keep a refreshment house.

It was not contended by the respondents that the appellant sold articles which required any excise licence beyond the refreshment house licence.

That the appellant's shop consisted of one room only, open in front, without seats of any kind, and that the persons who frequented the shop simply drank their ginger beer or lemonade at the counter and went away.

That the appellant kept his shop open until two or three o'clock in the morning.

On the part of the appellant it was contended that he did not keep a refreshment house requiring him to take out a licence, within the meaning of the statute; that the words "refreshment, resort, and entertainment," in the said 6th section of the Act, must be read together, and could not be separated; that ginger beer and lemonade were not "refreshments" within the statute; that there were no means of resting or sitting down upon the appellant's premises, and, therefore, there was no "entertainment" within the statute.

The said magistrate was of opinion that the contention on the part of the appellant was wrong, and therefore convicted him.

McIntyre, Q.C. (with him John Thompson) argued for appellant, the defendant.—By sect. 6 of 23 & 24 Vict. c. 27, "All houses, rooms, shops, or buildings, kept open for public refreshment, resort, and entertainment, at any time between the hours of nine of the clock at night" (altered to ten o'clock by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 91, s. 8) "and five of the clock of the following morning, not being licensed for the sale of beer, cider, wine, or spirits respectively, shall be deemed refreshment houses within this Act, and the resident owner, tenant, or occupier thereof shall be required to take out a licence under this Act to keep a refreshment house; and every person who shall keep any house, room, shop, or building for the purpose of selling therein any victual or refreshment to be consumed on the premises where the same shall be sold (except beer, cider, wine, and spirits, sold respectively under a proper licence in that behalf), and every person who shall keep any house, room, shop, or building for the consumption therein by the public of any refreshment (except as aforesaid), although the same shall not be sold therein, may, if he shall think fit, take out a licence under this Act to keep a refreshment house; and in all proceedings, and upon all occasions whatever, it shall be sufficient to describe by the term refreshment house, any house, room, shop, or building in which any such article as aforesaid (except as aforesaid) is sold to be consumed, or is consumed as aforesaid, without further or otherwise designating or describing the same." Ginger beer and lemonade can scarcely be called refreshment of the kind intended to be referred to in this statute; but even if included in that description, it cannot be said that the appellant's open stall is a place of resort or of entertainment. It has been judicially held that a licence of this kind is necessary only when the place combines each of the three qualifications, "refreshment, resort, and entertainment." The first case is Taylor v. Oram (1 H. & C. 370), where the evidence was that the defendants kept a dancing saloon. The entrance from the street led to a room fitted with chairs, looking glasses, and a number of shelves holding glasses, measures, and pots. This room opened into the dancing room. When the house was visited by the police, one of the defendants was behind a counter at the entrance of the dancing room pouring beer from one jug into another. A number of persons were in the room, some dancing, some drinking beer; men were sitting at a table drinking and singing, and there were a number of quarts of beer in persons' hands, from which glasses were filled and handed to others. No sale of anything was seen. Threepence was charged for admission, and if a pot of beer was wanted, the persons paid sixpence first, and one of the defendants went for it. The magistrate before whom the information was laid, was of opinion that there was no sufficient evidence that it was a house kept open for public refreshment and entertainment, conceiving that the word entertainment meant not diversion or amusement, but the provision of food, drink, and whatever might be reasonably required for the personal comfort of guests. It was held, per totam curiam, that the finding of the magistrate was conclusive; per Pollock, C.B., that the magistrate's construction of the word entertainment was correct; per Martin, B., that the evidence was sufficient to support a conviction; and per Bramwell, B., that the decision of the magistrate was correct in law and fact. If the circumstances of that case did not constitute the premises a refreshment house within that section, it is difficult to understand how the magistrate could be right in this case. The other authority is Muir v. Keay (L. Rep. 10 Q.B. 594), where the magistrate held

HOWES (app.) v. PEAKE (resp.).

the premises to be a refreshment house, and the court affirmed his decision; but the facts justified that conclusion far more than the facts of this case can do so. The defendant's house was there called 'The Café'; it was found open during the night, and seventeen females and twenty gentlemen were there, and were supplied with cigars, coffee, and ginger beer, which they consumed. Lush, J., said in his judgment, "But the main objection is, that there was no public entertainment, for that means a musical or other public performance. I think that is wrong. I think entertainment is something connected with the enjoyment of refreshment rooms, tables, and the like. It is something beyond refreshment; it is the accommodation provided, whether that includes a musical or other amusement or not." 'This is a penal statute, and the constituents of the offence created ought to be strictly construed. If the appellant must have a licence for his counter, every chemist who allows a customer to drink a bottle of Apollinaris water after ten o'clock would be liable to a conviction for keeping a refreshment house. [GROVE, J.—If the public resorted to his shop for that purpose, and his chemicals were merely a pretence, it would be the same case as this.]

Thompson rose to follow on the same side, but was stopped.

CLEASBY, B., after consultation with the rest of the court.—We see no reason for altering in this division the old rule concerning appeals from inferior courts, that one counsel only is to be heard on each side.

BOWEN, CONTRA.—I may rely upon Muir v. Keay as established law, and if that case be not followed here, the courts will have decided that lemonade, if consumed by persons sitting down, constitutes an entertainment; but if the consumers are obliged to stand up, it is refreshment only. The case finds that this place is a shop, one of the words used in the statute; and both the authorities on the subject affirm the prima facie conclusion that the nature of the place is far more a matter of fact than of law. It cannot be maintained, as a point of law, that the magistrate was wrong on this question of fact.

McINTYRE, Q.C., in reply.—The bare facts are here stated in order that the court may determine whether they are within the purview of the section. The point was not so raised in either of the previous cases.

FIELD, J.—In this case, there being a difference of opinion, as junior judge I give my judgment first. I think the conviction was right. Let us consider the object and scope of the statute; it is an Act for granting to her Majesty certain duties on wine licences and refreshment houses, and for regulating the licensing of refreshment houses and the granting of wine licences. There is a twofold object with respect to refreshment houses, being partly to raise taxes and partly to regulate the houses. The latter is carried out chiefly by the form of licence contained in the first schedule, which shows to some extent the purposes for which the licence is required. The keeper of the refreshment house is thereby authorised and empowered to keep open the said house as a refreshment house, and to sell any victual or refreshment to be consumed therein and in the premises thereunto belonging (provided that for the sale of any exciseable liquor he shall have in force a proper licence granted to him in that behalf). Now a refreshment house is defined by the 6th section to include a shop; this is clearly a shop, for although only a room, it is so found to be in the special case; it must be a shop kept open for public refreshment, resort, and entertainment, between certain hours. I think this place was a shop kept open for these purposes. People could go there at will, and drink ginger beer or lemonade which was there for sale. That is sufficient to constitute a place of public resort and refreshment. It must be a question of degree under all the circumstances, and a chemist's shop might even be found as a fact to be within the definition. The words are, no doubt, cumulative, and I must in maintaining this conviction, hold this shop to have been open for public entertainment as well as for refreshment and resort. I see nothing in the case inconsistent with its being so, I think there is no authority against it, and I cannot say the magistrate is wrong in finding as a fact that it is so. Taylor v. Oram was a decision that the magistrate's finding was not necessarily wrong, but some doubt was expressed by the judges as to its being right, and that same doubt seems to have been entertained by the Court of Queen's Bench when the subsequent case was decided. Muir v. Keay seems to me to be in no way against the magistrate's conviction in the present case. Lush, J., certainly says that entertainment is something beyond refreshment; and that it there was the accommodation provided, apparently referring to the seats in the café; but I cannot think the opportunity of sitting down can distinguish the premises in the two cases. If a refreshment house in one case, it may well be so in the other. I think the conviction by the magistrate was right, and should be affirmed.

GROVE, J.—I have come to the same conclusion as my brother Field, and I think the conviction should be affirmed. This is what may be called a marginal case, and it must be a question of degree. "The question," Blackburn, J., says, in Muir v. Keay, "must always be one of more or less, and the facts of each particular case must be looked at as they arise." It is difficult to lay down any hard and fast line, but at all events I cannot say this shop is not a refreshment house. Entertainment is the word of difficulty in the interpretation of the section, and we cannot possibly decide the question before us merely upon its etymology. Various definitions are given to it, but they none of them help us. We must take the three words together—refreshment, resort, and entertainment—and the two first must together limit and define the third. No doubt this was a place of refreshment and resort, and the question for us is whether the magistrate was wrong in holding it to be within the section. I think not; indeed I think he was right.

CLEASBY, B.—I cannot agree with the conclusion of the rest of the court, because I am not satisfied that the appellant here kept open a place of public entertainment. In most cases I admit it must be a question of fact, but here, upon the facts found, it must turn upon the construction of the section. The question for us is, whether these facts, about which there is no dispute, amount to a breach of the statute. How can it be said that this counter was resorted to as a place of public entertainment? It may be that it was kept open for public refreshment and resort. The words of the section and the authorities require something more to make it necessary that the appellant should take out a licence. I can see nothing more upon the facts found. I have a difficulty in believing that the Legislature intended that a place of refreshment and resort merely, with nothing else, could be the same as a place of refreshment, resort, and entertainment. Muir v. Keay shows conclusively that there must be something else besides the first two to make a place require a licence, and it points to what is necessary. Blackburn, J., did not think that entertainment need be something in the nature of refreshment: "It is rather the correlative of resort—the reception and accommodation of the public who resort to the place in question. It is not a useless word. It does not apply to the mere giving of refreshment, nor to the mere fact of persons coming in; it means public reception." In my opinion there is nothing of that kind here, and upon these facts the complaint ought to have been dismissed. The majority of the court, however, thinking otherwise, the conviction will be affirmed.

Occasional licence—Consent of justice usually acting for place of sale—Justice of another division—25 & 26 Vict. c. 22, s. 13.

By 25 & 26 Vict. c. 22, s. 13, and 26 & 27 Vict. c. 33, s. 20, an excise officer may, with the consent in writing of a justice of the peace usually acting at the petty sessions for the petty sessional division within which the place of sale is situate, grant to a licensed person an occasional licence for certain purposes; and any person who shall have taken out such occasional licences shall not be liable to any penalty or forfeiture for selling the articles mentioned in it at the time and place specified, if at the time of such sale he shall produce such licence when requested to do so by an officer or constable.

The appellant, a licensed victualler, obtained from a justice of the peace a written consent for an occasional licence to sell at a place out of the petty sessional division where the justice usually acted, and the excise officer granted an occasional licence in pursuance thereof.

Held, quashing a conviction for selling liquors at this place, without a licence, that the occasional licence was not invalidated by the consent of a wrong justice.

THIS was a case stated by two justices of the peace in and for the county of Somerset, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

At a petty sessions holden at Temple Cloud, in the petty sessional division of Temple Cloud, in the county of Somerset, on the 17th Aug. last, an information preferred by James Emson, superintendent of police (hereinafter called the respondent), against William Stevens (hereinafter called the appellant), under the several licensing Acts now in force, charging for that he the said appellant, on the 21st July last, at the parish of Chew Magna, in the said county of Somerset, did sell intoxicating liquors by retail, not having a licence duly authorising him so to do, was heard and determined by the said justices respectively, he being then present, and upon such hearing the appellant was duly convicted before them of the said offence, and they adjudged him to forfeit and pay for his said offence the sum of 2l. 10s., to be paid and applied according to law, and also to pay to the said respondent the sum of 11s. 1d. for his costs in that behalf.

Upon the hearing of the information it was proved on the part of the respondent, and found as a fact, that the appellant, who is a licensed victualler, carrying on business at 51, Broad-street, in the city of Bristol, by his agent one George Huntley, on the said 21st July 1875, on the occasion of an Odd Fellows Fête, sold certain intoxicating liquors in a tent erected in a field, situate at Chew Magna aforesaid, and within the petty sessional division of Temple Cloud aforesaid.

The respondent, on the day in question, requested the said George Huntley to produce his licence authorising such sale, whereupon he, the said George Huntley, produced and handed to the respondent an occasional licence, duly drawn in the ordinary form; the respondent then inquired of the said George Huntley the name of the magistrate who gave the written consent to such occasional licence being granted, who told him that it was signed by Mr. Miles. The respondent replied that Mr. Miles was not a magistrate of this district, but the said George Huntley notwithstanding continued to sell intoxicating liquors for the rest of the day.

The respondent, at the hearing of the information, tendered evidence to show the circumstances under which this occasional licence was obtained by the appellant; this evidence was objected to by the appellant's attorney, but the justices overruled the objection, and the facts proved before them in relation thereto were as follows:

On the 6th July last, the said George Huntley, on behalf of the appellant, applied to the justices of the peace then sitting in petty sessions at Temple Cloud aforesaid, for a justice's consent to an occasional licence to be granted to the appellant to sell beer, spirits, wines, and tobacco on the then ensuing 21st July, at the place and on the occasion mentioned, and set forth in the occasional licence before referred to. The justices, on such application being made, inquired of the said George Huntley who Mr. Stevens (the appellant) was, who told them that he was an innkeeper residing in Bristol, when the justices told George Huntley that Mr. Stevens (the appellant) should apply himself, and that there would be another petty sessions on the 20th July, when he could make his application.

The appellant did not apply at such sitting of the justices, as directed, nor to any justice usually acting in the petty sessional division within which the place of sale was situated, but he applied to Mr. Miles, a justice of the county of Somerset, not actually acting in that division, but from whom the appellant had obtained the like consent on like occasions, though not for any place in the petty sessional division aforesaid, and the said Mr. Miles, gave the appellant the consent hereinafter mentioned.

The statement in the annexed consent paper, that the said W. H. Miles usually acts at the petty sessional division within which the place of sale therein mentioned is situated is incorrect, the fact being that the said W. H. Miles does not act in

BARNES (app.) v. EDLESTON (resp.).

that division; and it is known to the justices that there are two magistrates residing in the parish and usually acting in the division in which the place of sale is situated.

Upon obtaining the consent signed by the said W. A. Miles, the appellant applied to Mr. Drinkwater, the officer of excise duly authorised by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue in that behalf, and upon such consent being handed to him and the sum duly paid by the appellant, the said Mr. Drinkwater granted the occasional licence before referred to.

Upon the foregoing facts, and on our referring to sect. 13 of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 22, and sub-sect. 1 of sect. 20 of 26 & 27 Vict. c. 33, which require that a consent in writing should have been given by some justice of the peace usually acting at the petty sessions of the petty sessional division within which the place of sale was situate, before the officers of excise could legally grant an occasional licence, and as no such consent had been given in this case, the justices considered that the so called occasional licence, obtained by the appellant in the way before mentioned, was not a licence within the meaning of the Act, and did not justify him in selling intoxicating liquors thereunder; and the justices therefore convicted the appellant and fined him the penalty and costs before mentioned. And the question of law arising from the above statement is, whether or not they were right in holding sales under the so called occasional licence obtained in the way aforesaid to be illegal.

The consent alluded to was in the form furnished by the Inland Revenue officers to any licensed person requiring an occasional licence:

I, the undersigned, being a justice of the peace usually acting at the petty sessions for the petty sessional division in which the place of sale hereinafter mentioned is situated, do consent to an occasional licence for the sale of beer [or spirits, or wine, or refreshments] on the day of _____, at _____ on the occasion of _____ being granted to _____, he being duly licensed to sell the above-named articles.

Charles argued for the appellant.—By 25 & 26 Vict. c. 22, s. 13, "It shall be lawful for the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, whenever they shall consider it conducive to public convenience, comfort, and order, and with the consents in writing of two justices of the peace usually acting at the petty sessions for the petty sessional division within which the place of sale is situate, to authorise any officer of excise to grant to any person who shall be duly authorised to keep a common inn, alehouse, or victualling-house, and who shall have taken out the proper excise licences to sell therein beer, spirits, wine, or tobacco, an occasional licence under this Act empowering him to sell the like articles, for which he shall have taken out such licences as aforesaid, at any such other place, and for and during such space or period of time, not exceeding three consecutive days at any one time, as the said Commissioners shall approve, and as shall be specified in such occasional licence; and any person who shall have taken out such occasional licence shall not be liable to any penalty or forfeiture whatever by reason or on account of his selling the articles mentioned in the said licence during the time and at the place specified therein; provided that," amongst other things, "the said licence shall not protect any such person in the sale of any of the articles hereinafter mentioned, unless he shall at the time of such sale produce such licence when requested to do so by any officer of excise, or by any constable or police officer." 26 & 27 Vict. c. 33, s. 20, after reciting the said 13th section of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 22, makes some alterations and amendments therein; the only thing material is sub-sect. 1, "That the consent of one justice of the peace, as in the said section mentioned, only, shall be necessary." It is not suggested but that everything was done bonâ fide, the only mistake being that of the magistrate who signed the consent. The conviction, therefore, was wrong. [FIELD, J.—The argument of the other side might be that "such occasional licence" in the Act refers only to a licence procured as there directed.] There is no authority to an excise officer or constable to inquire concerning anything but the licence, which is here good on the face of it.

No one appeared for the respondent.

CLEASBY, B.—I think "such occasional licence" must mean the licence de facto obtained; and although it may have been improperly granted, if good on the face of it, the licensed person can not be liable to penalty or forfeiture for acting in pursuance of it.

GROVE, J.—It seems to me very clear that this conviction was wrong. I have only hesitated because no one has appeared to support it.

FIELD, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Smoke nuisance—Prohibition—Liability incurred under a repealed enactment—18 & 19 Vict. c. 121, s. 13; 38 & 39 Vict. c. 55, s. 343.

On the 24th May 1875 the respondent was ordered by justices, under 18 & 19 Vict. c. 121, s. 13, to abate a smoke nuisance, and by the same order the justices prohibited a recurrence thereof.

The Public Health Act 1875, which passed on the 11th Aug., repealed the said Act, amongst others, and re-enacted similar provisions as to nuisances. By sect. 343 the repeal was not to affect any liability acquired, accrued, or incurred under a repealed statute.

On the 24th Aug. the respondent was charged upon information, with disobedience on the 12th of that month to the justices' prohibition of the 24th May. The justices found he had disobeyed the order, but dismissed the charge on the ground that the repeal put an end to the order.

Held, that the respondent was under a liability incurred under the previous statute; that he was within the saving clause of the repeal section; and that the justices ought to have convicted him.

The following case was stated for the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division, under the provisions of the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

On the 24th Aug. 1875 an information was laid by the appellant John Barnes, against the respondent Robert Edleston, charging that the said R. Edleston, of Sowerby Bridge, in the West Riding of the county of York, dyer, on the 12th Aug. 1875, at Sowerby Bridge, in the Riding aforesaid, then being the occupier or owner of certain premises there situate, called Asquith Bottom Dye-works, unlawfully, knowingly, and wilfully had not obeyed a certain order in writing under the hands and seals of W. H. Rawson and Samuel Shaw, esquires, two of her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said Riding, bearing date the 15th May 1875, whereby the said justices, in pursuance of the statute in such case made and provided, ordered the said occupier or owner of the said premises, on the service of the said order to discontinue the nuisance therein complained of (viz., the sending forth of black smoke in such a quantity as to be a nuisance), and did prohibit a recurrence thereof; and he had unlawfully infringed the said order by continuing to send forth black smoke, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

That a summons was issued upon the said information which was duly served on the said respondent, and was returnable on the 28th Aug. 1875, but the hearing of the same was adjourned until the 2nd Oct. 1875.

That on the hearing of the said summons it was proved and admitted that an order was duly served on the respondent on the 24th May 1875, by leaving the same on the premises where the chimney complained of stood, with one John Wilson, a clerk of the respondent's, and the said order was in the following words and figures, that is to say:

Smoke nuisance. Prohibition of recurrence.

To Robert Edleston, of Sowerby Bridge, in the parish of Halifax, in the West Riding of the county of York, dyer, and to his servants or agents, and to all whom it may concern.

West Riding of the county of York.—Whereas, on the 28th April 1875, complaint was made before Henry Akroyd Ridgway, esquire, one of her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said West Riding of the county of York, and acting in and for the same, by John Barnes, then being an inhabitant of the parish of Halifax, in the said West Riding, and within which parish the district of Sowerby Bridge in the said Riding is situate, that in or upon certain private premises in the district of Sowerby Bridge aforesaid, the said R. Edleston unlawfully did send forth black smoke from a certain chimney belonging to certain premises there occupied by him (not being the chimney of a private dwelling-house), in such quantity as to be a nuisance, and that the said nuisance was caused by the act or default of the said R. Edleston, and was likely to recur.

And whereas the said R. Edleston has been duly summoned to appear before us, W. H. Rawson and Samuel Shaw, esquires, being two of her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said West Riding of Yorkshire, sitting in petty sessions, holden on the 15th May 1875, at our usual place of meeting, to answer to the matter of the said complaint of the said John Barnes. Now, upon proof here had before us that the said summons was duly served on the said R. Edleston, and that the said John Barnes was and is an inhabitant of the said parish, and that the nuisance so complained of doth exist on the said premises and is likely to recur, and that the same was caused by the act or default of the said Robert Edleston; and being of opinion that the same or a like nuisance is likely to recur, we, in pursuance of the statutes in such case made and provided, do order and direct the said R. Edleston shall and do, on the service of this order or a true copy thereof, according to the said statutes, discontinue the said nuisance. And we further, in pursuance of the said statutes, do prohibit the recurrence of the said nuisance.

And we also adjudge the said R. Edleston to pay to the said John Barnes, the sum of 16s. 6d. for his costs in this behalf, and if the said sum be not paid forthwith, we order that the same be levied by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of the said R. Edleston; and in default of sufficient distress we adjudge the said R. Edleston to be imprisoned in the House of Correction at Wakefield, in the said West Riding, for the space of fourteen days, unless the said sum, and all costs and charges of the said distress shall be sooner paid.

Given under the hands and seals of two of her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said West Riding of Yorkshire, this 15th day of May 1875.

SAMUEL SHAW, (L. S.)

That on the hearing of the said information it was also duly proved and admitted that on the day mentioned in the information, viz., on the 12th Aug. 1875, dense black smoke was emitted from the said chimney mentioned in the said order in such a quantity as to be a nuisance.

That the respondent contended before the justices that, inasmuch as on the 11th Aug. 1875 the Public Health Act (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55) had come into operation, and had repealed 18 & 19 Vict. c. 90, by virtue of which the said order of the 15th May 1875 was made, and the offence alleged having been committed on the 12th Aug., and after the repeal of the last-named statutes, this information was not a legal proceeding in respect of a penalty incurred before the repeal of the said enactments.

The appellant contended that, inasmuch as the order of the 15th May 1875 was something "duly done" under one of the repealed enactments, and as the hearing of the summons then before the justices was "a legal proceeding in respect of a penalty incurred" against one of the repealed enactments, such investigation and legal proceeding might be carried on as though the Act of 38 & 39 Vict. c. 55, had not been passed, and that the respondent ought to be convicted.

The justices decided in favour of the respondent's view of the law, but granted this case for the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division thereon.

Anstie argued for the appellant.—The order of the 24th May 1875 was duly made and delivered to the respondent under 18 & 19 Vict. c. 121, s. 13. The following section provides a penalty not exceeding 10s. per day during default of obedience to this order. By sect. 343, and the schedule to the Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), this Act is entirely repealed, except so far as it relates to the Metropolis; but by sects. 91 and 98 almost exactly similar provisions are re-enacted. Therefore, although the new Act came into operation and the old one was repealed on the 11th Aug. 1875, the day before the alleged offence was committed, yet there is nothing to invalidate the old order of abatement, nor to prevent a conviction under the new Act. Moreover, with a view to this very objection, sect. 343 of the Act of 1875, which repeals the statutes named in the schedule, expressly provides "that this repeal shall not affect: (a) Anything duly done or suffered under any enactment hereby repealed; or (b) any right or liability acquired, accrued, or incurred under any enactment hereby repealed; or (c) any security given under any enactment hereby repealed; or (d) any investigation, legal proceeding or remedy in respect of any such right, liability, security, penalty, forfeiture, or punishment as aforesaid; and any such investigation, legal proceeding and remedy, may be carried on as if this Act had not been passed." This order, made previously to the passing of the Act, clearly comes within both the exceptions (a) and (b) to the repeal.

Maule, Q.C. for the respondent.—It must be taken that the only exceptions to the repeal by the new Act are those mentioned in the saving clauses to sect. 343. Now by sect. 105 power is given to an individual to make complaint of a nuisance; but before, such power belonged only to a local authority; and the provisions in sects. 91, 96, and 98, are by no means identical with those of the previous Act. It cannot, therefore, be said that this smoke on the 12th August was either anything duly done or suffered under a repealed enactment, nor was it any right or liability acquired, accrued, or incurred under such enactment.

WILKINSON (app.) v. GOFFIN (resp.).

[Div. App.]

Anstie in reply.

CLEASBY, B.—This appeal must be allowed. I think the magistrates were acting in error in dismissing the complaint. The effect of the enactment in sect. 343 of the new Act, and of the saving clauses, is to repeal the statutes mentioned in the schedules—not absolutely, but sub modo; it does not alter the force of any proceeding pending, or any liability already incurred. It is not necessary to allude to the sub-section (a), but when we come to sub-section (b) it seems to me that the respondent is exactly under the liability there described, a liability acquired, accrued, or incurred under an enactment repealed. Under sect. 13 of the repealed Act of 1855, the justices ordered the abatement of this nuisance on the 24th May 1875, and they added to that order a prohibition under the latter part of the section: “and if the justices are of opinion that such or the like nuisance is likely to recur, the justices may further prohibit the recurrence of it, and direct the works necessary to prevent such recurrence, as the case may in the judgment of such justices require.” Without saying anything about whether the abatement order is or is not within the saving clause, surely the respondent's is a plain case of liability incurred under the order of prohibition. This was a special liability created by the respondent's previous breach of the law, and clearly comes within the saving clause (b) of the repeal section. The case must go back to the justices.

GROVE, J.—I have had some doubt about this point, and I do not say it is entirely removed. It is not, however, sufficient to induce me to differ from the rest of the court.

FIELD, J.—I am very clear that the justices ought to have convicted the respondent.

Case to be remitted, with costs against the respondent.

WILKINSON (app.) v. GOFFIN (resp.).

Trespassing on railway premises—Claim of right
—3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, s. 16.

The respondent kept his van standing for twenty minutes outside a public-house, during part of which time he was refreshing himself within. The ground upon which the van stood was part of the premises of a railway company, whose station was close by, but the only access to the public-house was across this ground, and the customers frequently went there with vehicles. The respondent was charged, under 3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, s. 16, with wilfully trespassing on railway premises, but the justices considered the respondent's claim of right to use the ground as a customer of the public-house to be bonâ fide, and their jurisdiction to be ousted thereby:

Held, upon a case stated, that as there might be a legal foundation for this claim of right, the justices came to a proper conclusion.

THIS was a case stated by two justices in and for the county of Suffolk, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, on the application of the appellant, who was dissatisfied with their determination upon the question of law which arose before them as hereinafter stated, on the 16th July 1875, at the petty Sessions at Beccles, in the said county of Suffolk, the appellant having duly entered into a recognizance to prosecute the appeal.

Upon the hearing of the information preferred by the said James Ling Wilkinson, the appellant (the Station Master of the Great Eastern Railway Company's Station at Beccles), against the respondent John Goffin, under the Act for Regulating Railways (3 & 4 Vict. c. 97), s. 16, for that the said respondent, on the 4th June 1875, at Beccles, in the said county of Suffolk, did unlawfully and wilfully trespass upon certain premises connected with a certain railway there situate, the property of the Great Eastern Railway Company, and did refuse to quit the same upon request to him the said respondent for that purpose made by the said appellant, an officer of the said railway company, the said justices dismissed the same.

And be it enacted, that if any person shall wilfully obstruct or impede any officer or agent of any railway company in the execution of his duty upon any railway, or upon or in any of the stations or other works or premises connected therewith, or if any person shall wilfully trespass upon any railway, or any of the stations or other works or premises connected therewith, and shall refuse to quit the same upon request to him made by any officer or agent of the said company, every such person so offending, and all others aiding or assisting therein, shall and may be seized and detained by any such officer or agent, or any person whom he may call to his assistance, until such offender or offenders can be conveniently taken before some justice of the peace for the county or place wherein such offence shall be committed, and when committed before such justice as aforesaid (who is hereby authorised and required, upon complaint to him upon oath, to take cognizance thereof, and to act summarily in the premises) shall, in the discretion of such justice, forfeit to her Majesty any sum not exceeding 5*l.*, and in default of payment thereof shall or may be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two calendar months, such imprisonment to be determined on payment of the amount of the penalty.

It was proved that the respondent, on the 4th June last, drove a horse and van into an open space adjoining the railway station at Beccles aforesaid, and placed the same opposite to the door of the public-house there, the property of Messrs. Cobbold, of Ipswich, brewers, the site of which public-house formerly belonged to the railway company, and was sold by them to Messrs. Cobbold for the purpose of erecting a public-house, and which public-house adjoins the said open space. That the van remained there from fifteen minutes past two o'clock till thirty-five minutes past two o'clock, and there was evidence to show that in the meantime the respondent had entered the public-house for the purpose of refreshment. Outside of the van was a placard, stating that a badger was to be seen inside. It was proved that while the van remained as above stated, two persons entered the van, and that they gave money to the respondent; but it was not proved that the respondent made

RUTHER (app.) v. HARRIS (resp.).

[Div. App.]

any specific charge or solicited money for admission to the van.

The open space where the respondent's van stood is thirty or forty yards wide, and there was in fact no obstruction of the free passage of the public across it.

A plan was put in evidence, and it was proved that the roadway which constitutes the open space above mentioned is repaired and lighted by the railway company, and the justices found as facts that the place whereon the respondent's van stood is part of the premises connected with the station of the Great Eastern Railway Company, notwithstanding that there is nothing in the appearance of the said open space, nor any gate, fence, or other enclosure, to distinguish it from the open street adjoining thereto. But the justices also found as a fact, that the only means of access to the front door of the public-house opposite to which the respondent's van stood, was over such open space, part of the premises of the railway company.

It was proved that a great number of customers had at different times gone to the public-house in question with vehicles.

The appellant, the officer of the railway company (after the respondent's van had been standing on the spot above described for the period above mentioned, and while it still remained there), requested the respondent to remove the same, and at the respondent's request pointed out to him the extent of the company's premises, but the respondent refused to move. A scuffle ensued, and ultimately the van was removed.

On the part of the respondent it was contended that he and his van were on the place above described in exercise of the respondent's right as one of the customers of the public-house belonging to Messrs. Cobbold and Co.

The justices were of opinion that the claim of the respondent was made bonâ fide, and that the case could not properly be adjudicated upon without a previous determination of the limits and nature of the rights of access attached to the public-house, the property of Messrs. Cobbold, and that such determination was not within their jurisdiction.

The question of law arising hereupon is set out in the preceding paragraph, and the opinion of the court is requested on such question, and whether the said justices ought to have convicted the respondent on the facts before them.

Marriott, for appellant.—In Foulger v. Steadman (L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 65), a cabman was convicted under this section for standing his cab on some ground belonging to a railway company. Blackburn, J., said, "Here the defence only amounted to this, that the respondent believed he had a right to stand his cab upon ground which was the premises of the company without their leave. This belief does not prevent the respondent from being a wilful trespasser." The respondent's defence in this case was exactly the same, and he ought to have been convicted. No doubt a substantial bonâ fide claim of right ousts the justices' jurisdiction, but there was no evidence here, nor any pretence for saying that this was a bonâ fide claim on the part of the respondent.

No counsel appeared for respondent.

CLEARBY, B.—We are all of opinion, and for myself I may say I feel very clearly, that we cannot interfere with the decision of the justices. The respondent kept his van standing for twenty minutes outside a public-house, on ground which forms part of the railway company's premises. If he alleged no reasonable excuse for so doing, the circumstances would have been exactly those of the case cited. But the justices find as a fact that the only means of access to the front door of this public-house was over this ground, and that the customers of the house went there frequently with vehicles. Whilst his van was standing there the respondent was himself taking refreshments inside the public-house, and he claimed to occupy this ground as a customer of the house. The justices have satisfied themselves that he thought he had this right; I myself think he had—at all events, it is not unreasonable that he should have it—and in consequence of this bonâ fide claim of right the justices' jurisdiction was ousted. If the respondent's van was in the wrong place, or if on any ground, the appellant had a right to send it away, the matter can be tried in an action for trespass. The justices' judgment will be affirmed.

GROVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question for us is, whether this claim of right by the respondent, which was made bonâ fide, could be legally supported. It appears that there was a right of way for customers of the public-house over this ground, and the extent of right could not be a matter for the justices to decide. It does not appear that the respondent's object in keeping his van on this spot was the exhibition of his badger; he was a customer of the public-house, and there was nothing illegal in the claim he set up. Whether he had a good foundation for the claim was a question which the justices were right in refusing to decide.

FIELD, J.—I am of the same opinion.

RUTHER (app.) v. HARRIS (resp.)

Salmon fishery—Forfeiture of net—Fish not caught
—24 & 25 Vict. c. 109, s. 21.

By the Salmon Fishery Act 1861, s. 21, no person shall fish for, catch, or kill, except by rod and line, any salmon during the weekly close time; and any person acting in contravention of this section shall forfeit all fish taken by him, and any net or movable instrument used by him in taking the same, and in addition thereto shall incur a penalty, and a further penalty in respect of each fish so taken.

Held, that catching a fish was not a condition precedent to the forfeiture of a net used by persons contravening this section.

THIS was an information and complaint preferred by Joseph Ruther, of Berkeley, in the county of Gloucester, water bailiff, for and on behalf of the Board of Conservators of the Severn Fishery District, who prosecuted in that behalf, taken and made the 19th May 1875, before one of her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said county, who said that William Harris, of Woolaston, in the county of Gloucester, fisherman, and John Cook, of the same place, fisherman, on the 10th May 1875, at the parish of Lydney, in the said county, did resist and obstruct one Joseph Ruther, a water bailiff appointed under the provisions of the Salmon

[DIV. APP.]

Fishery Acts 1861 to 1873, in the execution of his duty as such water bailiff, contrary to the statutes in such case made, whereby they each incurred a penalty of 5*l.* for the said offence, and after hearing the parties and the evidence adduced by them, the said justices thereupon dismissed the said information and complaint with costs. And the said board of conservators, alleging that they were dissatisfied with the said determination, as being erroneous in point of law, did within three days thereafter apply to the said justices to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and the grounds of such determination for the opinion thereon of the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice, and in pursuance of the said statute in such case made and provided, they stated and signed the following case:

The defendants having appeared upon summons in answer to the above information and complaint before the said justices, it was thereupon proved on the part of the said board of conservators—

That the said Joseph Ruther was duly appointed in writing under the hand of the acting chairman of the said board of conservators as a water bailiff, and, therefore, by virtue of the Salmon Fishery Act 1873, s. 36, empowered to seize all fish and other articles forfeited in pursuance of the Salmon Fishery Acts 1861 to 1873, within the Severn Fishery District.

That before six a.m. on the morning of Monday, the 10th May 1875, at the parish of Lydney, in the county of Gloucester, a place within the said Severn Fishery District, the said Joseph Ruther, with another water bailiff of the said board, and one of the officers of the Gloucestershire police force, being then on duty, found the defendants and a number of other men fishing for salmon in the river Severn, with nets used for the catching of salmon.

That the said Joseph Ruther, as such water bailiff, thereupon demanded the net from the said defendant William Harris, but the said William Harris refused to give up the same. Both the defendants at the time knew that the said Joseph Ruther was a duly appointed water bailiff of the said board.

That the said Joseph Ruther, in the supposed execution of his duty as such water bailiff, thereupon attempted to seize such net, but the defendants resisted and obstructed him and prevented his seizing the said net.

It was not proved on behalf of the said board of conservators that the said defendant William Harris had actually caught any salmon.

It was proved that the defendants were, during the weekly close time, contrary to the 21st section of the Salmon Fishery Act 1861, on the river Severn fishing for salmon by other means than with a rod and line, and had with them nets for the catching of salmon; and for this offence they were convicted before the said justices and fined 5*l.* each and costs.

It was urged before the said justices on behalf of the said defendants, that a water bailiff has no authority, under the Salmon Fishery Acts 1861 to 1873, to seize any net or movable instrument used in fishing for salmon during the weekly close time, unless salmon have been actually caught therein. That the 36th section of the Salmon Fishery Act 1873, sub-sect. 3, only authorises the water bailiff to seize all fish and other articles forfeited in pursuance of the Salmon Fishery Acts 1861 to 1873, and that the 21st section of the Salmon Fishery Act 1861 only provides that a person acting in contravention thereof shall forfeit all fish taken by him and any net or movable instrument used by him in taking the same, and that as it was not proved that any salmon were actually taken, no forfeiture arose.

On the part of the conservators it was urged that the instruments were forfeited by any one acting in contravention of the 21st section of the Salmon Fishery Act 1861, and that section forbade not only the catching and killing, but also the "fishing for" salmon, and that it having been proved that the defendants were acting in contravention of this section, the net was thereupon forfeited and liable to seizure.

Whereupon the said justices adjudged and determined that though the said defendants were convicted and fined for fishing for salmon between the hour of twelve of the clock at noon on Saturday, and the hour of six of the clock on Monday morning on the day in question, and that they did resist and obstruct the said water bailiff Joseph Ruther in seizing the said net so used by the said defendant William Harris in fishing for salmon, yet as it was not proved to the said justices that the said William Harris had actually taken any salmon on the said occasion, such net was not forfeited under the Salmon Fishery Acts 1861 to 1873; and that the said Joseph Ruther, as such water bailiff, was not therefore empowered under the said Salmon Fishery Acts 1861 to 1873, to seize the said net, although the said William Harris was fishing for salmon, contrary to the 21st section of the Salmon Fishery Act 1861, for which he was convicted and fined as aforesaid; and, therefore, the said William Harris and John Cook were not guilty of resisting and obstructing the said Joseph Ruther in the execution of his duty as such water bailiff.

If the court shall be of opinion that the said net was an instrument forfeited under the Salmon Fishery Acts 1861 to 1873, then the court shall remit the said information and complaint for rehearing; but if the court shall be of a contrary opinion, then the said dismissal shall be confirmed.

Willis-Bund argued for the appellant, the officer of the Severn Fishery Conservators.—By the Salmon Fishery Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 109), s. 21: "No person shall fish for, catch, or kill by any means other than a rod and line, any salmon between the hour of twelve of the clock at noon on Saturday and the hour of six o'clock on Monday morning; and any person acting in contravention of this section shall forfeit all fish taken by him, and any net or movable instrument used by him in taking the same, and in addition thereto shall incur a penalty not exceeding 5*l.* and a further penalty not exceeding 1*l.* in respect of each fish so taken between twelve of the clock at noon on Saturday and six of the clock on Monday morning." The justices have held that the actual catching of fish is a condition precedent to the forfeiture of the net. If this were correct, the penalty also could only be imposed upon the same condition; but the justices have imposed the penalty, although they have inconsistently refused to convict on the charge of resistance. That this section was intended to authorise the forfeiture of nets, without proof of fish being caught, appears not only from the words themselves—"any net or movable instrument used by him in taking" (not catching) "the same"—but also by analogy with the provisions for penalties incurred during the annual close time. By sect. 17 of the Act of 1861, there was no provision for such forfeiture, but this omission was amended by 28 & 29 Vict. c. 121, s. 58: "Where any person has been convicted of an offence under sect. 17 of the Salmon Fishery Act 1861, he shall, in addition to the penalties thereby incurred, forfeit any net or movable instrument used in committing such offence, and the convicting justices shall direct the same to be sold or destroyed, and the proceeds of such sale shall be paid to the conservators of the district." The information which the justices dismissed was laid under 36 & 37 Vict. c. 71, s. 36, sub-s. 3: "Any water bailiffs appointed under the Salmon Fishery Acts 1861 to 1873, acting within the limits of his district, may do all or any of the following things; (that is to say)" . . . "3. Search and examine all nets, baskets, bags, or other instruments used in fishing or in carrying fish by persons whom there is reasonable cause to suspect of having possession of fish illegally caught; seize all fish and other articles forfeited in pursuance of the Salmon Fishery Acts 1861 to 1873; and any person refusing to allow any nets, baskets, bags, or other instruments used in fishing or in carrying fish, to be searched or examined, or resisting or obstructing any water bailiff in any such search or examination, shall for every such offence be liable to a penalty not exceeding five pounds."

DRYDEN (app.) v. CHURCHWARDENS AND OVERSEERS OF PUTNEY (resp.).

No counsel represented the respondents.

CLEASBY, B.—The question in this case is, whether the respondent's net was forfeited under the 21st section of the Act of 1861. The magistrates thought not; it depends upon words of the section which are open to either construction, but I think they have not adopted the better one. The respondents were admittedly acting in contravention of this section, and they thereby forfeited all fish taken by them, and any net or movable instrument used by them in taking the same, and in addition thereto a penalty. There was here no proof that any fish was caught, and the question arose whether the net the respondents were using was forfeited. The most rational construction is, not to limit the forfeiture to cases where the offenders have succeeded in catching fish, but to extend it to any instrument used for the purpose of contravening the section, whether any fish was caught or not. The magistrates were no doubt bound to see their way to this construction before they convicted the respondents upon this charge; but I think they took an erroneous view, and upon the facts stated they should have held the net forfeited and the charge proved.

GROVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that this matter cannot be open to doubt. By the construction put upon the section by the justices, the whole provision would be a mere nullity unless the offender were seen to catch a fish. The condition, if it applies at all, applies equally to the penalty imposed. I admit the words are not used as accurately as they ought to be, but I have no doubt about the proper interpretation.

FIELD, J.—I am of the same opinion, and on the same grounds.

CLEASBY, B.—The case will be sent back to be reheard, but without costs.

DRYDEN (app.) v. CHURCHWARDENS AND OVERSEERS OF PUTNEY (resp.).

Metropolis Local Management Acts—Paving a new street—Discretion of Vestry as to Acts—Statutes 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, ss. 98 & 105, and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, ss. 77 & 112.

By 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, s. 98, a vestry have power to pave or repair all streets within a parish. By sect. 105 of the same Act, and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, s. 77, in the case of "new streets" which are paved by a vestry, the expenses are to be borne by the owners of houses and land adjoining such "new street." An old highway in the parish of P. had been kept in repair for forty years by rates raised from the ratepayers at large. At the time of the passing of the Metropolis Local Management Act 1855, on a portion of the south side of the highway there was an irregular row of houses and a good footpath, while on the other side there was no regular footpath and but two cottages. Since 1855 these two cottages were pulled down and new houses were gradually built along the north side. In 1874, when the line of new houses were approaching completion, the vestry, in pursuance of their powers, paved the footpath on that side, and charged the expenses to the general distinct rates.

Held, that they had no power to do so, inasmuch as the street in question was a "new street" within 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, s. 105, and consequently the owners of property adjoining the street were bound to pay the expenses incurred in paving.

APPEAL under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 11, against an order of John Bridge, Esquire, one of the police magistrates for the Metropolitan District, made on the 10th day of April, 1875, directing a levy to be made on the goods of the appellant for the sum of 1s. 6d. and costs, such sum of 1s. 6d. being part of a sum of 1l. 11s. 6d. for which the appellant was assessed in respect of a general rate made by the respondents on the 5th day of October, 1874, in pursuance of the Metropolis Local Management Act 1855.

Notice of appeal against the said order to the Court of General Quarter Sessions of the Peace for the County of Surrey was duly given by the appellant to the respondents on the 15th day of April, 1875, and the parties hereto, by consent and by order of Mr. Manley Smith, agreed to state the facts relating to such distress in the form of a special case for the opinion of this court, and that each party should bear its own costs of this appeal and case.

CASE.

1. The appellant has for some years past been, and still is, the occupier of a house situated in the High-street, Putney, in the county of Surrey, at some distance from, and quite separate from, the Upper Richmond-road hereinafter referred to, and the distress hereinafter referred to was made in respect of part of a rate to which the appellant was assessed in respect of his said house in High-street aforesaid. The appellant has never been the owner or occupier of any house or land adjoining the Upper Richmond-road aforesaid.

2. The said Upper Richmond-road is an old highway in the parish of Putney, and now forms the main carriage and footway from Wandsworth and Putney to Richmond, and it has been kept in repair for the last forty years or more by rates raised from the ratepayers of Putney at large. Prior to the establishment of railways this road was comparatively unimportant, the main traffic from Wandsworth and Putney to Richmond then passing by another road through Barnes.

3. Before and at the time of the passing of The Metropolis Local Management Act 1855, which embraced the parish of Putney, in the district of the metropolis called the Wandsworth district, the condition of that portion of this road which is in question in this case, and which extends for about 734 yards in length, namely from point "A" to point "B" on accompanying plan, and is herein-after referred to as "the road," was as follows: On the south side, running westward for about 300 yards, there was an irregular line of houses, some of them detached, some of them contiguous, and there were two small, isolated houses along the remaining 434 yards, the rest of the road along this 434 yards being bounded by market gardens. On the north side the road for the whole 734 yards was bounded by market gardens, except at two places marked "C" and "D" on the said plan, where there were two small houses or cottages. The plan accompanying this case shows the road and points in question, the sites of the houses existing in 1855 being coloured red on the plan, and those built since 1855 being coloured blue.

4. Along the south side of the road there was, in 1855, a good raised gravel footpath of several feet in width, and almost all the foot traffic along the road passed along this south side. Along the north side there was, in 1855, a narrow and ill-defined foot track between the hard carriage way of the road and the boundary hedge, very little foot traffic passing along that side of the road, and no regularly formed footpath then existing along that side of the road.

5. Since the year 1855 the two cottages marked "C" and "D," on the north side of the road, have been pulled down, and the whole of the frontage land adjoining the north side of the road has been covered with a continuous line of detached and semi-detached houses, space being left at one spot for a new road running out of the old highway at right angles, and on the south side portions of the frontage along the 434 yards have also been covered with detached villas, and the rest of the frontage is now on offer as building land.

6. In the course of building the houses on the north side the old boundary hedge, which was somewhat crooked, has been removed, and a new and straight line of fence formed by the entrance gates, and railings or palisades to the new houses, strips of land being here and there thrown into the highway, so as to straighten the fence and afford room for a spacious footpath on that side of the road, the width of the carriage-way, being at some places slightly decreased and at others slightly increased.

7. At intervals from 1864 to 1870 the Wandsworth District Board of Works fixed a granite kerb along the footpath on the north side of the road and made up the path with gravel over the whole width of the path from this kerb to the line of fence of the new houses.

8. This kerb and the making up of the path were paid for by the said district board out of the "general rates" of the parish. Since then this footpath has been from time to time repaired by the district board and used as part of the highway of the Upper Richmond-road.

9. The ordinary repairs of all the highways in the parish have since 1855 been paid for by the district board out of the "general rates," these general rates being usually made half yearly and assessed upon all the ratepayers of the parish at large.

10. In the year 1874 the line of new houses on the north side of the road was approaching completion, and the district board thereupon took into consideration the propriety of paving the footpath on that side of the road, and in accordance with a resolution of the district board the footway from A to B on the north side of the road was paved by the district board with Val de Travers asphalt laid on a bed of Portland cement concrete, and the cost of this paving was included in the general rate.

11. Prior to the execution of the said paving the appellant having in the month of June 1874 heard that the district board contemplated paving the footway in question and paying for it out of the general rate for Putney urged upon the district board that under the circumstances the road had become a new street within the meaning of the Metropolis Local Management Act 1855 and the Metropolis Local Management Amendment Act 1862, and that under those Acts the cost of paving the footpath of the road ought to be borne not by the ratepayers of Putney at large out of the general rate but by the owners of the houses and land abutting on the footpath in question.

12. The district board, however, refused to accede to the appellant's suggestion, contending that the road was not a new street within the meaning of those Acts.

13. The appellant refused to pay the sum of 1s. 6d., being part of the amount at which he was assessed to the general rate, on the ground that the said sum represented the proportion charged for the paving of the said footway, an expense improperly included in the general rate, and in consequence of such refusal the sum of 10s. 4d. was levied on the goods of the appellant by virtue of the said order.

14. It is admitted that the said sum of 1s. 6d. is the proper proportion of the said rate of 1l. 11s. 6d., which is attributable to the cost of the paving in question, and that if the appellant was not liable as the occupier of his said house in the High-street aforesaid to contribute to the cost of such paving the said rate of 1l. 11s. 6d. ought to be reduced by the said sum of 1s. 6d.

The questions for the opinion of this honourable court are whether under the circumstances above set forth, and having regard to the provisions of the Metropolis Local Management Act 1855 and the Metropolis Local Management Amendment Act, the appellant as occupying the said premises in the High-street, Putney, aforesaid was liable to contribute to the expense of the above-mentioned paving of the said footpath on the north side of the said Upper Richmond-road.

If this court shall be of opinion that the appellant was not liable to contribute to such expense or that such expense was not properly payable out of the said general rate for the parish of Putney the decision of this court is to be in favour of the appellant and judgment of the allowance of the said appeal on the ground aforesaid and for repayment to the appellant of the sum of 10s. 4d. distrained for shall be entered at the sessions accordingly, but if this court shall be of

DRYDEN (app.) v. CHURCHWARDENS AND OVERSEERS OF PUTNEY (resps.).

[Div. App.]

the contrary opinion its decision is to be in favour of the respondents and judgment for dismissing the appeal is to be entered at the sessions accordingly.

The appellant in person.—This street is a "new street" within the meaning of the Metropolis Management Acts, and the vestry had no power to levy a general district rate for the expenses incurred in paving it. By 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, s. 98, "it shall be lawful for every vestry and district board from time to time to cause all or any of the streets within their parish or district, or any part thereof respectively, to be paved or repaired when and as often, and in such form and manner and with such materials as such vestry or board think fit." That is a general clause not applicable to the paving of "new streets," which is provided for by the 105th section, which enacts that "if a vestry or board deem it expedient or necessary that a new street shall be paved, then and in either of such cases the vestry or board shall well and sufficiently pave the same street, and keep such pavement in good and sufficient repair; and the owners of the houses forming such street shall on demand pay to such vestry or board the amount of the estimated expenses of providing and laying such pavement." By 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, s. 77, the owners of land "bounding or abutting such street" are likewise liable to contribute to the expenses of paving. See also sect. 112 as to definition of a "new street." From the statements in the case it is clear that this is a "new street." (See Pound v. Plumstead Board of Works, 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 461; L. Rep. 7 Q. B.; 41 L. J., 51 M. C.; and R. v. Fulford, 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 346; 33 L. J., 122 M. C.). Secondly, assuming this to be a "new street," the vestry have no discretion as to the mode of procedure for recovering the expenses incurred. The words of sect. 77 are, the owners, &c., "shall pay." Moreover, it has been held that the provisions of sect. 159, which enacts that when any expenditure has been incurred for the special benefit of a particular part of a parish, a vestry "may by any order direct the sum necessary for defraying such expenses to be levied on such part" are important: (Howell v. London Dock Company, 27 L. J. 177, M. C.; 3 Ell. & B. 212). He also cited:

Churchill v. Crease, 5 Bing. 177.

Edward Clarke for the respondents.—This is not a new street within the meaning of the statutes in question. It is not denied that this may be a street, but the question is whether such a change has taken place in the thoroughfare as to make it a new street. It is submitted not; at all events, the vestry have a discretion given them by the terms of the 159th section, and were not bound to exempt the defendant from all payment. Howell v. London Dock Company (ubi sup.) is a different case, for there no benefit was derived, but it cannot be said that the appellant, who was in the neighbourhood, is not to some extent benefited by the paving of a street such as this is.

GROVE, J.—Though a good deal of ground has been gone over, I think the question before us is confined to a narrow issue. The appellant is the occupier of a house in High-street, Putney, at some distance from the Upper Richmond-road, and has never owned or occupied any house or land adjoining the Upper Richmond-road. The case gives a history of the Old Richmond-road. [His Lordship went into the facts as found in the case.] It is important to observe the progress of the road in consequence of the question which arises whether since 1855 the old road became a "new street." In 1874, as the line of new houses on the north side of the road were approaching completion, the district board duly resolved to pave a portion of the footway on that side of the street; and the appellant then pointed out to them that, inasmuch as the road (which formerly had been kept in repair by the county rates) had become a "new street" within the Metropolis Local Management Acts, the costs of the paving should be borne by the owners of the adjoining houses and land, and not by the ratepayers of Putney at large out of the general rates. The district board, however, would not entertain the appellant's suggestion, and hence the present issue, which is simply whether this road has become a "new street," and on the answer to be given to this question depends the liability of the appellant. I am of opinion that this is a "new street, and that the case is governed by Pound v. The Plumstead Board of Works (ubi sup.) which was not so strong a case as the present. Then, assuming it to be a "new street," another question arises whether the vestry has any option as to the persons from whom a rate is to be levied for the expense incurred in paving. I am of opinion that the terms of the 105th section of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, leave the vestry no discretion. The section may leave it as a matter within the discretion of the vestry whether a street shall be paved at all, but when once they have deemed it expedient that a street shall be paved the subsequent words of the section are imperative. The section says that in case the vestry shall deem it necessary or expedient to pave the street, "the owners of the houses forming such street shall, on demand, pay to such vestry the amount of the estimated expenses" of such paving. The words are as strong as legislative words can be; taken by themselves I think they are clearly imperative; and is there anything to show that they were not intended to be so? It is said that such a view would conflict with sect. 98 of the same Act. That section no doubt imposes on the vestry the duty of not neglecting the wants of a parish, and they are bound to see that the streets within their district are properly paved, &c. Nothing is said in that section about expenses, and therefore I think these expenses might have fallen on the general rate had it not been for the 105th section. But I fail to see any conflict between the two sections; the former section only imposes a general duty, the latter is directed, specially to "new streets." I think, therefore, there is no necessary inconsistency between them. It seems to me, as appellant has alleged, that it is not unfair that those who get the benefit from the paving should pay for it. I forbear going into other sections of the Act which may throw light on the construction of the two sections to which I have alluded, because they could not alter the sections themselves, which, in my opinion, are capable of a reasonable construction. The one applies generally to the paving of streets in a district, the other directs how the expenses are to be provided in certain cases. That being so, it becomes unnecessary to consider whether the 159th section, which gives power to vestry to exempt from payment parts of a parish if not benefited by expenditure, is discretionary or not: but

WRIGHT v. DAVIES.

[C.P. Div.]

I will only remark that if the discretion was held not to exist in Howell v. London Dock Company (ubi sup.), a fortiori, it does not exist here. In my opinion the judgment should be for the appellant and the rate reduced.

QUAIN, J.—I am of the same opinion. Though there has been a long discussion, I think the case is a straightforward one enough, and dependent on the construction to be given to one or two sections. Now, first of all, is this a "new street"; and, secondly, if it be a "new street," have the vestry a right to levy a general rate, or are they bound to levy the expenses of paving, &c., upon the adjoining owners of houses and land? The cases of Pound v. Plumstead Board of Works (ubi sup.), and Reg. v. Fulford (ubi sup.), show that this has become a "new street" since 1855. That being so, the 105th section of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 20 says that when the vestry deems it expedient to pave such a street, or any part of it, the owners of the houses (and by a later Act, of land also) adjoining such street, must pay the expenses of the paving. Now, here the vestry did deem it expedient to pave the street, and the question arises whether, when the work is done, they should proceed under sect. 105 or under sect. 98. I am clearly of opinion that they are bound to proceed under the 105th section of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 20, the provisions of which are extended by 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, s. 77. Where an Act of Parliament contains general words such as are to be found here, and also a special clause applicable to particular cases, when once a case is brought within the special clause it is taken out of the operation of the general words, otherwise the special clause would be useless. Therefore when once you have established this street to be a "new street" you must proceed under the 105th section. We are familiar with this class of legislation since the 67th section of the Public Health Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63) came into operation. This section distinguishes between paving and keeping in repair by providing that in case streets are not paved, &c., to the satisfaction of the local board, the board may by notice to the "respective owners or occupiers of the premises, fronting, &c., require them to pave, &c." and in case of default execute the works, and the section goes on, "the expenses incurred by them in so doing shall be paid by the owners in default, according to the frontage of their respective premises, and in such proportion as shall be settled by the surveyor." Under the Public Health Act expenses were regulated by the amount of frontage; that is not necessarily so here, but this being a "new street" the vestry must proceed under the 105th section, which is applicable to it. For these reasons I think the rate is wrong and should be reduced.

WRIGHT v. DAVIES.

Ecclesiastical dilapidations—Exchange of benefices—Simoniacal contract—Statute 34 & 35 Vict. c. 43.

The plaintiff and defendant, being incumbents of two benefices, agreed, after the passing of the Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Act 1871, to effect an exchange of their benefices with each other, upon the terms that no payment should be made by either to the other of them for dilapidations.

At the time this agreement was made the defendant stated to the plaintiff that the repairs of the buildings of the benefice which he was thus giving in exchange to the plaintiff would be merely nominal, or equal in amount to those of the benefice which he was receiving from the plaintiff. This, though stated by him without any fraud on his part, was untrue, the amount of the repairs of the benefice he was giving in exchange being greatly in excess of those of the benefice he was receiving.

Held by the court (Lord Coleridge, O.J., Brett and Denman, JJ.), that the Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Act 1871 did not make such an agreement invalid.

Held also by the court (following Goldham v. Edwards, 25 L. T. Rep. O. S. 198; 16 O. B. 437; 24 L. J. 189 C. P.; 17 O. B. 141, Ex. Ch.), that such an agreement was not necessarily simoniacal.

This case came before the court upon demurrer to a plea and to a replication.

The pleadings were as follows:

R. Wright sues, &c., for that the defendant before the making of the order hereinafter mentioned was the incumbent of the benefice of Gisburn, in the county of York, in the diocese of Ripon, and being such incumbent vacated such benefice, and the same then and thereby became void, and the plaintiff then became and was and is his successor and new incumbent of such benefice, and still is the new or present incumbent of such benefice, upon and after the avoidance thereof by the defendant, and the defendant as such late incumbent became and was and is indebted to the plaintiff, as such new incumbent, in the sum of 247l. 19s. 6d., under and by virtue of an order of the Bishop of the said diocese of Ripon, bearing date the 28th Feb. 1874, duly made and signed by the said bishop in triplicate, in pursuance of the Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Act 1871, in and by which order the said bishop stated that the repairs of the buildings of the said benefice, for which the defendant the said late incumbent was and is liable, were those stated in the schedule to that order, and that the cost of such repairs for which the defendant as the said late incumbent was and is liable amounted to the said sum of 247l. 19s. 6d., and the plaintiff avers performance of all conditions precedent to constitute the said sum stated in the said order as the cost of the said repairs, a debt due from the defendant as the said late incumbent to the plaintiff as the said new incumbent, and to entitle the plaintiff to recover from the defendant the said sum stated in the said order, pursuant to the 36th section of the said Act, yet the defendant has not paid the same or any part thereof.

To this declaration the plea, to which the demurrer was, was as follows:

For a second plea the defendant says that whilst he was incumbent of the said benefice of Gisburn the plaintiff was vicar of the benefice of St. Mary's, in the county of Huntingdon, in the diocese of Ely, and the plaintiff and the defendant thereupon, with the consent of their respective patrons and diocesans, agreed to exchange their said respective livings in their then state and condition, and that no payment of any kind on either side should be made for dilapidations, and that the defendant should not be liable to pay the plaintiff for the repairs in the declaration mentioned, and the defendant says that the said exchange was made accordingly, and the defendant on his part has always been willing to carry out and has carried out the said agreement, and the plaintiff became the successor to the defendant as in the declaration mentioned, upon the terms that he the plaintiff should bear the costs of the repairs for which the said order was made, and that the defendant should not be liable to pay the plaintiff therefor, and after the making of the said agreement and after the said exchange, the said order was made, and the repairs mentioned in the said order were and are dilapidations within the meaning of the said agreement.

To this plea the replication demurred to was as follows:

On equitable grounds to the second plea the plaintiff says that upon and after the said avoidance and vacating by the plaintiff of the said benefice or living of St. Mary's, in the said diocese of Ely, the defendant thereupon became and was and is the successor and new incumbent of the said benefice of St. Mary's, and the plaintiff further says that the said Bishop of the said diocese of Ely duly made an order similar to that in the first count mentioned, in pursuance of the said Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Act 1871, in and by which said order the said bishop stated that the repairs of the buildings of the said benefice of St. Mary's, for which the plaintiff the said late incumbent of St. Mary's was and is liable were those stated in the schedule to that order, and that the cost of such repairs, for which the plaintiff as the said late incumbent of St. Mary's was and is liable, amounted to the sum of 32l. 10s., and the plaintiff further says, that at the time of the making of the said alleged agreement and exchange in the second plea mentioned, the defendant represented and stated to the plaintiff that the repairs of the buildings of his the defendant's said benefice of Gisburn were merely nominal or equal in amount to the repairs of the plaintiff's said benefice of St. Mary's, and the plaintiff further says that the said agreement in the said second plea mentioned was made by the plaintiff on the faith and belief that such representation of the defendant was true and correct and not otherwise; whereas in fact and in truth the said repairs of the buildings of the defendant's said benefice of Gisburn were not nor are nominal, and were far more than equal in amount to and greatly exceeded in amount the said repairs of the plaintiff's benefice of St. Mary's, and amounted to the said sum of 247l. 19s. 6d., as the defendant knew or ought to have known, and such statement and misrepresentation and such alleged agreement was and is an evasion of and in contravention of the said Act. And the plaintiff further says that he, on the faith of such statement and representation, and believing the same to be true, and not having any reason to believe otherwise, entered into the alleged agreement in the said second plea mentioned. And the plaintiff further says that the said respective patrons and diocesans had not nor had any of them any notice or knowledge of the said alleged agreement until long after the making of the said several orders, and that they in no way ratified, approved of, or confirmed the said alleged agreement. And the plaintiff further says, that by reason of the premises and of the non-payment of the said sum or any part thereof, he has been wholly unable to pay, and has not paid, the said sum of 247l. 19s. 6d., or any part thereof, to the said governors in the said Act mentioned, as in and by the said Act required.

Baylis, Q.C. (C. Crompton with him) for the plaintiff.—The law as to the effect of an exchange of livings between two incumbents, under an agreement that neither of them shall be liable to the other for dilapidations, as it stood before the passing of the Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Act 1871, is discussed and explained in the case of Goldham v. Edwards (25 L. T. Rep. O. S. 198; 16 C. B. 437; 24 L. J. 189, C. P.; 17 C. B. 141, Ex. Ch.) The plea in that case was almost, if not quite, identical with the plea here demurred to, and the court decided that the agreement in the plea was not necessarily a simoniacal agreement, and that the plea was good. There, however, there was not, as in the present case, a replication. It cannot since that case be contended in this court that the present plea is bad, unless there is some distinction between the law upon such agreements before the passing of the Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Act 1871 and the present law, and it is submitted that that statute does effect an important change in the law. The whole of that Act is framed with a view to protect the benefice, and to afford ample security for the keeping in repair of the buildings. Before the statute an incumbent, on an exchange of livings, could expend the money he received from the outgoing incumbent upon the buildings when and how he pleased, or he could appropriate the money, if he were so minded. Of course if he did appropriate the money, instead of executing the repairs required, he still remained theoretically liable during his incumbency to make good the repairs, and practically liable upon the termination of his incumbency to do so. He was not, in any sense, trustee of the money he might receive from the old incumbent for the benefit of the living. The statute changes this; the incumbent is now no longer acting on his own behalf—he is now the mere trustee for the living. He cannot do what he likes with what money he may get; he has to pay it over within a given time to the Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty, to a particular account. He cannot contract himself out of the Act. He may not, by any agreement of his with the old incumbent, lessen or destroy the chance of the money being raised to make good the dilapidations. The governors, as representing the living, have a right to have the personal security of the old incumbent. A contract may be illegal, if opposed to the plain policy of a statute, although the statute does not by express words forbid the contract: (Steaines v. Wainwright, 8 Scott, 280.) The replication shows that the agreement was the result of a misstatement, and that the exchange was an unfair and unreasonable one, the amounts of the two sets of dilapidations being widely different. This, taken with the plea, shows that the agreement was not merely such that it might possibly be simoniacal, which is all that the plea alone shows, but that it must be simoniacal. [DENMAN, J.—Where is the word "corruption," or anything to show that the bargain was corruptly made? It is not necessary to have the word "corruption," the facts set out show a simoniacal contract.

new incumbent, suing under the statute, does not sue as trustee; whether he is a trustee for the governors or for the living of moneys received from the old incumbent, as soon as he receives them, or not, he is not a trustee until he receives. The statute was not intended to and does not change the general ecclesiastical law as to the exchange of livings, it only provides a convenient method of assessing dilapidations, and a ready process for enforcing existing liabilities. The amount of the dilapidations was formerly, when ascertained, a debt for which the old incumbent, on an exchange, was liable to the new, but it was a debt which the new incumbent need not enforce unless he chose. Neither need a new incumbent now; nothing is changed, except that, instead of the action on the custom of England, an action founded on the bishop's order for an ascertained amount is substituted. The construction of sect. 40 is made plain by the other sections, it is that the new incumbent, whether he gets the money or not, must pay to the governors. The bishop, if the new incumbent does not pay, can sequester the living; therefore there is ample security for the repairs being done, even where such an agreement as the present has been entered into. As to the suggestion of simony, the case quoted of Goldham v. Edwards (sup.), shows that simony is not to be presumed, and the facts set out are perfectly consistent with an honest bargain. The replication charges no fraud, and alleges nothing beyond an honest mistake which would not afford a defence in a case such as the present.

Baylis, Q.C. replied.

LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—This case comes before us upon demurrer. It is an action by the incoming incumbent of a benefice against the outgoing incumbent, the benefice becoming vacant owing to an exchange of benefices having taken place between the two incumbents. On the pleadings it appears that the amount sought to be recovered is the value of certain dilapidations. Under the law as it stood, before the passing of the Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Act 1871, the incoming incumbent would, in the absence of any arrangement between himself and the outgoing incumbent, have been entitled to recover from his predecessor the amount required to make good these dilapidations. The present action is brought since the passing of the Act of 1871, and is to be considered under the law as it now stands under that enactment. For the purpose of assessing dilapidations, under circumstances such as the present, a useful and convenient machinery has, by the Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Act 1871, been provided. The sum now is finally and conclusively ascertained, and all difficulties and delays incident to assessments under the former system have been abolished. The defendant in the present case says that the plaintiff has no right to recover dilapidations, which have been properly ascertained, from him, because an exchange of benefices was agreed to and carried out upon certain terms set out in his plea, part of those terms being that neither should charge the other with dilapidations. The question for our consideration is, whether such an agreement as that set out in the plea is good. Mr. Baylis properly admits that, since the case of Goldham v. Edwards, he cannot contend that, under the old law, a plea such as the present would not be good. In that case it was argued that a plea such as the present showed an agreement that might be simoniacal. It was held that, though it might possibly be simoniacal, yet it was perfectly possible that such an agreement might be in no degree simoniacal, and that there was nothing in the plea to lead to one conclusion rather than the other, and that, consequently, the plea was insufficient. The present plea then, but for the statute, is a good one. Mr. Baylis's contention was, that though that was so, yet the agreement was so contrary to the statute as to be illegal. Now, I agree that there might be an agreement or a contract so entirely contrary to a statute and so contradictory to its provisions as by implication to be prohibited, although not in express words forbidden. I confess for myself that at first I was disposed to think that the object of the statute, or at any rate one of the main objects of it, being the protection of the benefice and the affording of security to the Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty, such an agreement as the present might be impliedly forbidden. On fuller consideration, however, I think that it is not. The objects of the statute may well be effected without our so holding. In substance the act is this: the bishop, through the surveyor, ascertains the amount required to make good the dilapidations, and then states the amount in an order. The statute provides that the sum so stated in the order shall be a debt due from the late incumbent, his executors or administrators, to the new incumbent, and shall be recoverable as such at law or in equity. It has been pointed out by Mr. Gully that an important alteration has been effected in the law by this enactment; first, as regards the remedy for the recovery of dilapidations; and, secondly, as regards the nature of the liability created by force of it. The present remedy is by an action to recover a debt, whereas formerly the remedy was by an action founded upon the custom of England. The statute further enacts by sect. 37 that "the new incumbent shall, as and when he shall recover the said sum or any part thereof, forthwith pay the amount recovered to the Governors" of Queen Anne's Bounty; "and if and whenever he shall recover any further part of the said sum, he shall in like manner forthwith pay to the governors the part so recovered." By sect. 39 it is enacted, that "the amount received by the governors from the new incumbent, together with the sum (if any) lent by them to him as aforesaid, shall be placed in their books to the credit of an account, to be entitled 'The Dilapidation Account of A. B., incumbent of _____,' and from the sum (if any) so lent by them they shall forthwith pay and discharge the costs and expenses of and incidental to the preparation and completion of the security." Sect. 40 enacts that "the new incumbent shall, within six calendar months (or within such extended period as is hereinafter mentioned) pay to the governors" (of the Bounty, that is) "to be carried to the credit of the said account, such sum (if any) as, together with the sums theretofore carried to the credit of the said account, will make up the sum stated in the order as the cost of the repairs." This is then a direct statutory provision, that if the new incumbent does not get the money from the old incumbent, he must himself within six months, or at most within twelve months, pay the sum stated as requisite in the order. Sect. 43 gives a remedy to the governors if the money is not paid to them by the new incumbent in due course. These sections apparently are somewhat harsh, for it may happen that the new incumbent gets nothing whatever from the old incumbent, and has to find a sum greatly in excess of what he originally foresaw when he accepted the benefice; yet it must be recollected that, as the law stood before this Act, an incumbent was liable to repair the buildings of his benefice, whether he found them in repair or not, on entering upon it, and whether he obtained any sum from his predecessor or not. Sect. 40 appears to me to be the section on which the whole matter turns, the other sections do but strengthen the conclusion to be drawn from it. The living is at any rate to be secured from dilapidations; if the old incumbent does not pay, the new must find the money. It seems to me that the two may, as far as this statute is concerned, make as between themselves what bargain they please, because there is nothing expressly forbidding such a bargain, and the provisions of the statute prevent such a bargain from working to the injury of the living. It is not a bargain contrary to the policy of the Act. It has been argued that the plea and replication, taken together, show a simoniacal bargain, that is, that they disclose facts which amount to simony. It is not said that the conduct on either side was corrupt or dishonest, and the facts stated are consistent with honest mistake. No facts are stated to make it inequitable, no fraud is suggested on the pleadings now under consideration; on the contrary, all suggestion of fraud is carefully avoided. All that is said is that the defendant "knew or ought to have known" of the disparity, and that in pleading is equivalent only to "ought to have known."

BRETT, J.—Before the Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Act 1871, it was the duty of an incumbent of a benefice, or his representatives, to leave it, on his ceasing to be incumbent, in a proper state of repair. This duty could be enforced by the new incumbent by an action on the case. According to the case of Goldham v. Edwards (sup.), the two could make a bargain like the present as the law stood before the recent Act. The statute imposes no new duty on the retiring incumbent, no novel liability is created by it. Sect. 29 provides for the inspection of the buildings on a vacancy, and sect. 34 provides that the bishop shall make an order on the old incumbent stating the repairs for which the late incumbent or his representative is or are liable, and the cost of such repairs. This is made on the old incumbent, because his ancient liability remains, though the machinery for enforcing the liability is new. The amount now is an ascertained amount, and sect. 36 gives a new form of action, there being no longer any need of the former action on the case. That is all that is done, except that in favour of the old incumbent it is provided that no action for an unascertained amount shall be brought. The question raised now is, whether the statute has gone further, and prevented that which was before a defence for the old incumbent to an action for dilapidations from being so any longer. It has been argued that it does, and that the plaintiff and defendant cannot contract themselves out of the statute. That is an expression which must mean, if it has any meaning, that such an agreement as the present is either expressly or by implication prohibited and made illegal or unenforceable. Mr. Baylis says that the object of the statute is the protection of the benefice. Now it is evident that the statute in question first provides a method of ascertaining the amount; and, secondly, protects the benefice. If such an agreement is good, the statute by no means leaves the living without protection. It first leaves the old incumbent liable where he was formerly liable; and, secondly, lets the new incumbent sue the old, where he was formerly liable, by an action, no longer on the case but in debt. It lets the new incumbent borrow money, and then provides that he must pay over to the governors what he gets. Sect. 40 protects the living by enacting that he must pay over what he gets, and that he must pay over the amount required even if he cannot recover it from the old incumbent. The bishop too may, if he does not pay over the amount, sequester the living in his hands. Sect. 60 again gives further protection to the living. The living is at all events protected. The agreement is not so far in contravention of the statute as to be illegal. The statute does not assume to interfere in any way with the law as to the exchange of livings. The replication discloses no facts which make out that this agreement is a simoniacal one, it does not show that it was corruptly made.

DENMAN, J.—I agree entirely with the view expressed by the rest of the court. The argument of Mr. Baylis turned mainly upon the point that a new incumbent had a right given to him for the benefit of the living, out of which he could not, by any agreement of his, contract himself. Sect. 36 gives him, as has been said, merely an option to sue. It would be going far to say that the Act means that this shall be a debt as to which he shall make no arrangement, and which he shall not release, and against which he shall allow no set-off, and for which he is absolutely bound to sue. The Act does not, in fact, say anything of the kind, and the scheme of the Act is contrary to such a contention.

BAILEY AND ANOTHER v. JAMIESON AND OTHERS.

Highway—Stoppage of access—Loss of highway. Where a highway is stopped or diverted by order of quarter sessions, a road which branches from and rejoins the highway so stopped or diverted, and to which the public had no other means of access, ceases to be a highway, although not mentioned in the order.

THE second count of the declaration was for trespass to a close of the plaintiffs called Bothal Wood and destroying trees and underwood and breaking down fences.

The defendants pleaded among other pleas a public right of way over the close in question.

The trial took place before Pollock, B. at the Spring Assizes at Newcastle in 1875. The Duke of Portland, who was one of the plaintiffs, was the equitable tenant for life of the land in question, the legal estate in fee being vested in the other plaintiff Bailey as trustee. Before the year 1874 there had been a public footpath from Bothal to Sheepwash, in the county of Northumberland, passing over the Duke of Portland's land, which was coloured red on the plan used at the trial, and was referred to at the trial and on the argument as the Red Road. On 7th Jan. 1874 the Red Road was stopped up and diverted by an order of quarter sessions under the Highway Act of 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50) (a) a new way, which was shorter and more commodious, being substituted for it. The new way lay to the north of the Red Road. At a spot where the Red Road passed through Bothal Wood, near the bank of the River Wansbeck, an old path, referred to as the Green and Yellow Path, turned off to the south of the Red Road, and passed over land of the plaintiffs, and rejoined the Red Road further on. The Green and Yellow Path was not referred to in the order of Quarter Sessions of 7th Jan. 1874, by which the Red Road was stopped up; but the effect of stopping up the Red Road was to isolate the Green and Yellow Path at both ends, so that it no longer joined any way over which the public had a right to pass. The defendants claimed a public right of way over the Green and Yellow Path, and the trespasses complained of in the second count of the declaration, which were admitted at the trial, were committed in assertion of this alleged right. The verdict was for the plaintiffs, damages 40s.

A rule nisi was afterwards obtained pursuant to leave reserved to enter the verdict for the defendants on the second count on the ground that the way in the second count was a public way and had not been lawfully closed.

Herschell, Q.C. (G. Bruce and E. Bidley with him) showed cause.—The question is, what effect the order of quarter sessions stopping up the Red Road had upon the way over which the defendants claim a right of passing. The point is a new one, and no authority directly bearing on it can be found; but on principle, from the very nature of things, a road access to which by the public is closed at each end, cannot possibly be a highway. The effect of the order of quarter sessions therefore was to close by implication the path in question, and the defendants were not justified in passing along it, as it had ceased to be a public highway. [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—In Burn's Justice, vol. 2, p. 975, 3rd edition, a highway is defined as “a right of passage for the public in general without distinction.”]

C. Orompton (Hamilton with him) in support of the rule.—No doubt the question is, what effect is to be given to the order stopping up the Red Road, but that order does not in any way refer to the path which the defendants allege to be a highway. “Once a highway always a highway,” is an undoubted rule of law, and the only exception to it is where the highway is stopped according to statutory powers. A highway cannot cease to be such by means of the indirect effect of an order relating to a different road. It is true that there is no authority to be found as to the effect of stopping up both ends of a highway, but it is clear that stopping up one end so as to make it a cul de sac, does not deprive it of its character of a highway:

Bateman v. Bluck, 18 Q.B. 870; 21 L. J. 406, Q.B.;
Gwyn v. Hardwick, 1 H. & N. 49; 25 L. J. 97, M.C.; Bouch v. The East London Railway Company, L. Rep.
16 Eq. 108; 42 L. J. 477, Ch.;
R. v. Waller, 31 L. T. Rep. N.S. 777;
R. v. Burney, 31 L. T. Rep. N.S. 828.

These cases are in favour of the defendants. If a highway can be stopped indirectly and by implication, it may in many cases cause hardship to individuals and injury to the public. He also referred to

R. v. The Marquis of Downshire, 4 A. & E. 698;
Dawes v. Hawkins, 8 C. B. N. 3. 848; 29 L. J. 343, C.P.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—In this case the effect of an act which was properly done has been to deprive the public of the means of access to that which had previously been a public way. The act I speak of as having been properly done, was the stopping up of the Red Road. The stopping of the Red Road was a legal act after the notices had been given; it was done by the proper authority, and was not appealed against, so we must take it that the stopping up was acquiesced in. It is said that the stopping up of the other road would be an unexpected consequence of the stopping of the Red Road. That may be so, but the question is whether this consequence has or has not followed. It must be taken that the Red Road opened into the other road, which was not in terms stopped, but, as the Green and Yellow Road began and ended in the Red Road, the question arises whether, if a road is in this way rendered impassable, it has lost the character of a highway, which it must be taken to have had. It is admitted that no authority directly in point can be found; there is no case which directly decides the question whether a track retains the character of a public highway when access to it by the public is prevented. We are therefore driven to principle in order to arrive at a decision, and the true principle seems to be this, that a highway is a way from one place to another, not necessarily from town to town, but from one inhabited place to another, along which all subjects of the Queen have a right of passage; this implies that it must lead from one place to another place. The cases to some extent assist us, but do not decide the point. It has been argued that a highway, one end of which has been lawfully obstructed, ceases to be a highway, and that contention was put forward in Wood v. Veal (5 B. & A. 454); and R. v. The Marquis of Downshire (4 A. & E. 698); but it is clear that to stop up one end of a road does not take away its character of a highway. Many roads must end in a cul de sac where they run down to the sea, but they are none the less highways on that account. No doubt a highway includes the idea of “passage,” and it is defined consistently with this view by Blackstone (Commentaries, Book I., cap. 9, p. 358, and Book II. cap. 3, p. 35) and Hawkins (P. C. Book I. cap. 32), but a way up and back is a passage, and there is nothing inconsistent with

(a) By 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, ss. 84, 85, when the inhabitants in vestry assembled deem it expedient that a highway should be stopped up, diverted, or turned, the chairman of the meeting shall, by an order in writing, direct the surveyor to apply to two justices to view it; and if it appear upon the view that the highway may be diverted or turned so as to make the same nearer or more commodious to the public, and if the owner of the land through which the new road is to pass consent in writing, or if it appear that a public highway is unnecessary, certain notices shall be published as by the Act directed, and a plan laid before the justices, who shall then make a certificate, which is to be lodged with the clerk of the peace and read in court at quarter sessions, and afterwards enrolled together with the proof plan and consent among the records of quarter sessions. The Act goes on to provide for an appeal against such order or certificate, and by sect. 91 if no appeal is made or if the appeal is dismissed the justices at quarter sessions shall make an order to divert or stop up the old highway.

the nature of a highway in its not being a thoroughfare, and the end of a cul de sac is as good a terminus as the seashore. This view of the question to some extent assists us, but it does not decide the point; it only goes so far as to show that unless there is some notion of passage, and unless there are some natural termini, there would be no room for argument. There must be ends to the highway, and a right to walk along to the end, which is here entirely absent, for by the act of the proper authority, the public are prevented from getting in, and the path is isolated. It has therefore ceased to be a highway, and any person who attempts to justify his presence there by alleging that it is a highway fails. I agree with the general rule that if he is right you cannot make him a trespasser, because he cannot have got to the place without a trespass, but it is necessary to decide whether the road remains a highway, and for the reasons I have given, I am of opinion that it does not. No doubt other circumstances are conceivable under which it would be very inconvenient that a highway should be stopped up in this way, but the argument ab inconvenienti, is not logical, and although it may sometimes be a reasonable argument to use, I think it is not in this case sufficient to alter the logical conclusion at which I should otherwise arrive. There is no suggestion that by absence of proper notices any rights were take away. It was an old highway, which was probably forgotten, and (by operation of law access to it was stopped. The rule must be discharged.

DENMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The great difficulty arises from the doctrine "once a highway always a highway," and from the necessity of imposing some limitation upon that doctrine apart from statutory powers; but I think we are compelled to hold that this is a case where what was a highway in former times has ceased to be such by operation of law without coming within any statutory power. By means of legal acts which were done at each end of the road it ceases to be a place to which there is legal access, and, as it is left without legal access to it for all the Queen's subjects as such, no public highway remains. The cases which have been cited in support of the other view (Baleman v. Bluck, 18 Q. B. 870; 21 L. J. 406, Q. B., and Souch v. The East-London Railway Company, L. Rep. 16 Eq. 108; 42 L. J. 477, Ch.) show that where one end is stopped up the road may still continue to be a highway, but no case has decided that where there has been a legal stopping up of both ends the highway remains, and principle compels us to hold that it does not. We were pressed with the consideration of the injustice that might arise in certain cases, for instance if a long lane were stopped up in this way, which had furnished a convenient mode of access to a number of dwellings, but I think this ought not to weigh with us; it is unlikely that the question would arise, for persons would be sure to do enough in such a case to prevent the way from being stopped. In the present case there was only a short piece of what seems to have been a forgotten old path, and therefore the argument ab inconvenienti is not so applicable as it might otherwise have been. Now that the road is not passable by the public it is not a public highway.

LINDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion. I understand Mr. Herschell to argue that there can be no public highway without public access, and that seems reasonable, for it is a contradiction in terms to say that there is a public highway and yet that the public have no access to it. The difficulty as to persons having lands abutting on the road is not insuperable, for if there is any right of ownership that right remains, and the mere fact that they had other rights of getting there does not affect the question. I wish to guard against any supposition that a road could be stopped up by stopping up the roads leading to it without sufficient notices. Rule discharged.

Lands Clauses Act, sect. 69—Glebe lands—Permanent Improvements—Farm buildings—Investment of purchase money in defraying cost of—Surveyor's fees.

Where it will be a permanent and beneficial improvement the court will sanction the application of part of the purchase money of glebe lands, taken by a railway company, in defraying part of the cost of erecting farm buildings on the remainder.

PETITION.

In the year 1853 a portion of the glebe lands of Gamston Rectory, in the county of Nottingham, were taken by a railway company, and the purchase money was paid into court and invested in the purchase of 1412l. 5s. 5d. consols.

The glebe lands consisted of 261 acres, nearly the whole of which was arable, and there was no house or any farm buildings of any description on the lands.

In 1874 the rector built a substantial farmhouse with outbuildings on the glebe lands at a cost of about 1000l., whereby the rental of the lands was materially increased. About 880l. of the 1000l. had been advanced to him by the governors of Queen Anne's Bounty, and he now applied that the remaining 120l. might be raised and paid out of 1412l. 5s. 5d. Consols in court. The patron of the living and the bishop of the diocese had given their consent to the application. The 120l. was required for the purpose of paying the surveyor's and architect's fees.

Chapman Barber, in support of the petition, submitted that although in such cases the money was generally expended in the erection or repair of a rectory house, yet the court had sometimes permitted the money to be laid out in other permanent improvements. Here the rental of the farm was increased some 60l. per annum, and in Ex parte the Rector of Shipton-under-Wychwood (19 W. R. 549), Lord Hatherley had sanctioned the outlay of part of the purchase money in the erection of farm buildings.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR made the order.

TARRY v. ASHTON.

Duty of occupier of house abutting on highway—Fall of part of lamp—Prior employment of negligent contractor to repair—Whether occupier excused by employment of contractor.

The duty of him who occupies a house abutting on the highway is to repair all known defects of the house and its appurtenances the non-repair of which may result in danger to the passers by; and that duty is not discharged by the employment of a contractor to repair such defects. If damage results from the negligence of a contractor so employed the householder is liable.

A. occupied a house abutting on a street. Projecting from the front wall, about 15 ft. over the pavement, was a lamp, which A. had employed a contractor to repair, along with his other lamps. The contractor did his work badly. Another contractor, being afterwards employed by the defendant to examine the lamp, placed a ladder against the bracket which joined it to the wall. The weight of the ladder and the rotten state of the bracket caused the lamp to fall and injure T., a passer by in the street.

Held, that A. was responsible to T. for the injury so caused, and a rule to set aside a verdict entered for T. at the trial discharged.

Whether A. would have been liable if he had never known the decayed condition of the lamp, quere.

DECLARATION that the defendant was possessed of a house, and of a lamp projecting from and fastened to the same, and overhanging a certain public highway, and conducted himself so negligently in the management and keeping of the said lamp, and of an arm bracket and apparatus which supported the same, and of the pipes which conveyed the gas to the said lamp, and in suffering the same to be out of repair, and in certain work and repairs which were being done to the said lamp, and so wrongfully omitted to take precautions to prevent the said lamp from falling upon persons passing along the said highway, or to give them any warning in that behalf, that by reason of the premises the said lamp fell upon the plaintiff while she was lawfully passing along the said highway, and threw her down and greatly injured her.

A second count charged that the defendant suffered the lamp and bracket to be in a ruinous, weak, and insecure state and condition, and out of repair, so as to be dangerous to and likely to fall upon and injure persons passing along the highway, whereby the plaintiff was thrown down.

Pleas not guilty and not possessed.

Issue thereon.

The cause came on to be tried before Quain, J. and a common jury at the Guildhall Sitings after Hilary Term 1875, when the following facts appeared in evidence:

The plaintiff was a barmaid residing in Dulwich, and the defendant a licensed victualler who kept the Hampshire Hog Inn in the Strand. The plaintiff was walking along the Strand at about 3.30 p.m. on the 15th Nov. 1874. When opposite the defendant's house, one of the gas lamps hanging from the house over the pavement about 15 ft., fell and injured her in its fall.

The immediate cause of the fall of the lamp (which weighed about 50 lb.) was this: The gas being out of order, the defendant had engaged a gas-fitter named Weaver to put it to rights. The gas-fitter had placed a ladder against the bracket of the lamp, and was just mounting the ladder for the purpose of reaching the lamp and blowing the water out of the gas pipes, when the bracket gave way from the weight of the ladder, and the lamp at once fell. In the preceding August the defendant had contracted with a gasfitter named Chappell for the repair of all his lamps, including the one in question. Chappell had done certain repairs, for which the defendant had paid him.

In answer to questions put by the learned judge, the jury found that there was no negligence on the part of the defendant except by Chappell; that there was no negligence on the part of Weaver; that there was negligence on the part of Chappell, "the defendant's servant," (a) that the immediate cause of the fall of the lamp was the fall of the ladder, and that the lamp was out of order through general decay, but not to the knowledge of the defendant, and they assessed the damages at 40l. The learned judge then directed a verdict to be entered for the plaintiff to that amount, reserving leave to move on behalf of the defendant.

A rule having been obtained accordingly to set aside the above verdict and enter a verdict for the defendant or a nonsuit, on the ground that upon the ruling of the learned judge and the findings of the jury, he ought to have directed a nonsuit or a verdict for the defendant,

Collins and Poulter for the plaintiff, now showed cause.—The defendant is liable for the state of his premises in any event, and the plaintiff is entitled to recover from him for injuries caused to her by the fall of an ill-constructed lamp in a public thoroughfare.

Reg. v. Watson, 2 Ld. Raymond 856;

Quarman v. Burnett, 6 M. & W. 499, per Parke, B., at p. 510.

In Reg. v. Watson the defendant was indicted for that he was possessed of a house adjoining to a common bridge; that he ought to repair the house ratione tenuræ; but that he permitted it to be so much out of repairs that it was ready to fall upon the Queen's subjects passing over the bridge. It appeared that the defendant was tenant at will only, but judgment was given against him. "He ought," it was said "to repair the house, so that the public be not prejudiced by want of repairs." And in Quarman v. Burnett it was said by Parke, B., "The rule of law may be, that where a man is in possession of fixed property, he must take care that his property is so used or managed that other persons are not injured, and that whether his property be managed by his own immediate servants, or by contractors with them, or their servants. Such injuries are in the nature of nuisances." [BLACKBURN, J.—The jury have negatived personal knowledge and negligence in the present defendant.] It is submitted that the liability attaches, independent of any question of knowledge. The rule is thus put in Dicey on Parties, p. 453. "The employer," it is there said, "is liable when the contractor is entrusted with the performance of a duty incumbent upon the employer, and omits to perform it." [BLACKBURN, J.—We cannot take a modern text book as an authority.] Two authorities bear out the proposition. They are

Pickard v. Smith, 10 C. B., N.S., 470;
Hole v. Sittingbourne Railway Company, 30 L. J. 86, Ex.; 6 H. & N. 488.

Even if this be not so, Chappell was a servant, and the defendant was liable for his acts. He would even have been liable criminally.

Reg. v. Stephens, L. Rep. 1 Q.B. 702; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 593.

Barnes v. Ward, 9 C. B. 392; 19 L. J. 195, C. P.;
Fletcher v. Rylands, L. Rep. 3 H. of L. 330;
Hadley v. Taylor, L. Rep. 1 C. P. 53.

McIntyre, Q.C. and Darling, for the defendant, supported the rule.—There is no negligence here on the part of the defendant, and if there is, it was not the cause of the plaintiff's injuries.

[BLACKBURN, J.—Negligence is relative. The question is what was the defendant's duty?] In no case has a person in the position of the defendant been held liable where he had neither knowledge or means of knowledge. [BLACKBURN, J.—Is there any authority to show that a person having a duty cast upon him discharges it by employing somebody else to do it for him? Can the defendant get off because he employed a contractor who cheated him?] In Nichols v. Marsland (L. Rep. 10 Ex. 265), it was held that the defendant was not liable to an action for an escape of water caused by an agent beyond his control, as he had used all reasonable care to keep the water on his own land. [QUAIN, J. referred to Francis v. Cockerell (L. Rep. 5 Q.B. 184; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 203, aff. on appeal, L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 501; 39 L. J. 291, Q. B.; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 466), in which case it was held that the person who had employed a contractor to erect a stand upon a race course was responsible for injuries occasioned by the defective construction of the stand.] The duty of the defendant cannot be put higher than that of a bailee of a chattel. In Searle v. Laverick (L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 122; 43 L. J. 43, Q. B.; 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 89) it was held that a livery stable keeper was not liable for injury caused to carriages placed in his keeping by the fall of the building, in a case where the careless conduct of the builder was the real cause of the accident. How can the defendant be under a greater liability than the livery stable keeper?

BLACKBURN, J.—When we get at the exact facts of this case, to which I desire to confine myself, I have no doubt as to the law. The defendant occupied a building which abutted on the highway, and a lamp projected from that building over the highway. If the lamp had been always kept in a proper state, it would have been harmless to the passers by, but by being in an improper state, it became dangerous. Now there is no doubt that knowingly to maintain such a thing in an improper state would be a nuisance to the highway. Thus much was decided in R. v. Watson (1 Ld. Raym. 856.) I do not decide how far the occupier would be liable in a case where the danger to the public arose from a latent defect in his house or the appurtenances of it. Take the case, for instance, of a wrong doer digging out coals, and making the house unsafe by undermining it; in that case I by no means say that the householder would be liable in any event. But I do say this, that the householder would be responsible as soon as he knew of such a defect. I will go further, and say that a householder having that on his premises which is liable to fall into decay, and which he knows will ultimately fall into decay, has a duty cast upon him to investigate and repair. Whether he would be liable if the defect were latent, and he consequently failed to discover it, is a point of considerable doubt, which, as I said before, I do not decide. It is enough for the present case to say that if the defect be discovered, the householder is bound to repair. Now in August the plaintiff appears to have become aware, applying his common sense to the matter, that these lamps were going out of repair. Acting very properly, he proceeded to have them mended, and employed a contractor.—for Chappell was not a servant—to do the work for him. It does not appear that he was careless in his selection of Chappell as contractor, but that does not affect the question. It comes to this: The defendant having a lamp, and it being his duty to investigate the state of it, employs Chappell to do that duty for him. Because Chappell failed in his duty to the defendant, the defendant's duty to investigate is not therefore discharged. Consequently the defendant is liable, and this rule must be discharged.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is what is the duty of a person in the position of the defendant? Is it his duty to maintain his premises in good repair, or only to employ a competent person in the work of maintaining them? I think the mere statement of the case suggests its answer. A person who keeps a lamp of this kind puts the public in peril. He cannot get rid of his duty to put the public out of peril by employing another person to take the necessary steps for doing so.

QUAIN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is what was the duty of the defendant? He chooses to hang out a lamp from his house over the public street. I think that R. v. Watson (ubi sup.) shows that it was his duty to repair the lamp and keep it in repair. It is plain that one of the public has received injury from the lamp being out of repair. This being so, can the defendant shift the responsibility from himself by showing that he had employed a contractor to do the repairs? I think not. None of the cases which have been cited bear out such a proposition. For these reasons I agree with the rest of the court that this rule ought to be discharged.

Rule discharged.

REG. v. JUSTICES OF LANCASHIRE.

Appeal to quarter sessions against poor rate—Practice of adjourned sessions—Notice of appeal—Jurisdiction of Sessions—Statutes 17 Geo. 2, c. 38, s. 4; 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 1; 27 & 28 Vict. c. 39, s. 1.

B., being dissatisfied with the decision of an assessment committee given on 16th June, resolved to appeal to the Kirkdale Sessions of the County of Lancashire.

Fourteen days' notice of appeal is required to be given to the overseers, and twenty-one days to the assessment committee. The next quarter sessions for the county of Lancaster were held on the 28th June, and by adjournment at Kirkdale on 13th July. B., duly served his notice of appeal for the Michaelmas Quarter Sessions, which commenced at Lancaster on 18th Oct., and were held at Kirkdale by adjournment on 2nd Nov. The justices having refused to hear the appeal on the ground that B. should have given the requisite notices for the sessions held at Kirkdale on the 13th July.

Held, that the justices were wrong inasmuch as time for giving notice of appeal must be calculated in reference to the first day of the commencement of the sessions at Lancaster, and not to the first day of the adjournment thereof at Kirkdale.

Reg. v. Justices of Lancashire (30 L. T. Rep. 149) followed.

THIS was a rule calling on the justices of Lancashire to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not be issued commanding them to hear an appeal brought by one James Blackledge against certain poor rates levied against him.

The material facts are as follows:—The appeal was against a poor rate assessment on the appellant's corn mill at Bootle, near Liverpool, within the West Derby Hundred of the county of Lancaster, and was intended to be heard at the Quarter Sessions for the county of Lancaster, which were holden for the Liverpool district on 2nd Nov. 1875, at Kirkdale. In the county of Lancaster there are four places where the sessions are held, viz., at Lancaster, where they commence, and also at Preston, Salford, and Kirkdale, by adjournment one from the other. The appellant was before the Assessment Committee on the 16th June 1875, and accordingly on that day became aware that the committee declined to reduce his rate to the extent he required. He then determined to appeal to the Court of Quarter Sessions for the county of Lancaster. Under 17th Geo. 2, c. 38, s. 4, persons aggrieved by any poor rate may appeal upon giving reasonable notice to the next general or quarter sessions of the peace for the county. By 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 1, fourteen clear days' notice of appeal at least shall be given to the overseers; and by 27 & 28 Vict. c. 39, s. 1, twenty-one days' notice of appeal must be given to the Assessment Committee. The Quarter Sessions for the county of Lancashire, next after the 16th of June, commenced at Lancaster on the 28th day of June, that is to say, within twelve days from the time the Assessment Committee had refused relief. Accordingly notice of appeal was prepared and served on behalf of James Blackledge in due time for the next ensuing sessions for the said county, which commenced at Lancaster on the 18th Oct., and by adjournment at Kirkdale on 2nd Nov.

It appeared from the affidavit of one of the deputy clerks of the peace, that the Court of Quarter Sessions for the county of Lancaster is held at Lancaster, from thence by adjournment to Preston, and from thence by further adjournment to Manchester, and from thence by final adjournment to Kirkdale. These sessions commence at Lancaster on the Monday, at Preston on Wednesday, at Manchester the following Monday, and at Kirkdale on the Tuesday in the following week, being in the third week after the first day of the session at Lancaster. For practical convenience all business arising within the hundred of West Derby is transacted at the session held by final adjournment at Kirkdale. It had been the practice during the last ten years whenever any questions have arisen at the Kirkdale Sessions affecting the time at which notices of appeal against poor rates should have been given, or whether or not they have been given in due time, to calculate such time from the first day of the said session at Kirkdale, and not from the first day of such session at Lancaster; and it was unusual to enter an appeal against an assessment of property situate within the said West Derby hundred of the said county to the sessions for any other division of the said county than those of the Kirkdale division.

The rule nisi was granted on 16th Dec. 1875.

Herschell, Q.C. and Segar showed cause.—The other side will rely on B. v. Justices of Lancashire (30 L. T. Rep. 149; 27 L. J. 161, M. C.; 4 B. & S. 556), but that case has been practically overruled by B. v. Justices of Sussex (11 L. T. Rep. N.S. 740; 34 L. J. 69, M. C.). At all events that was a case of a highway appeal, and turned on the point whether a ten days' notice of appeal was a condition precedent to the appeal being heard. The Kirkdale Sessions have been held at fixed dates for the last thirty or forty years, for the convenience of dispatch of business. [FIELD, J.—In B. v. Justices of Lancashire (ubi sup.), Lord Campbell says, "We cannot take notice of the arrangements made in the county of Lancaster for the convenient administration of justice at the quarter sessions; and we can give no more effect to the notice than if the sessions had continued from the beginning, and until all the business of the county had been finished."] B. v. Justices of Sussex, in the Exchequer Chamber (ubi sup.) really decides the question in dispute. Erle, C.J., in the course of an elaborate judgment, says: "When for practical convenience the county is divided into distinct divisions, and in each division a distinct court is held, so that all the questions locally arising within each division by practice belong to that division, and all the process for that division is returnable at the court for that division, and the panels of the jury are made out for that division, and the rules of practice made by the court of each division for the conduct of business in it assume that the day when the court for that division begins its sittings is the first day of the sessions for that division, we see good reason for holding that the conduct of an appeal suit, which has been properly commenced and which belongs to one of those divisions, should be governed by the rules of practice for that division." These remarks are distinctly applicable to the Kirkdale Sessions. [MALLOX, J.—They formed no part of the original decision. FIELD, J.—The court, after overruling B. v. Justices of Suffolk (4 A. & E. 319; 5 L. J. 3, M.C.), expressly say, "it is not intended to make any alteration in the rule that the next sessions after service of an order of removal, having jurisdiction over an appeal against it, must be ascertained by reference to the date of the original sessions for the county, and not of any adjournment thereof as laid down in B. v. Justices of Sussex (7 T. Rep. 107.)"]

Edwards Q.C. and Potter, in support of the rule.—These sessions are treated by Cross and Leeman in their Practice of Quarter Sessions, 2nd edit. p. 119, as adjourned sessions. B. v. Justices of Lancashire (ubi sup.) is on all fours with the present case, and was not referred to in the judgment of

If these two cases were overruled either expressly or virtually by the later case of R. v. Justices of Sussex (ubi sup.), we should be bound to follow it. But the judgment of the court expressly shows they were not intended to be overruled.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. In the later case of R. v. Justices of Sussex (ubi sup.) there is no desire on the part of the learned judge who delivered the judgment of the court to interfere with the judgment of R. v. Justices of Lancashire (ubi sup.), indeed quite the contrary.

THE APOTHECARIES' COMPANY v. NOTTINGHAM.

Apothecaries' Act (55 Geo. 3, c. 194), s. 20—Action for penalty.

Customers went to the shop of the defendant, a chemist, and asked him what was good for their ailments, and the defendant, who was not a certificated apothecary, was accustomed to suggest medicine, make it up, and sell it to them.

Held, that, in so doing, the defendant was acting and practising as an apothecary, and was liable to a penalty under 55 Geo. 3, c. 194, s. 20.

Action for a penalty under 55 Geo. 3, c. 194, s. 20, "An Act for better Regulating the Practice of Apothecaries." (a)

The claim alleged that the defendant carried on the practice of an apothecary in Shadwell, and charged that he "advised, attended, furnished, and supplied medicines for reward to himself to divers persons between the 15th Aug. 1875, and the date of the issuing of the writ." The claim was for 20*l.*, the forfeiture under the above section of the Act. On this issue was joined.

Glyn for the plaintiff.

Rose for the defendant.

It was proved that the defendant, who was a certificated chemist but not an apothecary, had been in partnership with a duly qualified medical practitioner, but it was also shown that this medical man was not always on the spot. It also appeared in evidence that the defendant had on various occasions been applied to for advice and medicine, both of which he gave to the applicants, but did so as an ordinary shop-keeper from behind the counter. It did not appear that he ever went from his shop to attend on patients, and he was proved, in cases of serious illness, to have always referred the patient to the doctor with whom he was in partnership. At the close of the plaintiff's case

Rose submitted that the plaintiff should be nonsuited, and that the defendant had merely acted as most chemists of the present day are in the habit of acting, and that in dispensing his drugs over the counter, even though he gave advice therewith in trivial cases, he did nothing whatever to bring himself under the penalties of the Act.

Glyn replied.

The learned judge thought the case must go to the jury, whereupon the defendant was called and examined, and admitted that he had prescribed medicines over the counter on various occasions as aforesaid.

BRAMWELL, B., in summing up, said: You have to find a true verdict on the evidence, whether you like the Act or not. Perhaps you may think that a person has a right to practise as he likes, whether qualified or not; or, on the other hand, you may think that, whereas the poorer classes have no opportunity of judging of or ascertaining the qualifications of the persons to whom they resort for medical advice, the Legislature should require such persons to possess proper skill and knowledge, and to obtain a certificate thereof. No doubt some people like to go to unqualified practitioners so as to get advice cheap; but there is the law, and we have to observe it. If you think this man has "acted or practised as an apothecary," then you must find your verdict for the plaintiff. Indeed, I feel some little difficulty in putting the case to you, for on the defendant's own admission he says he prescribed, and that, if a person brought a child to him suffering from, say diarrhoea, and asked what was good for it, he gave the medicine; if, however, the case was serious, he sent the doctor. Surely that is acting and practising as an apothecary within the meaning of the Act. [His Lordship then adverted to the evidence.] Possibly, if on some one or two occasions a customer had gone to the shop and asked for medicine, and the defendant had said it was good for his complaint, that advising might be too trivial to be worth taking notice of by suing under this Act, but here the defendant admits that he dispensed and at the same time advised medicine habitually.

Loveland, on the part of the prosecution, applied that the deposition of one of the witnesses in this case might be sent up to the grand jury upon the presentation to them of the bill of indictment against the prisoner, such witness being unable to attend in consequence of illness, and he stated that he was then ready to prove such illness, and that the depositions were duly taken in conformity with sect. 17 of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42.

DENMAN, J.—I do not think you need do so.

Loveland.—I believe it is usual to give this proof before sending up the deposition.

DENMAN, J.—I think it is unnecessary. The grand jury are entitled to look at and to act upon the deposition.

Loveland.—The grand jury may not think of looking at the deposition, and so may ignore the bill.

DENMAN, J.—They should be told that the court permits them to look at the deposition, and to act upon it, if they think proper.

The deposition was thereupon taken before the grand jury, and they returned a true bill.

REG. v. WELCH.

Malicious injury—Reckless act causing death of a mare—24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 40.

The prisoner by a reckless and cruel act caused the death of a mare. The jury found that he did not intend to kill maim or wound the mare, but that he knew that what he did would or might kill maim or wound the mare, and that he nevertheless did the act recklessly and not caring whether the mare was injured or not.

Held that there was sufficient malice to support a conviction.

CASE reserved for the opinion of this court by Lindley, J.

The prisoner in this case was indicted under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 40, for unlawfully and maliciously killing, maiming, or wounding a mare.

The indictment contained three counts viz.:

First, for killing; secondly, maiming; thirdly, wounding.

The prisoner was tried before me at the Old Bailey on the 23rd Sept. 1875.

The evidence showed that the mare in question died by reason of injuries caused by the prisoner. These injuries consisted of a hole in the base of the bladder and three holes in the large intestines. They were caused by the prisoner inserting the handle of a stable fork into the vagina of the mare and pushing the handle two feet and more into the mare's body and working the fork backwards and forwards in that position. Whilst this was being done the mare put her ears back and stamped her feet and it was proved that these were signs of pain.

There was no evidence to show that the prisoner was actuated by any ill-will towards the owner of the mare, nor by any spite towards the mare herself, nor in fact, by any motive or desire except the gratification of his own depraved tastes.

It was objected by Counsel for the prisoner that there was no case for the jury as there was no malice.

I overruled the objection, and, having Reg. v. Pembilton (L. Rep., 2 Cr. Cas. Res. 119; 12 Cox C. C. 607) before me, directed the jury to find the prisoner "guilty," if they were of opinion that either of the two following questions ought to be answered in the affirmative, viz.:

1. Did the prisoner, in fact, intend to kill, maim, or wound the mare, or if he did not, then,

2. Did he know that what he was doing would or might kill, maim, or wound the mare, and did he, nevertheless, do what he did recklessly and not caring whether the mare was injured or not?

The jury answered the first question in the negative and the second in the affirmative and the prisoner was found guilty accordingly.

Sentence was postponed and the prisoner was left in custody.

The question for the court is, whether the conviction ought to be quashed or not.

NATHANIEL LINDLEY.

No counsel appeared for the prisoner.

Besley, for the prosecution.—The conviction was right. In Reg. v. Pembilton the prisoner was indicted for maliciously committing damage to property, viz. breaking a plate glass window, but the jury found that he did not intend to break the window. Here the jury have found that the prisoner did the act recklessly not caring whether the mare was injured or not. [He was then stopped by the court.]

LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—The act was reckless and cruel, and we are of opinion that there was malice sufficient to sustain the conviction. The conviction will therefore be affirmed.

BRAMWELL, B.—Reg. v. Pembilton is clearly distinguishable from this case. There the damage to the property injured was not intended and was not the natural consequence of the act done which was throwing a stone at a person whom it missed.

The other judges concurred.

Conviction affirmed.

Evidence—False pretences—Fraudulent intent.

Prisoner was indicted in one count for falsely pretending to M. that D. carried on business at H. &c.; and there were other counts for similar false pretences to other persons; and a general count for, with intent to defraud the Queen's subjects, inserting in a newspaper an advertisement containing similar false pretences. It was proved that the prisoner had inserted the advertisement, and that the pretences were false and fraudulent. Six envelopes, each directed according to the advertisement, and containing twelve postage stamps were found upon the prisoner, and 281 other letters similarly directed were produced from the post office in a sealed bag which had been stopped by the post office authorities. None of the 281 had ever been in the prisoner's possession or custody, nor were the writers of them called as witnesses.

Held that the 281 letters were admissible in evidence upon this indictment.

REG. v. COOPER.

[C. CAS. R.]

Chairman of the Northampton Court of Quarter Sessions.

The prisoner George Cooper was tried on an indictment for obtaining and attempting to obtain certain moneys from the persons in the said indictment mentioned, by false pretence.

The following is an abstract of the indictment.

First count.—Falsely pretending to Maria Mitchell that certain persons called Davis Brothers were carrying on business at Hardingstone, and were acquainted with a method whereby 2s. 6d. per hour could be earned by beginners of either sex, by preparing carte de visite papers at their own homes at eightpence per dozen, and were able to give permanent employment to all who should learn the method by their instruction, whereby the defendant obtained twelve stamps.

Second count.—Similar false pretences to John Clarke, whereby the defendant obtained certain stamps.

Third count.—Similar false pretences to Ellen Cameron, whereby the defendant attempted to obtain one shilling.

Fourth count.—Similar false pretences to Elizabeth Hickson, whereby the defendant attempted to obtain one shilling.

Fifth count.—That the defendant with intent to defraud the Queen's subjects inserted in the Daily Telegraph a fraudulent advertisement in the words therein mentioned containing the false statements in the first count mentioned, whereby he obtained sums of money and stamps from the Queen's subjects.

The advertisement was as follows: "Two and sixpence per hour easily earned by beginners (either sex) by preparing carte de visite papers at their own homes, at eightpence per dozen, employment permanent. Trial paper and instructions, one shilling. Davis Brothers, Hardingstone, Northampton."

On the trial it was proved that the prisoner inserted the said advertisement, that there was no such firm as Davis Brothers at Hardingstone, and that the prisoner was not in a position to give permanent employment.

Six envelopes, each directed as above, containing answers to the advertisement and twelve postage stamps were found in the possession of the prisoner on his being apprehended. 281 other letters were produced by the chief clerk of the post office at Northampton in a sealed bag.

These letters had also been addressed to the prisoner under the title of Davis Brothers, Hardingstone, in reply to the said advertisement, and had been received at the office in like manner as those mentioned in the former paragraph, but having been stopped by the post office authorities before the said letters had been delivered, none of the 281 letters had ever been in the prisoner's possession or custody, nor was any proof adduced that they were written by the persons from whom they purported to come, but each letter had been opened at the post office before production at the trial and each contained twelve stamps.

The counsel for the prosecution proposed to put the whole of such letters in evidence against the prisoner.

The counsel for the prisoner objected that the said letters not having been found in the possession of the prisoner, and as their contents were unknown to him and there was no proof of their authenticity, they could not be adduced in evidence against the said prisoner.

The court admitted the said letters. Two were read, and all the others taken as read. It was proved that when they were opened by the post office clerk, each envelope contained twelve postage stamps, as when admitted in evidence. The letters except the said two were not, in fact, read, but were taken as having been regularly put in, and were commented upon by the Counsel for the prosecution.

The jury found the prisoner guilty and the court sentenced him to nine months' imprisonment with hard labour in the House of Correction at Northampton, but reserved for the consideration of the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved, the question whether the Court of Quarter Sessions ought to have admitted the said letters as evidence against the said prisoner.

If the court should be of opinion that the Court of Quarter Sessions ought to have rejected the said letters as evidence, then the conviction to be quashed, if not to be affirmed.

Execution of the judgment was respited until the determination of the question reserved, and the prisoner was released on recognisance himself in one hundred pounds and two sureties in fifty pounds, conditional for the prisoner's appearing and rendering himself at the January sessions.

H. M. STOCKDALE,

Chairman of the said Court of Quarter Sessions.

Jacques, for the prisoner.—The 281 letters detained at the post office were not evidence against the prisoner. It was not shown that the prisoner had done anything which caused those letters to be written. The writers of them were not called and the letters were not evidence of the facts stated therein: (Reg. v. Plumer, Russ. & Ry. 264.) The prisoner had never received them nor does it appear that he had done anything to obtain possession of them. [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—Did not the prisoner by the advertisement make the postmaster his agent for receiving the letters: (Reg. v. Jones, 1 Den. C. C. 551; 4 Cox C. C. 198).] In Reg. v. Huet (2 Leach C. C. 956) it was held that a letter purporting to come from the prisoner's brother, and left by the postman pursuant to its direction, at the prisoner's lodgings after he was apprehended and during his confinement, but never actually in his custody, could not be read in evidence against him on his trial. If the prisoner had been indicted on each or any one of the letters, the sender must have been called for the prosecution.

Merewether, for the prosecution.—The letters on being read showed that they were written in answer to the advertisement. Under the circumstances it may be taken that the postmaster here received the letters for the prisoner; for the insertion of the advertisement, the finding of some letters upon the prisoner, and the receipt of the 281 at the post office may all be connected together: (Reg. v. Welman, Dears. C. C. 188; 22 L. J. 118, M. (1).) [GROVE, J.—It seems difficult to say that the receipt of the postmaster was the prisoner's receipt, when the postmaster withheld the letters, and prevented the prisoner from obtaining them.] At all events they were admissible to show the intent to defraud: (Reg. v. Francis, 12 Cox C. C. 612; L. Rep. 2 C. C. R. 128.) [BRANWELL, B.—That case would be an authority in your favour if the evidence had been that of other similar advertisements inserted by the prisoner, but I do not see how it applies here.]

Jacques was heard in reply.

REG. v. CRESWELL.

Bigamy—Validity of first marriage—Ceremony performed in a private house.

While the parish church was under repair, divine service had been several times performed by a clerk in holy orders in a chamber at a private hall, and the marriage of the prisoner with his wife was solemnized there. There was no evidence that the chamber at the hall was licensed for the performance of divine service or for marriages.

Held that there was evidence from which the court and jury might properly infer that it was properly licensed.

CASE stated for the opinion of this court by the Lord Chief Baron.

The prisoner was tried at Chelmsford at the last Summer Assizes for bigamy and convicted.

It was proved that he married one Sarah Hill in 1868, that she was still alive, and that he married the prosecutrix in Oct. 1874 at St. Mary's, Islington.

It was, however, objected for the prisoner that that the first marriage was void on the ground that it was solemnized not in a church, but in a chamber at South Weald Hall in Essex, which was situate some yards from the parish church, and that the marriage took place while the church was under repair.

The Statutes 6 Will. 4, c. 85, and 4 Geo. 4, c. 76, ss. 21 and 22, were quoted.

I reserved the point, and the question for the opinion of the court is whether upon the above facts this was a valid marriage. If not the conviction must be set aside, otherwise affirmed.

FITZ ROY KELLY.

Jan. 22.—The case came on for argument this day, but was referred back to Kelly, C.B. for some further facts to be stated. The following were the additional facts stated: "Divine service had been several times performed in the building in question from which it is for the court to consider whether the presumption may be raised which would give validity to the marriage."

Jan. 29.—No Counsel appeared to argue for the prisoner.

C. E. Jones, for the prosecution.

LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—It appears to the court that the additional facts stated by the Lord Chief Baron settle the case. We are of opinion that the marriage service having been performed in a place where divine service was several times performed, the rule "Omnia præsumuntur rite acta" applies, and that we must assume that the place was properly licensed, and that the clergyman performing the service was not guilty of the grave offence of marrying persons in an unlicensed place. The facts of the marriage and other church services being performed there by a clergyman are abundant evidence from which the court and a jury might assume that the place was properly licensed for the celebration of marriages.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion for the reasons stated by my Lord Chief Justice.

LUSH, J.—I am also of the same opinion. The fact of the marriage service having been performed by a person acting in a public capacity is prima facie evidence as to the person's legal capacity to perform the service. So the fact of its having been performed in a place by a person acting in such capacity is also prima facie evidence that the place was properly licensed for marriages. The presumption covers both the person and the place. Here the ceremony having been performed by a clergyman in a place where the church service was performed on several occasions, brings the case within the rule "Omnia præsumuntur rite acta."

GROVE, J. and AMPHLETT, B. concurred.

BAGSHAW v. BUXTON LOCAL BOARD OF HEALTH.

Highway—Inclosure—Obstruction—Local Board of Health—Towns Improvement Clauses Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 34), s. 70.

The plaintiffs filed a bill to restrain the local board of health from removing a wall and railings enclosing a piece of land in front of a house, which piece of land was alleged by the local board to form part of the highway:

Held, upon the evidence, that the piece of land did form part of the highway.

Held, also, that the defendants had a right to remove the wall and railings as an obstruction under sect. 70 of the Towns Improvement Clauses Act 1847.

Held, also, that if that section did not apply, the court, having decided that the wall and railings were obstructions, would not restrain the defendants from removing them.

THIS was a bill to restrain the Buxton Local Board of Health from removing an alleged obstruction to the highway.

In the year 1853, William Parker Shipton purchased a plot of land in Buxton, and in the course of that year erected a house now called No. 7, Terrace-road.

In or about the year 1858, William Parker Shipton enclosed a narrow piece of ground in front of this house, with a low wall and iron railings, which he planted with shrubs, thus forming a front garden to the house. Shipton subsequently sold the house and premises to the plaintiff, John William Potter, who let the same to the plaintiff, Samuel Bagshawe, as yearly tenant. The defendants, the Buxton Local Board of Health were incorporated in 1859 under the provisions of the Local Government Act 1858, and they alleged that this inclosed garden formed part of the highway within the district of the local board, and on the 11th Dec. 1873, they served the plaintiff, Samuel Bagshawe, with a notice under the 70th section of the Towns Improvements Clauses Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 34), which is incorporated with the Local Government Act 1858, requiring the wall, railings, and shrubs to be removed as an obstruction to the safe and convenient passage along the street called Terrace-road, and stating that in default he would be liable to a penalty, and that the board might proceed to remove the obstruction. The plaintiffs then filed this bill.

Roxburgh, Q.C. and E. C. Willis for the plaintiffs, contended that, even if the land enclosed formed part of the highway, the defendants, who had only the same powers as surveyors of highways under the Highways Act, had no power to remove the wall, railings, and shrubs, and they referred to

Southgate, Q.C. and Hastings, Q.C. for the defendants referred to Turner v. Ringwood Highway Board, L. Rep., 9 Eq. 418.

Sir G. JESSEL.—There are some questions which I think I must dispose of before I hear and decide upon the substantial question of fact in dispute; and for the purpose of deciding these questions, I assume, for the present, that the defendants can prove to my satisfaction that the piece of garden in question is a part of a public highway which is vested in them as the local board under the Town Improvement Acts; and when I say "vested," I mean vested sub modo, as far as a highway can be—not giving them necessarily a right to the soil. On that assumption, I am of opinion that the bill to restrain them from moving the wall or taking away the shrubs and soil of the garden cannot be maintained. It must be remembered that this suit came to a hearing after the Judicature Acts had come into operation, and I have now to decide the question of title between the parties. The great object of the new Acts was to prevent unnecessary and useless litigation, and the case must now be heard by a judge who is competent to decide every question, instead of sending the parties to have their rights decided before some other judge at the cost of very great expense and delay. The plaintiffs say, "Assuming that we are wrongfully encroaching on the highway, and assuming also that the defendants, who are the guardians of the highway, are right in saying that we have so encroached, yet they have no right under the terms of their Act of Parliament, or at common law, to abate the nuisance, and if they abate the nuisance, they render themselves liable to an action for trespass" and so forth. They further say that, under the circumstances, this court, which at the same time decides that he is wrong in encroaching on the public highway, is bound, though it decides the question finally and for ever, to say that it will restrain the defendants from abating that nuisance. If I were to come to such a conclusion as that, it would certainly be very extraordinary. Now I will first of all consider the question as it stands on the powers given to the defendants by their Acts. The only material section to consider is the 70th section of the Towns Improvement Clauses Act 1847, but as that section refers to the 69th section, it is necessary to read it first. The 69th section is this—"The commission may give notice to the occupier of any house or building to remove or alter any porch, shed, or projecting window, step, cellar, cellar door or window, sign, sign-post, sign-iron, show-board, window-shutter, wall, gate, or fence, or any other obstruction or projection erected or placed after the passing of the special Act, against or in front of any house or building within the limits of the special Act, and which is an obstruction to the safe and convenient passage along any street." Now that section is limited to an obstruction erected in front of a house or building. I must not forget that it is not a general power, but a power limited to that extent. The question of construction is, whether the words in section 70, "any such obstructions or projections" include the wall of a garden. I find the word "wall" in the 69th section, and I have no doubt that a wall falls within section 70. The obstruction, if it is an obstruction, is none the less so because the land is used as a garden. A garden wall is a wall, and the shrubs which are planted in the garden will come under the words "any other obstructions." I have no doubt that the wall and shrubs have obstructed, and that they are obstructions. Accordingly, the only question is, whether they are obstructions "to the safe and convenient passage along any street." I assume for this purpose, that if this was a public and convenient highway, it was a street within the meaning of this Act. The words "along a street," mean along the whole of the street; and if you take and inclose a portion of the street itself, how can it be said that that is not an obstruction to the safe and convenient passage along the street? It appears to me that I should be cutting down this Act of Parliament, and making it almost meaningless if I so held, and I am therefore of opinion that the defendants are entitled, under the section in question, to remove this, being, as it is, an obstruction in front of the house. The next point I have to consider is this, whether, assuming that this section does not apply, I ought to restrain the defendant by injunction. That raises also a question, as to which I believe there is no decision, namely, who has the right to abate an obstruction of a public highway? It is clear, on the authorities, that any individual who is specially injured by the obstruction, has by common law, a right to remove that which illegally causes a special injury to him. But a private individual has no right to remove an obstruction which causes no special injury to him, but which is simply an obstruction to the road as regards the public in general as distinguished from the individual. But has no person a right at common law to remove an obstruction which is an obstruction to all her Majesty's subjects? I have no doubt that at one time either the crown or the conservators of the road, must, by their agents, have had such a right. Of course, the ordinary proceeding was by indictment for the crime of obstructing the highway. The indictment did not remove or get rid of the obstruction. How then was it to be got rid of? According to the modern practice, the judge suspends the conviction if the obstruction is removed by the offender; and in some cases, where there is summary jurisdiction, there is a special power to order the removal of the obstruction. Still, it seems to me, the result of an indictment is to decide that somebody or other had the right to prostrate the obstruction, and the question is, who has that right? Surely the person acting on behalf of the public must have the right to prostrate on reasonable notice. The reason which prevented the individual acting on behalf of the public does not seem to me to exist, when there is a body or a person who is entitled to represent the public in this way, although no special statutory power may be given for this purpose. It appears to me only reasonable that when the right is decided (and I am limiting my observations to that case), that body or person should have the power to prostrate. If that is so, and if I am now to decide the right as it would be decided in the case of an indictment, it would be very absurd that, having decided the right, and having decided that this obstruction ought to be prostrated, I should restrain the public body, who are the guardians of the road, from prostrating it. It appears to me that, even assuming that the public body had no right to prostrate without a decision as to the right, yet, when the court decides that, it would be stultifying itself at the same time to award an injunction to prevent the public body doing that which the court says it ought to do, viz., to get rid of the obstruction. Therefore, if I were of opinion that by the statute no such power was given to the defendants, and that at common law they had no such power as representing the crown or the public, I should yet come to the conclusion that when the court had decided that the plaintiff's erection was an obstruction and a wrongful thing amounting to a nuisance, it would be wrong, at his suit, to restrain the public body from abating the nuisance. The only point to be decided is the question of right to the piece of land in question, and on that I must now hear the evidence. The burden of proof of course lies on the defendants to show that the local board is right in asserting that this piece of land is a portion of the public highway.

[His Lordship having heard the evidence, decided that the piece of land was a part of the public highway, and dismissed the bill with costs.]

THORLEY v. GLOSSOP.

Lessor and lessee—Breach of covenant by lessee owing to neglect of public duty by lessor—Ejectment—Remedy of lessee at law and in equity.

The defendants, in Dec. 1873, demised to the plaintiff certain premises to be used for refreshment rooms for twenty-one years. The plaintiff put up a stove for the purposes of his business, which made the party wall so hot as to endanger the adjoining premises. On receiving notice from defendant's solicitors to abate the nuisance they substituted another stove in August 1874, but the evil continued. In Oct. 1874 the defendants commenced an action of ejectment against the plaintiff for breach of covenant. The plaintiff then had the premises examined, and found that in several respects the provisions of the Metropolitan Building Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 122) had been violated. The plaintiff by his bill sought to have the lease cancelled, the action of ejectment stayed, and damages awarded. The defendants did not insist on the lease or seek damages for past breaches of covenant.

Held, that as the bill was filed before the Judicature Acts came into operation, and was really for damages and not for the rescission of a contract, as the defendants did not seek to enforce the contract, it could not be sustained. The plaintiff's remedy was at law and not in equity.

THIS was a bill to obtain the cancelling of a lease and to restrain the defendants from continuing an action of ejectment which they had commenced against the plaintiff. The defendants are the owners of various shops and houses in Oxford-street, including No. 417, which was the subject of the present suit, and which they had recently pulled down and rebuilt. By an indenture of 31st Dec. 1873, between the defendants of the one part and the plaintiff of the other, the premises No. 417, Oxford-street, were demised to the plaintiff for twenty-one years at the rate of 345l. per annum. The plaintiff covenanted to pay the usual rates and to keep the premises and the roofs and party and other walls in good repair, and not to cut or alter the walls, timbers, or partitions without the defendants' consent; and also not to carry on any other business than that of a cigar merchant and keeper of billiards and refreshment rooms, and not to do any act which might create a nuisance to the defendants, their tenants, or the neighbourhood.

The plaintiff took possession in Nov. 1873, and proceeded to fit up the premises for the purposes of his business, and expended about 3000l. for that object, and after so fitting them up he let the premises to his brother, Josiah Watson Thorley. Amongst other fittings was a cooking stove, furnished by Mr. Benham, of Wigmore-street, made expressly to suit the position and character of the premises. But owing to the improper manner in which the building was constructed, the ordinary use of the stove made the wall of the premises and of the adjoining house so hot as to cause danger of fire, and to make the adjoining premises, a picture dealer's, unfit for use. The plaintiff accordingly received notice from the defendants' solicitors to abate the nuisance; but on the plaintiff's representation that the nuisance was owing to the faulty construction of the party walls, they consulted their surveyor, who reported that the walls were of the usual thickness, but that the stove was of an unusual character. The plaintiff spent much money and labour in attempting to remedy the evil, but to no purpose, and in August 1874 he substituted another stove, which he was assured could not cause a like nuisance. But the evil was undiminished, and the picture dealer, Mr. Hooper, next door, stated that two leading insurance companies declined to insure his pictures.

On the 10th Oct. 1874, the defendants commenced an action of ejectment against the plaintiff, on the ground of breach of the covenant in the lease not to cause nuisance to the neighbourhood. The plaintiff had the premises carefully examined, and found that in several important particulars, the thickness of walls, the lining of flues and other things, the provisions of the Metropolitan Building Act had been flagrantly violated. The defects were such as could not be remedied except by the complete demolition of the premises. The state of the house was, as the plaintiff alleged, fraudulently concealed from him, and his brother has been obliged to shut up the premises. The plaintiff had no defence at law to the action of ejectment, but the breach of the covenant was wholly owing to the misconduct of the defendants.

The plaintiff accordingly prayed that the indenture of the 31st Dec. 1873 might be delivered up to be cancelled, that the defendants might be restrained from further prosecuting the action of ejectment, and that damages might be awarded.

It did not appear that the defendants wished to hold the plaintiff to his lease or to recover damages for past breaches of covenant.

Day, Q.C., W. Pearson, Q.C., and Simmonds, for the plaintiff.—There has been a gross breach of public duty by the defendants of which the plaintiff was ignorant, and owing to which a nuisance has been occasioned within the meaning of the covenant. The doctrine of equity in such cases is laid down in Tildesley v. Clarkson (30 Beav. 419; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 98). The person who neglects a public duty is liable to the person who suffers therefrom: (Couch v. Steel, 3 E. & B. 402); and that liability for damages is not taken away even though a penalty be imposed for non-performance of the duty:

Atkinson v. Newcastle Waterworks Company, L. Rep. 6 Ex. 404;

Blamires v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company, L. Rep. 8 Ex. 283; Pickering v. James, L. Rep. 8 C. P. 489.

We cannot get our contract set aside at law; our right to get damages does not affect our rights here. At law it would be no answer to an action of ejectment that the house was defectively built. There has been a breach and no waiver. The injury has been caused by the defendants' violation of the Building Act. We are entitled to our civil remedy, which, as it cannot be at law, must be in equity.

Dickinson, Q.C. and Sturges, for the defendants, were not called upon.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I do not think that this bill can be sustained. As the bill was filed before the Judicature Acts came into operation, the case is regulated by the law applicable to these cases at the time of the filing of the bill. That being so, the plaintiff's case is this: He was induced to take a house suited for him, in which there were certain defects of structure known to the defendants and concealed from the plaintiff. At the time of bill filed, the defendants had taken proceedings, under the covenant in the lease, to re-enter on a breach of covenant, which is not disputed. The plaintiff having discovered these defects, abandoned the premises and ceased to carry on the business. He wanted to get rid of the place. Otherwise his remedy would have been to retain possession, and bring his action for having been induced to take the premises. Under these circumstances, when the bill was filed, an action was pending for the recovery of the premises by the defendants, to which the plaintiff admits that he had no defence. His desire is to get rid of the premises, which the defendants were willing and desired to take back. It is not suggested that the defendants sought to recover damages in respect of past breaches of covenant. The case thus becomes a suit to recover damages for having been induced to take the premises, whether on account of the non-performance of a public duty or an implied warranty. He has his remedy on both grounds, as is shown by the cases cited: it is not shown that the remedy is an imperfect one. Instead of taking his remedy at law, proceedings at which would have been differently conducted from proceedings in this court, he comes here. He claims a right to come here because it is a case of rescission of contract. There would have been something to say for this if it had been sought to hold him to his contract; but all that he can now be entitled to is damages. The action would have gone on a different system at law. There would have been the evidence in chief and cross-examination of witnesses before a jury. Looking to the spirit and principle of the new procedure, this is a case for a jury. Unless it was considered that this was a case peculiarly belonging to this division of the High Court, or such as a judge could try by himself, it would be difficult to satisfy me in such circumstances that I should say, "This is a case for a judge without a jury." I assume that a judge might so say. It seems to me inconvenient and undesirable to withdraw from the better tribunal, or which the defendant has a reasonable right to say is the better tribunal, and which he prefers, a case like the present. It is not a case in which this court should entertain jurisdiction. If I am wrong I should still be disposed not to let this case go on to be tried here, inasmuch as if it goes to the Court of Appeal that court will have the advantage of hearing the witnesses for itself. The bill must be dismissed with costs.

REG. v. NEW WINDSOR.

County rate for other purposes—Liability of borough—Boundary Act 1832 (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 64)—Municipal Corporations Act 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 78) recls. 7 and 117.

The borough of New Windsor before the passing of the Boundary Act 1832 was not liable to the rates for the county of Berks. By that Act, a part of Clewer, then liable to the county rates, was added to the borough for parliamentary purposes, and by the 7th section of the Municipal Corporations Act 1835, the municipal was made coextensive with the parliamentary borough. By sect. 117 "the county rate for other purposes" is to be shared by every borough in the county in which is a separate court of quarter sessions, and which before the passing of the Boundary Act was chargeable with or liable to contribute in whole or in part to the county rate.

Held, that the borough of New Windsor was liable to contribute to such rate.

THIS was a rule obtained on the 18th Nov. last, by Dowdeswell, Q. C., on behalf of the Treasurer of the county of Berks, calling upon two justices of the peace in and for the said county of Berks, and the treasurer of the borough of New Windsor in the said county of Berks, to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue directed to the said justices, commanding them forthwith to proceed to hear and determine the matter of a certain information or complaint preferred by John Lamplow Roberts, treasurer of the said county of Berks, against Adolphus Frederick Millns, the aforesaid treasurer of the borough of New Windsor on the 29th June last.

The following facts were stated upon affidavit by the clerk of the peace for the county of Berks:

Before the passing of the Boundaries Act 1832, one part of the parish of Clewer in Berks was within the then existing borough of Windsor, and exempt from the county rate, and on the passing of the Act a further portion of the parish which up to that time had been chargeable with and liable to county rate was added to the borough of New Windsor, and the amount levied on the parish for general county rate was thereupon reduced.

In 1840 the new assessment for county rate being in the course of preparation by the justices of the county with the assistance of Mr. Coates, a valuer, a return was obtained from the overseers of Clewer, pursuant to sect. 2 of 51 Geo. 3, c. 51, which was duly verified on oath by one of the parish officers of Clewer, before the justices at petty sessions, held at Windsor, which contains as follows:

PARISH OF CLEWER.

	Quantity of land.	Gross estimated value.	Rateable value to the Poor Rate.
	a. r. p.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
1. Without the borough of Windsor, liable to all county rates.....	1184 3 24	5588 10 0	4437 0 0
2. Within the said borough, subject only to county rates made for certain purposes under 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 117.	76 2 30	3517 10 0	2538 10 0
3. Within the said borough not subject to any county rate.....	16 1 28	3369 10 0	2201 10 0

In the assessment then settled, the portion of Clewer which was liable to general county rate described in the overseer's return as containing 1184 acres 3 roods 24 poles was assessed at 4617*l.*, and the rateable value of the portion described in the overseer's return as containing 76 acres 2 roods 30 poles was settled at 2866*l.*

From that time until 1867 the treasurer of the county kept an account of the expenditure for "other purposes," as directed by the Municipal Corporations Act, and not more than twice in every year sent a copy of the same, and made a claim upon the council of the borough of New Windsor for a proportion of such expenses, in respect of the said portion of the parish of Clewer added to the borough as before stated.

In 1867 a fresh basis or standard for county rate was prepared, pursuant to the provisions of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 81, and the portion of Clewer without the borough was raised to 9923*l.*, and the portion within the borough, in respect of which the county claimed for the expenditure for other purposes, was then ascertained by the county treasurer to be 1118*l.*, and a proportionate claim was made on the borough of New Windsor.

The claims so made from the passing of the Boundary Act up to Michaelmas 1870 were duly paid to the county treasurer by the Windsor treasurer on behalf of the council of the said borough, but the claims for 1871, 1872, and 1873 have not been paid, and payment of the same has been refused and resisted by the Town Clerk of the said borough acting on behalf of the council, and also by the treasurer of the borough upon the grounds hereinafter appearing.

On the 19th June 1875, the Berks clerk of the peace duly caused a summons to be taken out against the treasurer of the borough of New Windsor, Adolphus Frederick Millns, of New Windsor aforesaid, upon the complaint of John Lamplow Roberts, of Wokingham, solicitor, the treasurer of the county of Berks, summoning him to appear before two justices of the county of Berks, at Reading, on the 29th June, to show cause why a warrant should not be issued ordering the said borough treasurer to pay to the treasurer of the said county over and above the first mentioned order or orders certain additional sums amounting to 31*l.* 16*s.* 1*d.*, as provided by the statute 15 & 16 Vict. c. 81.

On the 29th June last, the said summons came on to be heard at Reading, before John Blight Monck, Esq., of Coley-park, Reading, and Alexander Wm. Cobham, Esq., of Leighton-park, Reading, two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said county of Berks.

It was then admitted on the part of the treasurer of New Windsor, that a copy of an account of all sums received in aid of or on account of the county rate, and of the sums of money expended out of the county rate for other purposes than the costs arising out of the prosecution, maintenance, and punishment, conveyance, and transport of all offenders committed for trial at assizes in such county from the boroughs in which separate courts for the quarter sessions of the peace are holden, had been sent to the council of the borough of New Windsor, on the 15th March 1875, and had been duly received by the council.

It was also admitted that the treasurer of the county of Berks had made an order on the council of the borough of New Windsor, for the payment of a proper and proportionate sum, if the borough of New Windsor was properly subject to pay any contribution in respect of the said portion of the parish of Clewer, and that such order had been duly issued and received more than one month before the making of the complaint by the said treasurer of the county.

It was further admitted and agreed that the borough of New Windsor possesses a court of quarter sessions and charter, containing non-intromittant clauses, and that prior to the passing of the Boundary Act, no part of the borough as the borough then existed was chargeable with or liable to contribute in whole or in part to the county rate. These admissions were made for the purposes of convenience, and evidence tendered to support them was by agreement dispensed with.

It was contended on the part of the county treasurer that the borough of New Windsor, as now bounded, contains a part which, prior to the passing of the Boundary Act, was liable to contribute to county rate, to wit, a portion of Clewer parish. That there is no enactment to relieve such portion of the parish from its liability to contribute to the "other purposes account," and that the said borough took it from the county with that liability, and that the said borough falls expressly within the words of the section, and is now a borough which, before the passing of the Boundary Act, was liable to contribute in part (i.e., as to part of its area) to the county rate. It was stated that before the passing of the Boundary Act there was no borough which was liable to contribute (as to the whole of its area) to part only of the county rate.

REG. v. NEW WINDSOR.

It was contended on the part of the borough treasurer that inasmuch as the borough of New Windsor has a separate court of quarter sessions, and had the same prior to the passing of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76; and inasmuch as the borough, as it then existed, was not, before the passing of the Boundary Act, liable to the county rate, it could not be called upon for any contribution to the county rate or the other purposes account, in consequence of the said parish of Clewer being added to the borough by the Boundary Act, and by sect. 117 of the Municipal Corporation Act. It was further contended that the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 81, s. 38, did not give jurisdiction to the said justices to make an order and cause to be sent to the treasurer of the borough a warrant ordering him to pay such sums to the county treasurer. And it was also urged by the town clerk of New Windsor, who represented the borough treasurer, that the remedy, if any, for the county was by a writ of mandamus, and that the justices, if they issued a warrant of distress, would be liable to an action of trespass.

The said justices, after hearing the argument of the counsel for the county treasurer, stated that they did not feel satisfied that they had jurisdiction to cause a warrant to be issued ordering the borough treasurer to pay the sum or any sums in respect of the other purposes account: and they further stated that to enable the county treasurer to raise the question by moving for an order or mandamus, or otherwise, they would, as suggested on behalf of the borough treasurer, refuse to make a determination of the said matter then before them, and did then refuse to act, and declined to make any order.

The town clerk of the borough of New Windsor stated upon affidavit, in answer to the rule, that a portion of the parish of Clewer was by the Boundary Act of 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 64, added to the parliamentary borough of New Windsor, and afterwards by the 7th section of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, the boundaries of the municipal borough were made coextensive and identical with the then existing parliamentary borough. Prior to the passing of the Boundary Act the municipal borough consisted of the whole of the parish of New Windsor, and a small portion of the parish of Clewer, and such borough was never liable in whole or in part to contribute, and never contributed towards the county rate. He further said that he was advised and verily believed that that portion of the parish of Clewer which was added to the municipal borough by the Boundary Act as before stated was not liable to be and ought not to have been assessed to the county rate as stated in the affidavit of the clerk of the peace for the county of Berks. And he further said that the portion of the parish of Clewer so added to the said municipal borough as aforesaid is assessed to all the borough and general district rates levied and raised in the said borough. The payments by the treasurer of the borough to the treasurer of the county on the other purposes account were always made under a misapprehension of the borough's liability, and without any order of the council.

H. Matthews, Q.C., showed cause against the rule.—The proceedings before the justices against the treasurer of the borough of Windsor were instituted under sect. 38 of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 81, which begins by reciting part of the Municipal Corporations Act 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76). It is enacted by the 117th section of that Act of 1835, "That the treasurer of every county in England and Wales shall keep an account of all sums of money received in aid or on account of the county rate, and of the sum of money expended out of the county rate for other purposes than the costs arising out of the prosecution, maintenance and punishment, conveyance and transport of offenders committed for trial in such county, and in the case of boroughs having a separate court of quarter sessions of the peace other than out of coroners' inquests, and shall, not more than twice in every year, send a copy of the said account to the council of every borough situate within such county in which a separate court of quarter sessions of the peace shall be holden, and which, before the passing of the said Act (the Boundary Act 1832) was chargeable with, or liable to contribute in whole or in part to the county rate of such county, and shall make an order on the council of every such borough for the payment of such proportion of such sum as would have been chargeable, after deducting all sums of money received in aid of the county rate as aforesaid, if this Act had not passed, upon such borough as the same shall be bounded, according to the provisions of this Act, and the council of such borough shall forthwith order the same, with all reasonable charges of making and sending the said account to be paid to the treasurer of such county out of the borough fund." There is no dispute about a separate court of quarter sessions being held in this borough, but the question is whether before the Boundary Act 1832, the borough was chargeable with or liable to contribute in whole or in part to the county rate. It is admitted that the borough, as it was constituted before that Act, was not chargeable at all with the county rate, and it is admitted that the portion of the county added to the borough by that Act was before that chargeable with the county rate. These are exactly the circumstances as stated in the note to Chitty's Statutes, p. 1016, of the case Reg. v. Inhabitants of New Sarum (7 Q. B. 941). It there appears that such a borough cannot be called upon for contribution to the county rate. [BLACKBURN, J.—But that note is not borne out by the case itself, which merely decides that the borough was not liable under the circumstances to repair a county bridge, which had been added to the borough.] There is, however, this note to the argument at p. 948—"Patteson, J. here referred to Rawlinson's edition of the Municipal Corporations Act, p. 207, note (1) to sect. 117, where it is said:—A question has been raised under these words, whether a borough (in the first section of schedule A to this Act), which has a separate court of quarter sessions, and which was not, before the passing of the Boundary Act, liable to the county rate, can be called upon for any contribution to the county rate, in consequence of a portion of the adjoining county being added to the borough by the Boundary Act, and by sect. 7 (sup.), it seems clear that it cannot, upon the express words of the above section. For though the part added may have previously contributed to the county rate, the question is whether the borough, previously to the Boundary Act, did. There is no provision in this section for a separate rate being made on the part added only, and no new burden can be thrown on the inhabitants living within the old limits." Sect. 7 of the Municipal Corporations Act 1835, provides that the boundaries of certain parliamentary boroughs as described in the Boundary Act 1832 (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 64), shall be the boundaries of certain municipal boroughs mentioned in the Schedule, amongst which appears this borough of New Windsor. The county rates were assessed under 12 Geo. 2, c. 29, until the passing of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 81.

Dowdeswell, Q.C. (with him Greene), for the treasurer of the county of Berks, supported the rule.—The boroughs referred to in the 117th section of the Act of 1835 are those of which the area or site was chargeable before 1832, in whole or in part, to the county rate. With this interpretation the section would include the borough of New Windsor. That there have been places liable to be rated both for a borough and the county in which it lies at the same time, appears from Bates v. Winstanley (4 M. & S. 429), where it was held that a charter granting jurisdiction to borough justices over a district not within the borough, without words of exclusive jurisdiction, does not exclude the county justices from rating the district to a county rate. [FIELD, J.—Reg. v. Mayor, &c. of Birmingham (7 Q. B. 116), is an authority more nearly in point. It appears from Reg. v. Boucher (3 Q. B. 641), that the borough of Birmingham was incorporated by Royal Charter in 1835, but it was held in the other case that the borough, though it had a grant of a separate court of quarter sessions, was liable as part of the county of Warwick for its proportion of the purchase money of a county gaol under the 117th section].

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think the rule must be made absolute. It is difficult to suppose that the Legislature should have intended to exempt from contribution to these other purposes the places which were added to boroughs for the purposes only of quarter sessions and municipal privileges, and it does not seem to have been desirable to deprive the counties of these contributions; expediency, therefore, and principle both point in the same direction, and although there may be some doubt whether the language of the 117th section is sufficient of itself to embrace a borough which never as a borough was liable in whole or in part to the county rate of its county, yet the Birmingham cases referred to by my brother Field seem to be a sufficient authority to overcome all such doubts, and our judgment must, therefore, be in favour of the claim by the county for a contribution by the borough. The rule will be absolute.

BLACKBURN, J.—I also think the rule must be absolute. It turns on the 117th section of the Municipal Act of 1835, which depends upon the previous law concerning county rates. At that time they were subject to the provisions of 12 Geo. 2, c. 29, which consolidated earlier Acts, and in the same way as before made the county rates payable by every town, parish, or place within the respective limits of the commissions of the justices at general or quarter sessions. The boroughs in each county which enjoyed charters with non-intromittant clauses were not subject to these county rates, but the exemption does not seem to have been due to any want of consideration in the way of benefit from the rates, but only from the fact that the justices of each county at quarter sessions had no commissions giving them jurisdiction to assess or levy rates in such boroughs. We may take it therefore that at the time of the passing of the municipal Act, every place in each county was liable to county rates, unless the county justices had no jurisdiction over it. Then by that Act provision is made concerning the payment of county rates by the three kinds of boroughs. The first kind, the old boroughs with quarter sessions and non-intromittant clauses, are to pay all their own rates, by sect. 92, and as before to be exempt from county rates; by sects. 111 and 112, no borough justices being at liberty by sect. 101, to act with respect to any rate in the nature of a county rate. Sect. 113 exempts assize expenses from this exemption, but the counties have no other claim upon the ancient boroughs of this kind. The other two kinds of boroughs are dealt with in a few words by sect. 117, which directs the treasurer of each county to keep an account of moneys received and expended for other purposes than the costs of offenders committed for trial in such county, and to send a copy of the said account to the council of every borough situate within such county, in which a separate court of quarter sessions of the peace shall be holden, and which, before 1832, was chargeable with or liable to contribute in whole or in part to the county rate of such county, and such borough is to pay its contribution. No borough is to be exempt under this section unless it has a separate court of quarter sessions, and also unless no part of it was liable to county rates before 1832. The expression "in whole or in part" cannot refer to the county rates, for it does not appear from any of the statutes, nor as a matter of fact, that any borough was liable to part of a rate; it can only refer to the area of the borough, so that all boroughs with courts of quarter sessions, to which some part was added from the counties in which they were situated by the Boundary Act, are still liable to contribute to the county rates for other purposes in respect of the additions made to them at that time. This is a provision of perfect justice and fairness, for it could not have been intended to deprive the counties without compensation of contribution which they had enjoyed before the Municipal Act was passed. It is clear to my mind that the intention of the Legislature, as evinced by the words of the statute, was to make such boroughs as this contribute to the county rates, and I am confirmed in that opinion by the case of Reg. v. Birmingham, which seems to be exactly in point. The rule, therefore, will be made absolute.

FIELD, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I have nothing to add.

Rule absolute.

By a Birkenhead Local Act of 1838, commissioners are required to cause all such parts of the streets, ways, or places, within the said township, not being public or common highways which are now in the estimation of the commissioners fully built upon, but not sufficiently paved or put in good condition, and all such streets, ways, or places as are now making or may hereafter be made within the said township, although not fully built upon, to be made, paved, and cleansed, as to the commissioners shall seem necessary; the expenses to be paid by the frontagers.

Defendant occupied a house in a street formed about seventeen years ago, and ever since used by the public.

Held, that defendant was liable to contribute to the making and sewerage of this street lately resolved upon by the commissioners.

17th July 1874.

The plaintiffs are constituted commissioners for the improvement of the township of Birkenhead under and by virtue of several Acts of Parliament, of which the several sections relied on by the plaintiffs are hereinafter set out.

By sect. 18 of 1 Vict. c. xxxiii., it is enacted that it shall be lawful for the said commissioners, and they are hereby required to cause all such parts of the streets, ways, roads, and passages or places within the said township, not being public or common highways, which are now in the estimation of the said commissioners fully built upon, but not sufficiently soughed, cleansed, paved, or otherwise put in good order and condition, and all such streets, ways, roads, passages, or places, as are now making, or may hereafter be made within the said township, or any part or parts thereof, although not fully built upon, to be made, soughed, paved, flagged, repaired, and cleansed with such soughs, gutters, sinks, common or main sewers, drains or water-courses, and with such materials and in such manner as to the said commissioners shall seem meet and necessary, and the charges and expenses attending the same shall be reimbursed to the said commissioners by the occupiers or persons in the actual possession, or by the immediate owners of the houses, building ground, or land within or on the respective sides of the said streets, ways, roads, passages, or places, so to be soughed, paved, flagged, repaired, and cleansed as aforesaid, or wherein such soughs, gutters, sinks, or common or main sewers, drains, or watercourses, shall be made, repaired and amended, scoured and cleansed as aforesaid, each such occupier or person in possession or owner paying a proportionable share thereof, such share to be ascertained by the said commissioners or their surveyor; and if any such occupier or person in possession or owner shall at any time refuse or neglect to pay such proportion of the said charges and expenses so to be ascertained as aforesaid, the same shall be levied by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of such occupier or persons in possession or owner, in like manner as the rates hereinafter directed and required to be raised and levied are authorised to be recovered, or shall and may be sued for and recovered, together with full costs of suit in any of Her Majesty's Courts of Record at Westminster.

By sect. 17 of the last mentioned Act it is enacted, "And be it further enacted, that where any streets, ways, roads, passages, or places already laid out or hereafter to be laid out within the said township, not being public or common highways, shall be well and sufficiently made, soughed, paved, flagged, or otherwise constructed, repaired, and put into good order, repair, and condition, in such manner and with such public drains therein as shall be satisfactory to the said commissioners, then and in such case, but not before, it shall be lawful for the said commissioners, upon the application of the owner or owners of the soil of such streets, ways, roads, passages, or places, or of the greater part in value of such owners, or of the person or persons liable to repair the same, or of the greater part in value of such persons, to declare such streets, ways, roads, passages, or places, to be public or common highways; and from and after such declaration made, the same and every of them shall be deemed and taken to be public and common highways to all intents and purposes, and thenceforth repaired and kept in repair by the said commissioners."

The defendant is the owner of some house property on one side of King-street aforesaid, which street is within the township of Birkenhead, and within the jurisdiction of the commissioners.

About seventeen years ago a Mr. Ball formed and constructed the said street, and at that time threw it open to the use of the public, and it has ever since been open to and without interruption used by the public.

In 1873 the commissioners resolved to make and sewer King-street in a proper and sufficient manner, and to apportion the cost thereof upon the several owners of the houses, buildings, and lands fronting to or on the sides of the said street. Notice of the intention of the commissioners to do the work was given to the defendant.

A contract was entered into for doing the work, and the works having been completed in due course, the cost was apportioned by the surveyor to the commissioners in the various frontages, the defendant being one of them.

On a demand made for payment the defendant refused to pay, and this action was brought for 50*l.*, the plaintiff having abandoned the excess of 5*s.* 6*d.*

There was no proof that any application under the 1st Vict. c. 33, s. 17, had ever been made to the commissioners to declare, or that the commissioners had ever declared the street to be a public or common highway, and it was thereupon contended by the attorney for the plaintiffs that it was a street for the southing, paving, flagging, and repairing of which the owners were personally liable under the 18th sect. of 1 Vict. c. 33.

The attorney for the defendant contended that the street, having been dedicated to the use of the public by Ball seventeen years ago, it became a common or public highway and therefore the plaintiffs had no power under sect. 18 of 1 Vict. c. 33, to do the work which they had done upon it, and to charge any portion of the expenses attending the same upon the defendant.

The County Court judge told the jury, and it was admitted by the defendant, that King-street had not been adopted as a public highway in the manner prescribed by 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 23 (The Highway Act), nor had an application been made to the Birkenhead commissioners by the owners to declare, nor had the commissioners declared such street to be a public highway in accordance with 1 Vict., c. 33, s. 17.

The said County Court judge left it to the jury to say whether when King-street was laid out Mr. Ball intended to dedicate it, though even for a single day, to the use of the public, and whether it had been used by the public ever since.

The jury answered the question in the affirmative, and the said County Court judge directed a verdict to be entered for the defendant.

The question for the opinion of the court of Queen's Bench is whether the said County Court judge was right in so directing the jury.

If he was right the verdict for the defendant is to stand.

If he was wrong the verdict is to be set aside and entered for the plaintiffs.

Gully, for appellants, the plaintiffs.—The question is whether the defendant, as a frontager, is liable for the pavement of King-street. There has been seventeen years user of the street by the public, but it was never declared a public or common highway by the commissioners under sect. 17 of the Act of 1838, nor is it a highway repaired by the inhabitants under sect. 23 of the Highway Act. It must, therefore, come within the description in sect. 18 of such streets or places "as are now making, or may hereafter be made within the said township." [He was stopped by the court].

Leojric Temple, Q. C., contra.—The words "not being public or common highways" which appear in the first clause of the 18th section apply to the subsequent parts of it, and must be read as describing such streets or places as may hereafter be made. In that case King-street clearly would not come within the provision of the 18th section.

BLACKBURN, J.—I think the County Court judge was right in everything except his construction of this 18th section. I think the words point clearly enough; first, to completely built streets, not then public or common highways; and secondly, to all such streets as were then making, or might thereafter be made, whether public or common highways, or not. This street has been made since the Act was passed, and therefore the paving is to be done by the frontagers. It is hard, no doubt, after the street has been made seventeen years, but there can be no doubt as to the meaning of the section.

FIELD, J.—I am of the same opinion.

MILE END OLD TOWN VESTRY v. WHITECHAPEL GUARDIANS.

Apportionment of paving expenses—One side of street—18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, s. 105—25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, s. 77.

The plaintiffs, acting under the Metropolis Management Acts, resolved that a portion (to wit), the eastern side of a certain new street should be paved throughout the whole length for a uniform breadth of 12ft., measured from the eastern boundary; and that the owners of the houses forming the eastern side should pay the estimated expenses. In an action against the defendants for contribution to these expenses, their workhouse being part of the eastern side of the street, it was stated in defence that there were houses and land on the western side; and it was replied that those houses and land did not bound or abut on any part of the street to be paved.

Held, upon demurrer to the reply, that the plaintiffs had no power to charge only the owners of one side of the street; and that the action could not be maintained.

This was a demurrer to the plaintiff's reply.

The statement of claim alleged that:

1. The plaintiffs under and by virtue of the statutes in that behalf made, on or about the 9th Dec. 1874, deemed it necessary and expedient that a portion (to wit) the eastern side of a certain new street within the said hamlet, and which was not paved to the satisfaction of the plaintiffs, should be so paved; and thereupon duly and according to the said statutes, resolved that the same be paved by them, the plaintiffs, throughout the whole length thereof for a uniform breadth of 12ft., measured from the eastern boundary thereof; and that the owners of the houses forming the eastern side of such street should be required to pay to the plaintiffs the estimated amount of the expenses of the said works, such amount to be determined by the surveyor of the plaintiffs, and when so determined to be apportioned among such owners; and the owners of the houses and the owners of the land to contribute to such estimated expenses in the same proportion, and the payment of such estimated expenses by such owners to be required, and, if necessary, enforced before the commencement, during the progress, or on the completion of the said works.

2. On or about 22nd Dec. 1874, the surveyor of the plaintiffs estimated the expenses of the said works at 243*l.* 17*s.* 9*d.*

3. On or about 23rd Dec. 1874, the plaintiffs apportioned the said estimated expenses amongst the owners of the houses and land bounding or abutting on the eastern side of the said street, as follows:—

“On the premises known as the warehouse belonging to the defendants (including the frontage of the private road belonging to them), 209*l.* 7*s.* 7*d.* On the house 626, Mile End-road, and the yard adjoining thereto, 34*l.* 10*s.* 2*d.*”

4. The plaintiffs afterwards caused the said work to be done, and the actual expenses thereof amounted to 210*l.* 11*s.* 4*d.*

5. The defendants at the times aforesaid were, and still are, the owners of the said workhouse and premises, being buildings and land abutting upon and bounding the eastern side of the said new street, and benefited by the said works, and the amount to be contributed by them towards the said expenses in respect thereof, was and is 181*l.* 0*s.* 3*d.*

6. The plaintiffs on or about the 8th June 1875, demanded of defendants payment of the said 181*l.* 0*s.* 3*d.*

7. All conditions have been fulfilled, and all times have elapsed necessary to entitle the plaintiffs to have the defendants pay the said 181*l.* 3*d.*

8. The defendants have not paid it.

The statement of defence alleged that:

1. At the time of the resolutions in the statement of claim mentioned and of the doing of the said work, there were and still are, on the western side of the said street, houses and land bounding and abutting thereon, the owners of which were and are by law liable to contribute to the expenses of the said work.

2. The plaintiffs have not apportioned the expenses of the said work, among the owners of the houses and land bounding and abutting on the said street, paved by the plaintiffs, as in the statement of claim mentioned, but have by the said resolutions, attempted illegally to throw upon the owners of houses and land bounding and abutting on the eastern side of the said street, the whole of the expenses of the said work.

The reply alleged that:

1. The plaintiffs deemed it necessary and expedient that part only of the said street should be paved, viz., the eastern side thereof, and did not deem it necessary or expedient that the western side of the said street should be paved, and did not deem it necessary or expedient to pave, and did not pave any part of the western side of the said street.

2. The houses and land bounding and abutting on the western side of the said street, and mentioned in the statement of the defence, did not nor did any or either of them or any part thereof bound or abut on any part of the said street which the plaintiffs deemed it necessary and expedient to pave, and which they paved as mentioned in the said statement of claim.

This reply was demurred to on the ground that the plaintiffs had no power by law to charge the owners with the expenses of paving one side of a street only.

Finlay (with him Day, Q. C.) argued for the defendant.—The Metropolis Management Acts do not authorise this claim for contribution. By sect. 105 of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, “in case the owners of the houses forming the greater part of any new street laid out or made, or hereafter to be laid out or made, which is not paved to the satisfaction of the vestry or district board of the parish or district in which such street is situate, be desirous of having the same paved, as hereinafter mentioned, or if such vestry or board deem it necessary or expedient that the same should be so paved, then and in either of such cases such vestry or board shall well and sufficiently pave the same, either throughout the whole breadth of the carriage way and footpaths thereof, or any part of such breadth, and from time to time keep such pavement in good and sufficient repair; and the owners of the houses forming such street shall on demand pay to such vestry or board the amount of the estimated expenses of providing and laying such pavement (such amount to be determined by the surveyor for the time being of the vestry or board.” This section was amended by sect. 77 of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, “Where any vestry or district board shall under the powers given by the 105th section of the firstly recited Act” (just referred to) “have paved or be about to pave any new street, the owners of the land bounding or abutting on such street shall be liable to contribute to the expenses or estimated expenses of paving the same as well as the owners of houses therein, provided that it shall be lawful for the vestry or district board to charge the owners of land in a less proportion than the owners of house property, should they deem it just and expedient so to do; and any such costs or expenses, including the cost of paving at the points of intersection of streets, and all other incidental costs and charges, shall be apportioned by the vestry or board, and shall be recoverable either before the work shall be commenced, or during its progress, or after its completion; and it shall be lawful for the vestry or district board at their discretion to accept payment of the amount apportioned or charged in respect of each house or premises by instalments spread over a period not exceeding twenty years, and any such amount shall be recoverable from the present or any future owner of the premises, either by action at law or in a summary manner before a justice of the peace, at the option of the vestry or board.” Sect. 112 adopts and extends the interpretation to the word “street,” contained in sect. 250 of the Act of 1855, and enacts that “the expression ‘new street’ shall apply to and include all streets hereafter to be formed or laid out, and a part of any such street, and also all streets, the maintenance of the paving and roadway whereof had not, previously to the passing of this Act, been taken into charge and assumed by the commissioners, trustees, surveyors, or other authorities having control of the pavements or highways in the parish or place in which such streets are situate, and a part of any such street, and also all streets partly formed or laid out.” There is no power in either of these statutes to charge the owners of one side of a street only: here there are houses on both sides. [BLACKBURN, J.—If there were no houses there would be owners of land who might be charged.] Certainly. The apportionment can only be made in pursuance of the statutes on the owners of houses and land forming such street.

Q.B. Div.]

REG. v. RAFFLES.

[Q.B. Div.]

Bazalgette (with him Philbrick, Q.C.) for the plaintiffs.—If a part only of the breadth of a street be paved, which may be clearly done by vestries under these Acts, it is only fair that those owners should pay who have the advantage of it. The reply states that the houses, the owners of which were not charged with this expense, did not bound or abut on any paved part of the street. The only case which can be cited as an authority against this exercise of the vestry's discretion in apportioning expenses of paving is distinguishable from the present. That case is Whitchurch v. Fullam Board of Works (L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 233), where the defendants passed the usual resolution to repair a road, but the surveyor divided the road into four sections, and apportioned the cost of repairing each section amongst the owners of property in each section respectively. It was held that there ought to have been but one apportionment on all the owners along the entire road; and that the separate apportionments were invalid, and could not be enforced. This, however, was on the ground that the whole road was ordered to be repaired, and the owners are by statute equally responsible along the whole piece to be repaired. Blackburn, J., said in his judgment, "If they (the District Board) had come to the conclusion that the first section only of this road should be paved at this time, they might, in all probability, have made an order to that effect." In that case they could not have apportioned the expenses upon the whole length of the road.

The defendants were not heard in reply.

BLACKBURN, J.—I agree with the plaintiffs that the case referred to has no bearing on the question we have to decide; but it is perfectly clear to my mind that, though the vestry have power to pave so much of the breadth of a street as they may think fit, yet they must apportion the amount of the estimated expenses amongst the owners of the houses forming such street, and the owners of the land bounding and abutting on such street. There is no power in either statute to charge only the houses and lands bounding the part paved; and if there be hardship sometimes in this mode of apportionment, the hardship in any other would probably be greater. I think the defendants have established their demurrer, and the action cannot be maintained.

REG. v. RAFFLES.

Licensed premises—Addition to house—Question of fact.

A licensed person added to his premises a sixth of his frontage and a new entrance. He was then summoned for selling intoxicating liquors on unlicensed premises. A magistrate dismissed the summons and refused to state a case.

Held, upon a rule for a mandamus directing a case to be stated, that under the circumstances the magistrate was right and was justified in his refusal.

This was a rule nisi for a mandamus to the stipendiary magistrate for Liverpool, directing him to state a case for the opinion of the court under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

A licence to sell intoxicating liquors was held by one Steadman, who resided at No. 1, Blundell-street, and his house had a frontage of 72ft. in that street. During his licence, in consequence of changes and local improvements, a vacant space or strip of land was left 12ft. wide along the side of his house, which was then a corner house. He purchased this piece of land, and began to extend his building so as to include it, and when taken in he thereby acquired an addition of 12ft. frontage in Blundell-street, and also a new entrance in the cross street called Jamaica-street. He was then summoned for selling liquors in a place which was unlicensed, the ground being that he had no right to add this new building to his existing premises, and that the licence did not cover the new part.

The magistrate held that though enlarged it was still substantially the same house and dismissed the summons. On being asked to state a case for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench he refused on the ground that it was a question of fact only which was for him to decide. This rule was obtained on behalf of the person who took out the summons in consequence of the magistrate's refusal.

Poland and Brenner showed cause against the rule.—It was entirely a question for the magistrate. A licensed person is not prevented from enlarging his premises; the only difficulty that could arise is when his licence is to be renewed, whether the premises were substantially the same, and that is a question of fact. If they were substantially the same he would ask for a renewal, if they were substantially different he would ask for a new licence.

Pope, Q.C. and Little supported the rule.—The licence extended only to the premises as they existed when the licence was granted, and the licence was restricted to that area. It is against the policy of the Act to extend such a right.

COCKBURN, C. J.—I think the rule ought to be discharged. The question whether the premises are the same or not is a question of fact for the magistrates; and though I do not mean to say that supposing the magistrates were clearly wrong—as for example where a man had a small house licensed, and he added on the whole of a street, and the magistrates said the premises still remained the same—this court would not review that decision. Still, unless in a case like that, where the magistrates are clearly wrong, we should not interfere. But in a case like the present, I think the magistrate was right. The licensed premises here were added to in a small proportion, so that it might be considered a mere accretion. When we look at the purpose of the Legislature we see it was to secure premises of sufficient value as a test of the character of the tenant. When a licence is granted for particular premises, it includes all that comes fairly within the denomination of improvements. Here for all practical purposes the premises remained the same.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. The Act provides for the means of preventing drunkenness, and as one of the means it assumes that the larger the house the less likelihood of its encouraging drunkenness. The question whether it remains the same house though additions have been made is for the justices within reasonable limits. If they decided something outrageous we might interfere. But when the alterations and additions do not destroy the identity as in this case, I see no ground for interference. It is a question of degree, and we must abide by the magistrate's decision.

REG. v. MYERS AND OTHERS (Justices of Edmonton).

Interested justices—Interest in litigation a sufficient ground of disqualification—30 & 31 Vict. c. 115.

Any substantial interest, such as being a litigant in a matter before the court, will disqualify a justice of the peace from acting, and if a justice so disqualified merely sits upon the bench, the order or conviction by his fellow justices will be quashed, although the disqualified justice may not have signed such order or conviction.

Legal proceedings had been taken by one local board against another in consequence of the discharge of sewage into the river Lea by H., who had contracted with one of the boards to take the sewage of its district for manuring his farm. H. having been summoned before justices for pollution of the river, the proceedings between the boards were suspended, by the mutual consent of their chairmen, until the result of the summons against H. could be seen. H. was ordered to pay a sum of money by a Bench upon which both such chairmen sat:

Held, that the order upon H. was bad.

This was a rule calling upon Mr. Myers and other justices of the peace for the borough of Edmonton to show cause why a certain order of the said justices should not be brought up on a certiorari and quashed, on the ground that the said justices, or some of them, were disqualified from acting as being interested parties.

It appeared that a Mr. Harrison occupied a farm in the parish of Edmonton, and that such farm abutted on the river Lea. Mr. Harrison had contracted with the Enfield Local Board to take the sewage of Enfield in order to manure his farm therewith, but not being able to take all the sewage upon his land had discharged a part of it into the river Lea. This led to proceedings being taken by the Edmonton Local Board against the Enfield Local Board, but such proceedings were suspended by the mutual consent of the chairmen of the two boards, for the following reason. Mr. Harrison had been summoned before the Edmonton justices, under the Lea Conservancy Act, for the offence of polluting the river, and it was deemed by the two chairmen to be a waste of money to proceed with the litigation between their boards until the result of the summons against Mr. Harrison should be seen. The result of that summons was that the Edmonton justices made an order—the order complained of—that Mr. Harrison should pay 10s. a day so long as he should continue to discharge sewage into the river. Of the justices who made this order one was Mr. Myers, the chairman of the Edmonton Local Board, and another, Mr. Nash, the chairman of the Enfield Local Board, but neither of them signed the order which was complained of.

MAG. CAS.—VOL. X.

Bealey, for the justices, now showed cause, and argued that the interest of the justices, if any, was not such as ought to make their proceedings bad. The recent statute, 30 & 31 Vict. c. 115, has removed the disqualification. This statute provides that "a justice of the peace shall not be incapable of acting on the trial of an offence arising under an act to be put in execution" by any local authority by reason only of "his being as one of several ratepayers, or one of any other class of persons liable in common with the others to contribute to or be benefited by any fund to the amount of which the penalty payable in respect of such offence is directed to be carried, or of which it will form part, or to contribute to any rate or expenses in diminution of which such penalty will go." [BLACKBURN, J.—That statute merely deals with a pecuniary interest, and leaves untouched an interest arising from the promoting of litigation.] Even if that be so, the mere possibility of bias is not enough to disqualify: (Reg. v. Rand, L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 230; 35 L. J. 157, M. C.) The following cases were also referred to:

Reg. v. Cheltenham Commissioners, 1 Q. B. 467;

Reg. v. Hertfordshire Justices, 6 Q. B. 753;

Wakefield Board of Health v. West Riding and Grimsby Railway Company, 35 L. J. 60, M. C.: 6 B. & S. 794; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 590.

Biron, in support of the rule, was not called upon.

BLACKBURN, J.—This rule must be made absolute. There is no doubt that Mr. Myers actually sat on the bench as justice, and was not present merely as a spectator. If he ought not to have acted, it was enough that he sat on the bench, although he may not have actually signed the conviction. Then comes the question: was he interested? Now in many cases it has been held that a pecuniary interest, however small, will disqualify a justice from acting. And in so far as the pecuniary interest arises from liability to a rate, the disqualification is removed by the Act 30 & 31 Vict. c. 115. But here we have no case of pecuniary interest. The alleged interest arises from Mr. Myers having been substantially a litigant under the circumstances detailed in Mr. Harrison's affidavit. I think that these facts show that Mr. Myers was substantially a litigant in a matter in which it was his interest, for the object of that litigation, that Mr. Harrison should be convicted. In Reg. v. Rand (ubi sup.) there was no pecuniary interest, and therefore the court was not bound to interfere, but the court in express terms declared that they must not be understood to say that they would not interfere in a case where there was a real bias, other than pecuniary. I think that the present is such a case. I think that, using the old phrase, Mr. Myers was sitting as judge in a matter where he was party, and that therefore the judgment in which he took part must be set aside.

BRIDGEN (app.) v. HEIGHES (resp.).

Licensing Act 1874, ss. 3 and 9—Closing premises—Adjoining shops for grocery and drapery—Premises open for the sale of liquor.

Q.B. Div.]

BRIGDEN (app.) v. HEIGHES (resp.).

[Q.B. Div.]

A licensed person for the sale of intoxicating liquors, not to be consumed on the premises, was also a grocer and draper. The liquors were kept and sold in the shop for groceries, which communicated with the drapery shop in the day time. He was convicted under sect. 9 of the Licensing Act 1874 of keeping his premises open for the sale of liquors during prohibited hours, although the drapery shop was the only part to which the public had access at the time, the grocery shop being entirely shut up.

Held that he was wrongly convicted; and that the penalty is imposed only in a case where the licensed person keeps his premises open for the purpose of selling liquors during prohibited hours. This was a case stated by two justices of Surrey under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, at the request of the appellant, whom the justices had convicted under 37 & 38 Vict. c. 49, s. 9.

James Brigden, of Cobham, in the county of Surrey, grocer, draper, and licensed dealer in wines and spirits, the defendant and appellant, appeared before two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace for the county of Surrey, sitting in petty session at Kingston-upon-Thames, in the said county, on Thursday, 24th June 1875, to answer an information laid against him by the respondent, who was the prosecutor, for that he, the above-named defendant, on the 12th June 1875, in the parish of Cobham, in the said county, being then and there a person duly licensed to sell intoxicating liquors by retail not to be consumed on the premises, did have his said premises open for the sale of intoxicating liquors at a time at which the said premises were directed by law to be closed, viz., after the hour of 10 o'clock at night.

At the hearing it was proved or admitted that the defendant lives in a house at the corner of East-street and Church-street, Cobham, and he has two shops, viz., a grocer's shop and a draper's shop which form part of his house, and both shops can be entered from the house at the back, besides the customers' entrance; and it was also admitted or proved that he carries on the several trades or business of a grocer and draper on his premises situate at Cobham aforesaid, and that he has a licence for the sale on such premises of wines and spirits not to be consumed on such premises.

The grocery business is carried on in a shop having an entrance for customers in Church-street. The drapery business is carried on in a shop having an entrance for customers in East-street. During the day there are means of egress and regress from the grocer's shop into the draper's shop, through openings leading from one shop to the other, but after 10 o'clock at night shutters or partitions are put up and all means of communication between the two shops, except through the house of defendant as before mentioned, is prevented.

As a rule the customers for grocery goods enter the grocer's shop from Church-street, and customers for drapery goods enter the draper's shop from East-street, but occasionally customers requiring both grocery and drapery goods pass from one shop to the other by means of the said internal communication until the grocery shop is closed at ten o'clock in the evening.

In the grocer's shop, where the wines and spirits are exposed for sale, notices are affixed that no wines or liquors will be supplied after ten o'clock p.m.

On the day named in the information, viz., the 12th June, the prosecutor, at 10.30 p.m., entered the defendant's drapery shop, which was then open for the sale of drapery goods, and informed the defendant that he would be summoned for having his premises open during prohibited hours, as he was bound to close the whole of his premises by ten o'clock p.m.

It was proved that before ten o'clock that night the grocer's shop had been shut and was in darkness, and that the openings between it and the draper's shop had been closed. No wines or spirits are sold or kept in the drapery shop, the same being kept in the grocery shop only. The defendant's sons serve the customers in the grocer's shop, and his daughters and assistants serve the customers in the drapery shop; but the defendant himself assists occasionally in serving customers in both shops.

Under these circumstances it was contended on behalf of the defendant that it had not been proved that the defendant had committed any offence against the 3rd section of 37 & 38 Vict. c. 49 under which the information had been laid, inasmuch as no wines or spirits were kept exposed for sale in the draper's shop, and that no evidence had been given to show that his premises, viz., the grocer's shop, had been kept open for the sale of wines or spirits during prohibited hours. The justices were of opinion, first, that the two shops, being part of the same premises and always open and accessible to one another through the back of the house, must be taken as one; and secondly, that a wooden partition open in the day time and closed at night was not a sufficient division to constitute the grocer's shop and draper's shop separate premises, and so exempt the defendant from the provisions of the 3rd section of 37 & 38 Vict. c. 49 with regard to the draper's shop; and they convicted the defendant of keeping his premises open for the sale of intoxicating liquors during prohibited hours and fined him the sum of 1s. and costs.

Manisty, Q.C. (with him Pearce) argued for the appellant.—The sections of the Licensing Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 49), which relate to this matter, are the 3rd and the 9th. The 3rd is the first of the sections under the heading "Hours of Closing," and it provides that "All premises in which intoxicating liquors are sold by retail shall be closed as follows, that is to say:" The 1st and 2nd sub-sections relate to premises within the metropolitan district, or within towns and populous places. "(3.) If situate elsewhere than in the metropolitan district or the metropolitan police district, or such towns or populous places as aforesaid," . . . "(c) On the nights of all other days [than Sunday] from ten o'clock until six o'clock on the following morning." By sect. 9, "Any person who, during the time at which premises for the sale of intoxicating liquors are directed to be closed by or in pursuance of this Act, sells or exposes for sale in such premises any intoxicating liquor, or opens or keeps open such premises for the sale of intoxicating liquors, or allows any intoxicating liquors, although purchased before the hours of closing, to be consumed in such premises—shall for the first offence be liable to a penalty not exceeding 10*l.* and for any subsequent offence to a penalty not exceeding 20*l.*" There is nothing in the Act which can be interpreted to impose a penalty for not shutting up licensed premises. The penalty is only for selling or exposing for sale, or keeping open for sale, or allowing the consumption of liquors after closing hours. This was a bona fide proceeding on the appellant's part, and he committed no offence.

Pugh, contra.—The justices have found that the premises were open for the sale of intoxicating liquors. [MELLOR, J.—Not at all; they merely find the facts and interpret the law to forbid them.] If there can be a doubt about it, the case should be remitted, in order that the justices may state more definitely the purpose for which the premises were open. [MELLOR, J.—It sufficiently appears that the only purpose was the sale of the drapery goods.] If these facts do not constitute a breach of the statute, it will be easy to evade the law. A publican might keep his tap closed and allow his customers to drink in adjoining premises. [FIELD, J.—That would clearly be subject to a penalty. MELLOR, J.—The mere connection of the premises cannot be sufficient. Even if the door were open, there must be either an actual drinking going on or something like an invitation to customers.] It must be remembered that here there could be no consumption on the premises, and any person buying drapery might easily ask for and carry away a bottle from the adjoining room. The sects. 3 and 9 ought to be read together, and the word "premises" must include every part occupied by the licensed person under the same roof.

Manisty, Q.C., was not heard in reply.

MELLOR, J.—I am of opinion that the justices have construed the statute erroneously, for though the 3rd section of the Act speaks of closing the premises, the offences are set out in the 9th section. I think the premises in which the liquor was sold were closed in this case. There may be a danger, and the justices assume that where one part of the premises is open the other parts may be easily got at, and if the justices had found as a fact that the appellant's shutting up of the grocery shop was a sham and merely colourable, I think it would be within the Act. But the justices do not find that that part of the premises in which the liquors are usually sold was really kept open for sale of liquor, though formally closed. They must find that in order to convict. The 3rd section, unless taken with the 9th section, amounts to nothing, for the conviction can only be under the 9th section. The justices do not say there was any evidence that liquor was sold on the premises after ten o'clock. They think the partition was not a sufficient separation, still they must have some evidence that the shutters are a sham. It is easy to see that a man may very reasonably have a separate part of his premises for selling liquors, and I see nothing in the Act to prevent this; and if it is capable, as in this case, of being shut up, and has sufficient indications that the business of selling liquors is bona fide concluded, I think the mere fact of another part of the premises, which is under the same roof but used for a different business, being left open, is immaterial. The object was to prevent the sale of liquor, and that was the reason why the door was to be closed, but the door may be opened for other purposes not connected with the sale of liquor. I therefore think the justices were wrong.

FIELD, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the mere fact of the drapery business being carried on under the same roof was immaterial.

MASPER AND WIFE v. BROWN.

Assault—Same cause of action—24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, sect. 45—Husband and wife—Bar to subsequent proceedings.

By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, sect. 45, it is enacted that "If any person, against whom any such complaint as in either of the last three preceding sections mentioned shall have been preferred by or on behalf of the party aggrieved, shall have obtained such certificate, or having been convicted shall have paid the full amount adjudged to be paid, or shall have suffered the imprisonment or imprisonment with hard labour awarded, in every such case he shall be released from all further or other proceedings, civil or criminal, for the same cause." A complaint within the said three sections, namely, of an assault upon the wife of the plaintiff, had, before the commencement of the present action, been preferred on behalf of the wife against the defendant, and he had been convicted, and had paid the whole amount imposed upon him by the justices before whom the complaint was heard.

Held, that such conviction and payment constituted a bar to an action brought by the husband for the consequential damages sustained by him in consequence of the assault upon his wife.

The words "same cause" in the section mean the same offence or assault, and not merely the same cause of action.

This was an action for damages. The first count of the declaration contained a claim by a husband and wife for damages for an assault committed by the defendant upon the wife; the second count contained a claim by the husband alone for the loss occasioned to him by the assault on his wife, viz., medical expenses, loss of his wife's comfort and services, &c. The plea, which so far as it was pleaded to the second count was demurred to, was substantially as follows:

That the trespass was an assault for which the defendant had been fined under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, and that he had paid the amount adjudged to be paid by him.

B. Henn Collins appeared in support of the demurrer.—The subject matter of the proceedings before the justices was the assault on the wife, which was the cause of action declared on in the first count, and not the loss to the husband, which was all that was sought to be recovered in the second count. The causes of action in the two counts are altogether different, the one claiming compensation for personal injuries, the other to be recouped money loss occasioned by the assault and by the personal injuries. The husband's ground of action is distinct from the wife's. The statute is one in restriction of common law rights, and must be construed strictly. The words of sect. 45 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, are: "If any person against whom any such complaint as in either of the last three preceding sections mentioned shall have been preferred by or on behalf of the party aggrieved, shall have obtained such certificate, or having been convicted, shall have paid the whole amount adjudged to be paid, or shall have suffered the imprisonment, or imprisonment with hard labour, awarded, in every such case, he shall be released from all further or other proceedings, civil or criminal, for the same cause." The conviction, therefore, and the payment of the fine imposed, is a bar to any proceeding only for the "same cause." In Hyde v. Scissor (Cro. Jac. 538), it is plain that the court regarded the claim for personal injury caused by the assault and the husband's claim for his own personal loss by being deprived of his wife, &c., as distinct causes of action. The case of Brockbank v. The Whitehaven Junction Railway (7 H. & N. 834; 31 L. J. 349, Ex.), too, shows that the claims constitute distinct causes of action.

No one appeared on behalf of the defendant.

LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—The 45th section of the Act 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, enacts that where a person has been convicted of certain offences and has paid the whole amount adjudged to be paid "he shall be released from all further proceedings civil or criminal, for the same cause," and the question is whether this action by the husband for the damages occasioned him by the assault on the wife is a proceeding for the same cause as that in respect of which the defendant was convicted and paid what it was adjudged that he should pay. In my opinion it is. The word "cause" means "assault" in the section, and this, which is the interpretation which follows from the plain and untechnical reading of the section in question, is fortified by a consideration of the language of sect. 1 of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 30, which is an Act in pari materid. It is an Act for the punishment of aggravated assaults upon women and children. The 1st section is as follows: "When any person shall be charged before two justices of the peace . . . with an assault upon any female whatever . . . it shall be lawful for the said justices or stipendiary magistrate, if the assault is of such an aggravated nature that it cannot in their or his opinion be sufficiently punished under the provisions of the statute 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, to proceed to hear and determine in a summary way, and if they shall find the same to be proved, to convict the person accused; and every offender so convicted shall be liable to . . . and such conviction shall be a bar to all future proceedings, civil or criminal, for, or in respect of the same assault. . . ." If, then, the defendant had been proceeded against under this last mentioned statute and convicted, it is quite clear that he would have been free from any such liability as that sought to be imposed upon him, so that, if the plaintiff's contention is right, a man who is convicted of an unaggravated assault upon a married woman is liable to be sued by her husband, whilst one who is convicted of an aggravated assault is not. This would indeed be an unfortunate result, but I think the words of this section as to aggravated assaults throw much light upon the proper mode of construing the section now before us. For these reasons, then, I am of opinion that the plea is good and affords a bar to the action.

DENMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. If the words of the section in question had been for the same cause of action, instead of, as they are, "for the same cause," I should have had some difficulty in dealing with the case. It seems as though the statute 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, on which the case of Vaughton v. Bradshaw (9 C. B., N. S., 103; 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 373; 30 L. J. 93, C. P.), was decided, was the foundation for the section which is now before us. At any rate it is clear that similar provisions are to be found in other statutes, and that there is nothing startling or unusual in the interpretation which we feel is to be put upon the section before us. The words "all further or other proceedings civil or criminal for the same cause" mean for the same matter, or thing, for the same act, or offence.

LINDLEY, J.—The only difficulty that I had in the case was this, the person is to be released from all further proceedings. Proceedings by whom does this mean? Is it merely from proceedings by the person assaulted, or from proceedings by any person? I think it means the latter, and, therefore, I agree that the judgment must be for the defendant.

DIVISIONAL COURT FOR APPEALS FROM INFERIOR COURTS.

(Before the FULL COURT.)

HOLLAND v. NORTHWICH HIGHWAY BOARD.

Anything done in pursuance of statute—Omission to repair—Action within three months—5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 109—25 & 26 Vict. c. 61, ss. 11 & 17.

Plaintiff, late in the evening, was crossing a bridge, from which the handrail had fallen into the brook below. He stretched out his hand to hold it, believing it to be in its usual place, fell over the bridge, and sustained injuries for which he sued the defendants in the County Court. Notice that the rail was unsafe had previously been given to the defendants, and it was repaired by them a few days after. The County Court judge nonsuited plaintiff on the ground that the action was not brought within three months, according to the Highway Act 1835, s. 109.

Held, that this omission to repair was something done in pursuance of or under the authority of that Act, and that the County Court Judge was right.

APPEAL from a judgment of the County Court of Cheshire holden at Congleton and Sandbach.

The defendants are constituted a board for the Hundred of Northwich under the provisions of the statute 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61.

The plaintiff's particulars of demand were as follows:

This action is brought to recover the sum of 50l. as damages for that you, the defendants, on or about the 8th April last, neglected your duty in not properly repairing and keeping in proper and substantial repair a certain public highway in the township of Betchton, in the parish of Sandbach, in the said county, and within your district, but allowed the same to become out of repair; to wit, the bridge over Dean Hill Brook, in the said township of Betchton aforesaid, and in not maintaining a handrail across and by the side of the said bridge as had been previously provided, by reason whereof the said bridge became dangerous to passengers, and the plaintiff fell in the said Dean Hill Brook, over which the said bridge is carried, and was seriously injured, and the plaintiff claims 50l.

Dated this 7th Oct. 1875.

THOMAS COOPER,
Town Hall passage, Congleton,
Plaintiff's Attorney.

To the defendants.

A notice of action, of which the following is a copy, was proved to have been duly served on day of date:

To the Highway Board for the District of the Hundred of Northwiock, in the City of Chester; to Mr. David Harding, their clerk, and Mr. Edward Massey, their surveyor:

You having, on or about the 8th April last, neglected your duty in not properly repairing and keeping in repair a certain highway in the township of Betchton, in the parish of Sandbach, in the said county, and within your district, but allowed the same to become out of repair, to wit, the bridge over Dean Hill Brook, in the said township of Betchton aforesaid, and in not maintaining a handrail across and by the side of the said bridge, as had been previously provided, by reason whereof the said bridge became dangerous to passengers, and William Pointon Holland, of Rougwood, in the said township, farmer, fell in the Dean Hill Brook, over which the said bridge is carried, and was seriously injured. I do, therefore, as the attorney of and for the said William Pointon Holland, in this behalf, and according to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, hereby give you notice that I shall at or soon after the expiration of one calendar month from the time of your being served with this notice, cause a summons to be issued out of Her Majesty's County Court of Cheshire, holden at Congleton and Sandbach, against you, or some or one of you, at the suit of the said William Pointon Holland, for the said neglect of duty, and shall proceed against you thereupon according to law.

Dated this 19th August 1875.

Yours, &c., THOMAS COOPER,
Town Hall Passage, Congleton,
Attorney for the said W. P. Holland.

The plaint was entered on the 7th Oct. last, and the summons was issued on the same day. The action was tried before Joseph St. John Yates, Esq., Judge of the said court, and a jury, on the 26th Oct. last.

It was in evidence for the plaintiff:

1. That the bridge over the Dean Hill Brook, in the particulars mentioned, was a public footbridge, with a handrail for the protection of passengers, and that it was repairable by the defendants as part of the public highway, under the provisions of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61.

2. That at some time before the date of the accident hereinafter described, the topmost bar of the said handrail, which had become rotten and unsafe from natural decay, fell away from the post to which it had been fastened, and dropped into the brook.

3. That late in the evening of the 8th April last (it being very dark), the plaintiff, who was crossing the said bridge, and did not know that the bar or rail was missing, stretched out his hand to take hold of it, and in so doing lost his balance and fell into the brook, whereby he sustained the injuries in respect of which the action was brought.

4. That on the 25th March next before the day of the accident the surveyor employed by the defendants to take charge of the district was told that the said handrail was rotten and unsafe.

5. That within a few days after the accident the defendants repaired it.

The defendants did not deny that the accident had happened in the manner stated, and they called no witnesses. But their solicitor contended that the action was not maintainable:

1. Because it had not been commenced within the time limited by 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50.

2. That the defendants, who were subject to the same responsibilities only as a surveyor appointed under that Act, were not liable in an action founded upon neglect to repair.

The counsel for the plaintiff replied:

1. That the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, had no application.

2. That in having failed to repair the handrail after notice of its rotten and dangerous condition, the defendants were guilty of wilful negligence amounting to misfeasance.

The County Court judge held, first, that the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61, must be read together, and that the action was too late; secondly, that upon the evidence the action could not be maintained. But to save the expense of a second trial, the said judge consented to take the opinion of the jury upon the following questions:

1. Had the defendants, through their surveyor, on the 25th March 1875 next before the accident notice that the rail of the bridge which afterwards fell into the brook was rotten or unsafe?

2. Did they neglect to repair it within a reasonable time after such notice?

The jury answered both questions in the affirmative, and assessed the damages contingently at 25l.

The said judge directed the verdict to be entered for the defendants, and the plaintiff gave notice of appeal.

The questions for the opinion of the court are:

1. Whether the action was brought in time?
2. Whether upon the evidence it was maintainable?

If the court should answer both questions in the affirmative, the verdict for the defendants was to be set aside, and a verdict entered for the plaintiff with damages 25l.

Otherwise the verdict for the defendants to stand.

Dunn argued for the plaintiff, the appellant.—The words of the limitation to this action, as the defendants contend, are "That no action or suit shall be commenced against any person for anything done in pursuance of or under the authority of this Act until twenty-one days' notice has been given thereof in writing to the justice, surveyor, or person against whom such action is intended to be brought, nor after sufficient satisfaction, or tender of satisfaction, has been made to the party aggrieved, nor after three calendar months next after the fact committed for which such action or suit shall be so brought" (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 109). Amongst the consequences of formation of a highway district (25 & 26 Vict. c. 61, s. 11), "All such powers, rights, duties, liabilities, capacities and incapacities (except the power of making, assessing, and levying highway rates) as are vested in or attached to, or would but for this Act have become vested in or attached to, any surveyor or surveyors of any parish forming part of the district, shall vest in and attach to the highway board." The question arises whether what was proved in this case was "anything done in pursuance of or under the authority of" these Acts. If it was not so, there was no three months' limitation, and on the first point the plaintiff was right. The first case on the subject seems to be Umphelby v. McLean (1 B. & Ald. 42), which was decided on the words of 43 Geo. 3, c. 92, s. 70,

MORANT (app.) v. TAYLOR (resp.).

that no writ or process shall be sued out for anything done in pursuance of that Act, till after a month's notice. The action was for an excessive distress for arrears of taxes, and it was held that the defendants were not entitled to notice. The same point was raised but not decided in Partridge v. Elkington (L. Rep. 6 Q.B. 82). Mere acts of omission are not things done in pursuance of or under the authority of a statute. There are two cases which at first sight do not seem to agree with this distinction, but it must be remembered that they were both decided upon sect. 139 of the Public Health Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63), the words of which are that no writ shall be sued out against a local board "for anything done, or intended to be done, under the provisions of this Act," until the expiration of a month after notice in writing. In Wilson v. Mayor of Halifax (L. Rep. 3 Ex. 114) the defendants left a goit unfenced, into which the plaintiff's husband fell, and was killed. In Jolliffe v. Wallasey Local Board (L. Rep. 9 C. P. 62) the defendants were guilty of negligence in not placing a buoy of sufficient size and dimensions over an anchor which caused the plaintiff's damage, to resist the current of the tides, and to indicate the position of the anchor below. These were both held to be acts intended to be done under the provisions of the Public Health Act, and the defendants were therefore entitled to notice of action: but it was not said that acts of omission of that kind would come within such words as those used in this Highway Act.

Before proceeding to the second question reserved by the case the Court called upon the other side to argue on the first question.

Coxon for the defendants.—The two last cases cited are sufficient authority that this action should have been brought within three months after the fact committed, according to the Highway Act 1835, s. 109. By the 17th section of the subsequent Highway Act 1862, "The highway board shall maintain in good repair the highways within their district, and shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, as respects the highways in each parish within their district, perform the same duties, have the same powers, and be liable to the same legal proceedings as the surveyor of such parish would have performed, had, and been liable to, if this Act had not passed."

Dunn in reply.—The object of the statute was here obtained, for a month's written notice was given before action.

CLEASBY, B.—We need not hear any arguments on the second question reserved by the County Court judge, for we are satisfied that he was right on the first. We consider that the case of Wilson v. Mayor of Halifax in the year 1868 is an authority we are not entitled to set aside, and it would be inconvenient to decide this matter so as to throw the law which has been so long established into confusion. The only question for us is whether that authority is in point so as to be applicable to this case. It was decided upon the words "for anything done or intended to be done under the provisions of this Act;" the words upon which this case depends being "for anything done in pursuance of or under the authority of this Act." The distinction suggested is that the latter words do not cover acts of omission which are necessarily included in the former. I cannot myself, however, see any distinction between them. This is a very useful legislation for the protection of public bodies by compelling actions to be brought within reasonable time, and by giving them an opportunity for tendering amends. We are not anxious to limit its effect, and we feel that Wilson v. Mayor of Halifax is in point. The judgment will, therefore, be affirmed.

GROVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. There are two objects in thus protecting public bodies: one that there may be no delay, the other that the defendants may tender amends before action brought. These reasons apply equally to acts of omission or commission, and I do not see why they should be distinguished. Moreover, the cases of Wilson v. Mayor of Halifax and Jolliffe v. Wallasey Local Board are, to my mind, fully in point. The words there are "anything done or intended to be done;" but nothing has been said or cited to make the decision distinguishable from what it should be upon the words in the Highway Act. In both the cases mentioned the acts done were acts of omission; I think this statute applies equally, whatever be the nature of the thing done, and we are also bound by these authorities.

FIELD, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question shortly is whether the omission to repair this railing can be properly said to be anything done in pursuance or under the authority of these Highway Acts. I fully concur in the desirability of not limiting the effect of these statutory protections of public bodies. In Wilson v. Mayor of Halifax there was an omission like this, but the Exchequer held that the result was the same as if the defendants had actively done something in pursuance of the Act. We are bound by that decision, and I do not desire to dissent from it. There would be great confusion if we distinguished the present case from that.

Order for payment of money or otherwise—Demolition of building—11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, ss. 1, 11, 17, 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51, s. 22.

By the Leeds Improvement Act 1869, sect. 22, in case any building be made or begun without, or not in accordance with, the consent of the corporation, a justice may, upon complaint and summons, make an order in writing on the owner, occupier, or builder summoned, directing the demolition of the building.

Held, upon a case stated, that this was an "order for the payment of money or otherwise," within the application of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43 (Jervis's Act), and that the complaint must, under the 11th section, be made within six calendar months from the time when the matter of such complaint arose.

AFTER the hearing and determination by W. Bruce, Esq., stipendiary magistrate for the Borough of Leeds, of a complaint made on the 22nd Oct. 1875, by Alfred William Morant, engineer and surveyor of the borough of Leeds acting as agent for and on behalf of the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of Leeds, the said magistrate having dismissed the said complaint, the said Alfred William Morant being dissatisfied with the said determination as being erroneous in point of law, did, within three days after the said hearing and determination, apply to the said magistrate in writing to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and grounds of such determination for the opinion thereon of the Queen's Bench division of Her Majesty's High Court of Justice, and in pursuance thereof the said magistrate stated and signed the following case.

On the 22nd Oct. 1875, the said Alfred William Morant, the engineer and surveyor of the borough of Leeds, acting as agent for and on behalf of the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses, made a complaint against the said Henry Taylor of his having made a building contrary to a certain requirement by the corporation of the borough, and thereby infringed the provisions of sect. 22 of the Leeds Improvement Act 1869.

Sect. 22 of "The Leeds Improvement Act 1869." is in the following terms:—

In case any building be made or begun without, or not in accordance with, the consent of the corporation, where their consent is by this or any of the recited Acts required, or contrary to any requirement by the corporation, made in accordance with the provisions of such Acts, the corporation may make complaint thereof before a justice, who shall thereupon issue a summons requiring the owner or occupier of the premises, or the builder or person engaged on the work, to appear at a place and time stated in the summons, to answer the complaint; and if at the time and place appointed in the summons, and whether the persons summoned appear or not, the complaint be proved to the satisfaction of the justice before whom it is heard, the justice shall make an order in writing on the person summoned directing the demolition, within such time as the justice deems reasonable, of the house, building, erection, or addition, or so much thereof as is made otherwise than in accordance with the consent or contrary to the requirement of the corporation, and also directing payment of the costs up to and including the costs of the order.

The said Henry Taylor was the owner of three houses, which were built contrary to a requirement by the corporation, duly made in accordance with the provisions (of the Acts referred to) in sect. 22 of "The Leeds Improvement Act 1869."

The said houses were completed more than six months before the 22nd Oct. 1875, the day on which the said Alfred William Morant made his complaint; and having been so completed, remained in the same state down to and including the day of the said complaint.

The said magistrate dismissed the complaint on the ground that such complaint came within 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 1., and therefore under sect. 11 of that statute, ought to have been laid within six calendar months of the day when the building of the said houses was completed.

The question upon which the opinion of the Court was desired was whether the said magistrate was right in dismissing the complaint upon the ground above stated. If he was right his order was to stand; if he was wrong, then he respectfully desired that the case might be remitted to him in order that he might further hear and determine the matter of the complaint.

Maule, Q.C., with him Tennant, argued for the appellant, the engineer of the corporation.—By the 1st section of Jervis's Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), the proceedings before justices, as provided by that Act, are to be applied to all cases where an information shall be laid of any offence or act for which the person committing it is liable by law to a summary conviction for the same, "and also in all cases where a complaint shall be made to any such justice or justices upon which he or they have, or shall have, authority by law to make any order for the payment of money or otherwise." The latter cases are described by the same words in sect. 8: "That in all cases of complaints upon which a justice or justices of the peace may make an order for the payment of money or otherwise, it shall not be necessary that such complaint shall be in writing." Then by sect. 11: "That in all cases where no time is already, or shall hereafter be specially limited for making any such complaint, or laying any such information in the Act or Acts of Parliament relating to each particular case, such complaint shall be made, and such information shall be laid, within six calendar months from the time when the matter of such complaint or information respectively arose." Sect. 17 directs that the forms of convictions and orders contained in the schedule shall be used when no other form is given in the Statute authorising a summary remedy. There are only three forms of order (K 1) (K 2) (K 3)—the first two for payment of money; the last is headed "Order for any other matter where the disobeying of it is punishable with imprisonment." Such an order as this, therefore, is not contemplated by the Act at all. The Court of Queen's Bench held, in Reg. v. Hannay (44 L. J. 27, M. C.), that the adjudication of two justices under sect. 22 of the Lands Clauses Act is not an order for the payment of money or otherwise within Jervis's Act; and the judges expressed doubts whether Re Edmundson (17 Q. B. 67), was right in deciding that a settlement of the amount of compensation under sect. 24 of the same Act was subject to the six months' limitation. The Vestry of Bermondsey v. Johnson (L. Rep. 8 C. P. 441) was decided upon a clause of limitation of the Metropolis Amendment Act 1862, sect. 107, which enacts "that no person shall be liable for the payment of any penalty or forfeiture under" that Act, "unless the complaint respecting such offence have been made before such justice within six months next after the commission or discovery of such offence." The summons charged the defendant with unlawfully erecting a certain building beyond the general line of buildings in the street, contrary to sect. 75 of that Act. The court held that the limitation did not apply to an order for the demolition of such a building, but only to the payment of any penalty or forfeiture. [FIELD, J.—Sect. 11 of Jervis's Act was not referred to, and perhaps it would not be applicable where an express limitation is given by the statute.] The Judges of the Common Pleas treated the assumption of Malins, V.C., in Brutton v. St. George, Hanover-square (L. Rep. 13 Eq. 339) as a mere dictum not necessary for his decision. The issue of a warrant of distress for recovery of unpaid rates has been held not to be an order within Jervis's Act: (Sweetman v. Guest, L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 262).

Forbes for respondent. — The case of Reg. v. Hannay is beside this case, because it was no order at all. [CLEASBY, B.—So it has struck me.] In the Vestry of Bermondsey v. Johnson there was no counsel for the respondent, and attention was not called to this 11th section of Jervis's Act. Unless the limitation of that section applies to this order, there can be none whatever to an order of demolition under this local Act. It would be a breach of a public statute, and no prescription could save the owner of a building made without or not in accordance with the consent of the Leeds corporation. With the interpretation contended for by the other side, no force whatever can be given to the words "or otherwise." They are not merely et cetera, which would refer to matters only of the same kind as those previously expressed, but they have no limit, and include all orders, other than those for payment, which justices can make. It is admitted that if the local Act provided imprisonment in default of obedience to this order of demolition, it would be included under (K. 3) as an order within Jervis's Act; but that admission destroys the argument of ejusdem generis upon which the appellant has relied. The words of the latter part of section 17 do not limit the application of the Act to those orders for which forms are given in the schedule.

MORANT (app.) v. TAYLOR (resp.).

[DIV. APP.]

Maule, Q.C. in reply.—It is no argument that hardship would be the result of the opposite contention.

CLEASBY, B.—We are all of opinion that the magistrate was right in dismissing this summons, on the ground that the complaint was not made within the time required by the 11th section of Jervis's Act. Sect. 22 of the Leeds Improvement Act 1869, provides that, in certain cases, if any building be made or begun without consent, the corporation may make complaint thereof, and upon a summons a justice may make an order in writing on the person summoned, directing the demolition of the building. The question for us is whether an order made in pursuance of this section would be an order within the application of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, so that the complaint, upon which to base it, must be made within six months from the time when the matter of such complaint arose, as provided by the 11th section of that Act. I have been greatly impressed with the decision of Malins, V.C., in Brutton v. St. George, Hanover-square (L. Rep. 13 Eq. 339), with respect to a similar order of demolition. There the words describing the orders to which the limitation was applicable are not so extensive as the words in Jervis's Act: "No person shall be liable for the payment of any penalty or forfeiture under the recited Acts or this Act, or any bye-law made by virtue thereof, for any offence made cognisable before a justice, unless the complaint respecting such offence shall have been made before such justice within six months next after the commission or discovery of such offence." The Vice-Chancellor does not seem to have doubted that the order for demolition came within that provision, and if he was right, such an order would be clearly subject to Jervis's Act. It is better, however, to decide upon the terms of the statute with regard to the subject matter before us. The 1st section relates to convictions, and also to all cases where a complaint shall be made upon which the justice has or shall have authority by law to make any order for the payment of money or otherwise. Now it is said that this means only an order ejusdem generis with one for payment of money, and cannot apply to an order like this for the demolition of a building. But that is not so. The words themselves do not imply such limitation, and it appears from the 17th section that the Act contemplated other orders than for payment only. That section distinguishes between the forms of convictions and orders, and amongst others adopts a form in the schedule (K 3) which is not an order for payment of money. Nothing could be more reasonable than to require a complaint to be made within six months where so extensive a power is given to a justice, and I am satisfied that Jervis's Act was intended to apply to all such orders as that which the magistrate here refused to make. His judgment will be affirmed.

GROVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. Certainly, on first looking at the words alone, without considering the rest of the Act, I was inclined to interpret the expression "any order for the payment of money or otherwise," by the rule of construction known as ejusdem generis. But looking at the scope of the whole statute I do not see any difficulty in holding that an order for the demolition of a building should come within that description. The preamble mentions summary convictions and orders, and makes no exception. The 17th section gives forms, as contained in the schedule, for different kinds of convictions and orders, and contemplates no kind of order to which it does not relate. So sect. 18 gives justices power to allow costs in all cases of summary convictions or of orders. Further, the schedule actually contains a form of order for any other matter than payment of money; and although that particular form is applicable only when the disobeying of the order is punishable with imprisonment, yet it is sufficient to show that orders under that Act are not limited to orders for the payment of money. I think the magistrate was right.

FIELD, J.—I also am of opinion that the magistrate was right. The question before us is whether a complaint under sect. 22 of the Leeds Improvement Act, is to be made in six months as required by sect. 11 of Jervis's Act. It must be so if the order applied for is, in the words of the 1st section, an order for the payment of money or otherwise. Upon this arises the contention whether the rule of construction ejusdem generis is to prevail in interpreting the words "or otherwise." I think not, and not only for the reasons which have been given, but I rely also much upon the argument a convenienti. It is highly desirable that there should be some limit to the time in which such an order is possible, and unless the 11th section of Jervis's Act applies no limitation of any kind exists.

Poaching—Ground used for keeping rabbits—9 Geo. 4, c. 69, s. 1—24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 27.

Appellant was caught with rabbits at night in a field forming part of a farm over which the respondent had the right of sporting.

The justices found as a fact that this field was not a warren or ground used for the breeding or keeping of hares or rabbits, within the 17th section of the Larceny Act 1856, and convicted the appellant of night poaching under 9 Geo. 4, c. 69, s. 1.

Held, upon a case stated, that it was a question of fact whether a place was within this description; and that upon this finding the conviction was right.

THIS was a case stated by two justices of the peace in and for the county of Brecon, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, on the application in writing by the appellant, who was dissatisfied with the said justices' determination, upon the question of law which arose before them as hereinafter stated on the 11th Dec. 1875, at Brecon, in the said county.

Upon the hearing of a certain information preferred by the respondent against the appellant under sect. 1 of the Act 9 Geo. 4, c. 69, it was charged that he, the said appellant on the 29th Sept. 1875, about the hour of three in the morning of the same day, at the parish of St. David Upper, in the said county of Brecon, unlawfully did take five rabbits in a certain close of land in the occupation of John Lloyd, Esq., there situate; the said justices convicted the said appellant of the said offence, and adjudged him for his said offence to be imprisoned in the common gaol at Brecon, in the said county of Brecon, and there kept to hard labour for the period of three calendar months; and at the expiration of such period to find sureties by recognizances, himself in the sum of 10*l.* and two sureties in the sum of 5*l.* each, or one surety in the sum of 10*l.*, conditioned that he, the said appellant, should not so offend again for the space of one year next following; and they further adjudged that the said appellant, in case he should not find such sureties as aforesaid, should be further imprisoned in the said common gaol, and there kept to hard labour for the space of six calendar months, unless such sureties should be sooner found.

The following facts were either proved before the said justices or admitted by both parties.

The respondent, Charles Hopkinson, a keeper in the employ of Major Thomas Conway Lloyd, of Dinas, while watching, in company with another man, about three o'clock in the morning of the 29th Sept. 1875, heard the squeal of rabbits, and upon going in the direction from whence the sound came, he discovered Wm. Bevan, the appellant (and another person named Thomas Davies, who was convicted on the 2nd Oct. last) coming towards them with a dog, some nets, a sack, and a bundle of five rabbits, and a bludgeon each, there being also seven other rabbits lying dead in the direction the appellant and his companion were going.

The field whence the squealing of the rabbits proceeded, and where the appellant was found, is not a warren or ground used for the breeding or keeping of hares or rabbits, but is part of a farm on the Dinas estate, over which Major Lloyd has the right of sporting.

The respondent, on coming up to the appellant and his companion, called upon them to surrender, which they declined to do, and threatened to knock the respondents' brains out if they approached them.

The appellant and his companion then retreated, and the respondent and his fellow watcher followed them and succeeded in capturing the appellant's companion; but the appellant, after a desperate struggle with the respondent, effected his escape, leaving his nets, the rabbits, and bludgeon behind him.

The appellant absconded, and a warrant was issued for his apprehension, and he afterwards surrendered himself on the 10th Dec.

On the hearing of the case no previous conviction was proved or alleged against the appellant.

On the part of the appellant it was contended that the statute of 9 Geo. 4, c. 69, s. 1 was repealed by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 17; and that, therefore, he could not be summarily convicted, but that he should be committed for trial at the sessions.

On the part of the respondent it was contended that 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 17, was confined to offences committed in warrens or grounds used for the breeding of hares or rabbits, and that, therefore, it did not repeal 9 Geo. 4, c. 69, s. 1, which referred to offences committed on any land other than warrens, &c.

The said justices, however, being of opinion that the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 17, referred to warrens or ground used expressly for the breeding of hares or rabbits, and that it did not repeal 9 Geo. 4, c. 69, s. 1, but merely limited its application so far as warrens or ground used expressly for the breeding of hares or rabbits are concerned, gave their determination against the appellant in the manner before stated.

The question of law upon which this case is stated for the opinion of the court therefore is whether 9 Geo. 4, c. 69, s. 1, is repealed by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 17, as far as land not being a warren or ground used for the purpose of breeding hares or rabbits is concerned.

J. Paterson argued for the appellant.—By the 1st section of 9 Geo. 4, c. 69, it is enacted that "if any person shall, after the passing of this Act, by night, unlawfully take or destroy any game or rabbits in any land, whether open or inclosed, or shall, by night, unlawfully enter or be in any land, whether open or enclosed, with any gun, net, engine, or other instrument, for the purpose of taking or destroying game, such offender shall, upon conviction thereof, before two justices of the peace, be committed for the first offence to the common gaol or house of correction, for any period not exceeding three calendar months, there to be kept to hard labour, and at the expiration of such period shall find sureties by recognisance, or in Scotland by bond of caution, himself in 10*l.*, and two sureties in 5*l.* each, or one surety in 10*l.*, for his not so offending again for the space of one year next following." This provision must be impliedly repealed if the enactment contained in the Larceny Act 1851 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96), sect. 17 of which covers the same offences. "Whosoever shall unlawfully and wilfully, between the expiration of the first hour after sunset, and the beginning of the last hour before sunrise, take or kill any hare or rabbit in any warren or ground lawfully used for the breeding or keeping of hares or rabbits, whether the same be inclosed or not, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor." It cannot be said that this field was not ground lawfully used for the breeding or keeping of hares or rabbits; the justices have decided that this section of the Larceny Act applies only to warrens on ground used expressly for the breeding of hares or rabbits; but the word "expressly" does not occur in the section, and warrens do not exist for hares. If the word "ground" has any signification, it must be the same as "land" mentioned in the earlier Act, that is wherever rabbits or hares can be found. [CLEASBY, B.—The word "ground" must mean something ejusdem generis with "warrens," as for instance, places where hares are preserved. The fact of this provision being contained in a Larceny Act confirms the view that the section can relate only to a species of property.] A field may surely be included in "any warren or ground lawfully used for the breeding or keeping of hares or rabbits, whether the same be enclosed or not."

Mellor, Q.C., appeared for the respondent, but was not heard.

CLEASBY, B.—I have very little doubt that this man must have been acquitted, if he had been indicted under sect. 17 of the Larceny Act. It must, however, be a question of fact in each case how far the ground upon which poachers are caught is used for breeding or keeping hares or rabbits. Here the justices have found conclusively as a fact that this field is not a warren or ground used for this purpose; and that being so, no question of law arises. Whether an open field like this was intended by the Legislature to be included in this section we need not consider, but it is a fair inference from the enactment forming part of a larceny Act that it relates only to what is sub modo property. This may be some justification for the finding of fact that this place was not a warren or ground treated of by the 17th section. The appeal must be dismissed.

GROVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The statement in the case is conclusive, but if it had not been for the express finding of fact against the appellant, I should have found great difficulty in determining that a field, in a farm on which there are rabbits and hares, is not ground used for breeding or keeping rabbits.

FIELD, J.—I am of the same opinion.

GREGSON v. WATSON.

Employers and Workmen Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 90) s. 4—Weekly hiring—Forfeiture on the ground of absence—Claim for wages due.

Plaintiff, a factory winder, was paid every Saturday for the number of sets she had wound off during the week ending on the preceding Wednesday; one of the rules of the defendants' factory, in which she worked, was that fourteen days' notice in writing was required previous to leaving their employment, such notice to be given on a Thursday; and all persons leaving without notice would forfeit the whole of the wages to which they would otherwise have been entitled, and also render themselves liable to be proceeded against according to law.

The plaintiff earned 3s. 7d. on the first two days of one week of her employment, was absent with leave on the Saturday, did not return, and wholly left the defendant's service, without leave or notice, on Monday. In an action for 3s. 7d. earned, the County Court judge held that the plaintiff's was a weekly hiring, and that, although the defendant's damage by reason of plaintiff's absence was only 3s., the plaintiff could not recover anything under sect. 11 of the Employers and Workmen Act 1875. Held, upon appeal that, notwithstanding the fortnight's notice required, the facts justified the finding that the service was weekly; that the plaintiff had no claim for wages or other sum due for work done; and that the County Court Judge was right.

APPEAL from the County Court of Lancashire, holden at Blackburn by W. A. Hulton, Esq., judge thereof;

This was an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendants to recover certain wages alleged to be due to the plaintiff under the following circumstances.

The defendants are the owners of a cotton factory at Oswaldtwisle, and the plaintiff, who was a woman subject to the provisions of the Factory Acts, 1833 to 1874, was employed by and worked for the defendants in the said factory as a winder.

The wages of winders in the said factory generally are regulated by the number of sets, that is to say, of cans of twist which each winder has wound off during the week, beginning on the Thursday morning in the one week and ending on the Wednesday night in the succeeding week. Each set has an ascertained weight, and is of a known value, and the weight is booked by the warehouseman both in the "tally" book of the winder, and in the books of the employer on the delivery of each set. The amount of wages is then ascertained on the Wednesday night in each week, and is paid on the Saturday following.

The plaintiff worked under certain rules, and they formed part of the contract of hiring and service, and employment between the plaintiff and defendant.

On Wednesday, the 10th Nov. last, the plaintiff's wages were duly ascertained, and were paid to her on the Saturday following.

On Thursday the 11th Nov. the plaintiff began another week of her service and employment. She worked as usual during that day, and during Friday, the 12th Nov., and it was admitted that the value of the work done by her on those days amounted to the sum of 3s. 7d.

On Saturday the 13th Nov. she was absent from her work, but the plaintiff had obtained from the defendants leave of absence for that day. On Monday, the 15th Nov. the plaintiff did not return to her employment, and wholly left the service of the defendants, and on Tuesday, the 16th, the defendants obtained the service of another winder in the stead and place of the plaintiff.

The plaintiff demanded payment of her wages, and it was admitted that the sum of 3s. 7d. was the value of the work done by the plaintiff on the 11th and 12th Nov., but the defendants refused to pay, and this action has been brought to recover it.

It was contended on behalf of the plaintiff that the case came within the meaning of the statute 38 & 39 Vict. c. 90 (The Employers and Workmen Act, 1875) s. 11, by which it is enacted that, "In the case of a child, young person, or woman, subject to the provisions of the Factory Acts, 1833 to 1874, any forfeiture on the ground of absence or leaving work, shall not be deducted from or set off against a claim for wages or other sum due for work done before such absence or leaving work, except to the amount of the damage (if any) which the employer may have sustained by reason of such absence or leaving work."

It was contended on behalf of the plaintiff that it was the intention of the Legislature to prevent the wages of women and children from being forfeited; and that the said Act was intended to supersede any rules that might be made by a master.

The said County Court judge dissented from that argument, and he found, under the circumstances and facts above stated,—

That the engagement and hiring of the plaintiff was a weekly hiring and engagement, beginning on the Thursday morning in each week, and ending on the Wednesday night in the succeeding week.

That, by the default of the plaintiff, the hiring of the plaintiff on the 11th Nov. last was never completed, and that any sum of money for the value of the work done by her on the 11th and 12th days of Nov., was not payable to the plaintiff by reason of her leaving her said employment on Monday the 15th Nov., and not completing her said term of service.

That the said enactment did not apply to the present case, as the defendants claimed neither a deduction nor a set off against a claim for wages or other sum due for work done, as no sum was shown to have been due to the plaintiff; and that the forfeiture spoken of in the statute was for a temporary absence or leaving work, and did not apply to a total rescission of contract by leaving the same before the term of service was completed.

The said County Court Judge, therefore, directed the verdict to be entered for the defendants.

But at the request of the plaintiff, and thinking it reasonable and proper that the same should be allowed, he gave permission to the plaintiff to appeal against his said decision.

And he assessed the damages which the employers, the defendants, aforesaid, had sustained by reason of the plaintiff's absence and leaving work as aforesaid, that is to say, from the Monday morning until the Tuesday following, when the defendants obtained the assistance of another winder in the stead of the plaintiff, at the sum of 3s.

Notice of appeal was given on the grounds following:

1. That the plaintiff, being paid by piece work, her wages accrued on the completion of each set, and at the time she left, 3s. 7d. was due to her.

2. That the engagement by piecework did not constitute a weekly hiring.

3. That the operation of the statute rendered any agreement between women and their masters inoperative, the effect of statute 38 & 39 Vict. c. 90, s. 11, being to prevent masters making deductions for wages earned by women and children.

The rules before mentioned are as follows:

Rules to be observed by all persons employed in this mill.

First, fourteen days' notice in writing is required from every person working in this establishment previous to leaving our employ (such notice to be given on a Thursday), and fourteen days' notice will be given by us to all persons before discharging them (except as stated herein, after); and all persons leaving our employment without serving the above notice will forfeit the whole of the wages to which they would otherwise have been entitled, and also render themselves liable to be proceeded against according to law.

Secondly, any person before absenting himself or herself from work (with the intention of returning) must obtain the consent of the overlooker for that purpose, and any person who may be prevented from attending his or her work through sickness must immediately give notice thereof to his or her overlooker; otherwise all wages due shall be forfeited and irrecoverable, and such person shall be liable to dismissal without notice.

Thirdly, any person guilty of neglect, damaging, or spoiling work, disorderly conduct, indecent or improper behaviour, shall be liable to be discharged without notice.

Fourthly, any person neglecting to clean the machinery on which he or she is employed, or refusing to clean the same when requested by the overlooker, shall be liable to be discharged without notice.

Fifthly, a fair abatement shall be made for bad or inferior workmanship, as also for the value of any materials intrusted to any person, which shall not be properly accounted for.

Sixthly, nothing herein contained shall affect our legal rights as employers.

The opinion of the court is therefore requested, Whether in point of law the judgment for the defendants is correct. If so the judgment is to stand.

If not, and the verdict ought to have been for the plaintiff, the judgment for the defendants to be set aside, and a verdict to be entered for the sum of 7d.

J. Edwards, Q.C. (with him B. S. Wright) argued for plaintiff, the appellant. The County Court Judge has reserved for the consideration of this court all the points upon which he has given a decision. [FIELD, J.—We cannot review his findings of fact, one of which is that the plaintiff's was a weekly hiring.] A fortnight's notice is inconsistent with such a hiring, and the only possible contract under the defendant's rules is for piecework. In Res v. Great Yarmouth (5 M. & S. 114) a hiring at weekly wages, either party to be at liberty to part at a month's notice, was held to be a yearly hiring; although the case stated that the pauper let himself by the week. But even assuming the service to be by the week, this is just such a case as the Legislature intended to provide for by this 11th section. In Taylor v. Carr (30 L. J. 201, M. C.) by one of the rules of a cotton mill, any person absenting himself on account of sickness or any other cause, was immediately to give notice to the overlooker; in default thereof all wages then earned were to be forfeited. A weaver in the mill, in the middle of the day, asked the overlooker for leave of absence for half a day, promising to return to work the next morning at six. The weaver did not return the next day till half past one in the afternoon; and it was held that she did not forfeit her wages under this rule, for she could not be said to be absent without notice merely by continuing her absence longer than the period which she had mentioned. Upon the authority of that case, the County Court Judge ought to have held that the second rule did not apply; but in any case this comes within the 11th section of the Employers and Workmen Act Act 1875. [CLEASBY, B.—This was no claim for wages or other sum due to the plaintiff.]

Channell appeared for the defendant, but was not heard.

CLEASBY, B.—It is impossible to say that there was not in this case ample evidence upon which to base the County Court judge's findings of fact.

Div. App.] MAYOR, &C., OF WORCESTER v. ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE OF DROITWICH UNION. [Div. App.]

The number of sets worked by the winders merely furnish a mode of calculating the amount of wages to be paid each week; their service and employment is found, as a fact, to be weekly. The time required for notice does not necessarily fix the period of service, and we cannot say that the judge was wrong in determining that the plaintiff's was a weekly hiring. This being so, we have to consider whether, under the circumstances, there is any debt due to the plaintiff from the defendant. Since this court has been sitting, we have had a similar point before us (Saunders v. Whittle, 33 L.T. Rep. N. S. 816); the authorities are clear that if a servant voluntarily leaves his service without notice, he cannot recover for the work done during the broken period of his hiring. There were in this case no wages due to the plaintiff until she had completed her week from the Thursday morning before she absented herself, and she had therefore no claim, in the words of the 11th section of this Statute, "for wages or other sum due for work done, before such absence or leaving work."

MAYOR, &C., OF WORCESTER, v. THE ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE OF THE DROITWICH UNION.

Poor rate—Local board of health—Rateable value of waterworks—Statutory limitation charges on.

The restrictions imposed by law on a public body as to the profits derivable from the occupation of waterworks and other property of that description is to be regarded in considering the profitable occupation of that body.

The Local Board of Health of W. were the owners and occupiers of certain waterworks in the parish of C., and supplied the inhabitants of W. with water at a charge considerably less than they were entitled to exact under the provisions of the Public Health Act 1848. The respondents, within whose union the parish of C. was situated, rated them as though they had been a company who occupied the works solely for the purpose of profit, and on a basis far exceeding the profits actually made.

Held, that the rateable occupation was to be measured by the profits actually derived from the occupation, and not by the profits which might be derived by a company occupying the works solely for the purpose of profit.

SPECIAL case for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench stated between the parties by consent, and by the order of Blackburn, J., in pursuance of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 11.

The facts are as follows:

1. The appellants are the mayor, aldermen, and citizens of the city of Worcester, who being the council of the said city are the Local Board of Health and Urban Sanitary Authority for the said city.

2. The respondents are the assessment committee of the Droitwich union in which the whole of the parish of Claines is situated, but which parish is partly in the city and partly in the county of Worcester.

3. In the year 1849 the Public Health Act 1848 (Statute 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63), was applied to the city of Worcester, and the appellants became the Local Board of Health for the said city.

4. In 1856 the appellants, in pursuance of the powers conferred by the before-mentioned statute (which statute may be referred to by either party as part of the case), and for the purpose of supplying the sanitary requirements of the said city purchased certain land in that part of the parish of Claines which is situated within the municipal boundary of the city of Worcester but which forms part of the Droitwich Poor Law Union, and is for poor law purposes distinct and separate from the said city of Worcester.

5. On the land thus purchased, consisting of 2a. 1r. 14p. at Barbourne, and 1a. 0r. 33p. at Rainbow Hill, in the said parish, the appellants erected waterworks and a reservoir, which, with certain mains and pipes extending throughout the said city of Worcester for the supply of water to the inhabitants of the said city of Worcester cost 30,000*l.* (including 207*l.* the price of the said land).

6. On 2nd March 1858 the appellants duly fixed a rate of 4*d.* in the pound per annum on the net annual value of the dwelling houses and premises supplied with water for domestic use, cleanliness, and drainage, and an additional charge for water used for trade and other special purposes, and also a certain scale for water supplied by meter. In fixing the above mentioned rate the appellants took into consideration, not so much the profit to be made out of the water as a commercial speculation, as its value as a sanitary agent in preserving the health of the said city, and the necessity of bringing the supply within the reach of the poorest class of inhabitants, and in order to induce the inhabitants to discontinue their private sources of supply, and they accordingly fixed a price which has left but little profit above the actual cost of supply, but which has effected the object they had in view by promoting the general use of the water throughout the city.

7. The price which the appellants actually charge for household supply is only 4*d.* in the pound per annum upon the net annual value, and for houses the nett annual value of which does not exceed 8*l.* per annum they only charge two-thirds of that amount, and when the rent of the houses includes the parochial rates (which is almost universally the case in the dwellings of the labouring class) the charge is only one half, or 2*d.* in the pound per annum on the rateable value. Thus a house let at 10*l.* per annum, the rateable value of which would be about 8*l.*, gets an unlimited supply of water for 1*s.* 9*d.* per annum if the tenant pays the rates, and for 1*s.* 4*d.* per annum if the landlord pays them, while a house the rateable value of which is 20*l.* per annum gets all the water required for domestic purposes for 6*s.* 8*d.* per annum, and warehouses, shops, and offices of the same rateable value at 3*s.* 4*d.* per annum.

8. The appellants have also a scale of charges for water supplied (not by meter) for trade purposes, e.g., to fishmongers, 10*s.* per annum; greengrocers, 4*s.* per annum; livery stables, 1*s.* per annum for each stall; washerwomen, 4*s.* per annum.

9. The charges for supply by meter range from 3*d.* per 1000 gallons for the largest quantities, and going up to 7*d.* per 1000 gallons when the supply is less than 20,000 gallons per quarter, and this is the maximum charge. The above charges are to be taken as below those that would be charged by the appellants if they were an ordinary trading body.

10. In 1866 the existing waterworks proving insufficient, the appellants purchased additional land, consisting of 5a. 1r. 26p., at Barbourne, in the said parish of Claines; and between the years 1867 and 1871 expended about 18,000*l.* (including about 2300*l.* paid for such additional land) in enlarging the then existing works. The said further sum of 18,000*l.* and the former sum of 30,000*l.* were raised by mortgage of the general district rates of the said city of Worcester, repayable by annual instalments, extending over thirty years. The interest and instalments of principal payable in the year ending 31st Aug. 1873, amounted to 2976*l.* Of the said sum of 48,000*l.* the sum of 37,250*l.* or thereabouts has been expended in the said parish of Claines.

11. In 1869, whilst the extension of the said works was in progress, a new valuation list for the parish of Claines was approved by the assessment committee of the Droitwich union.

12. On 13th June 1873, a supplemental valuation list for the said parish was approved by the said assessment committee, and the former was cancelled.

13. On 22nd Oct. 1873, a new valuation list, or supplemental valuation list, for the said parish, was approved by the said assessment committee, in which both of the above mentioned assessments were cancelled.

14. On 17th Dec. 1873, notice of objection and appeal against the said valuation list was served on the overseers and on the assessment committee, the principal and main ground of objection being that the appellants were over assessed or rated in respect of the gross estimated rental of the waterworks and land occupied by them in the said parish of Claines.

15. The appellants failed to obtain any relief from the assessment committee, and they have appealed to the Court of Quarter Sessions against the poor rates based on the said valuation list made on 22nd Oct. 1873, their principal grounds of such appeal, and the only one now raised being the same as above stated.

16. By the accounts of the Local Board of Health, which are annually audited, printed, and circulated in accordance with the Municipal Corporation Act, the Public Health Act, 1848, and the Local Government Act, 1858, it appears, as the fact is, that the whole net income derived from the said waterworks during the eight years previous to such appeal, averaged about 65*l.* per annum, without any deduction having been made for rates, taxes, expenses of management, collection of water rate, depreciation of plant and machinery, and other matters which, in making a commercial account, would have been allowed for.

17. The appellants contend that the provisions of the Public Health Act contain the only authority for the appellants to charge a water rate on consumers of water, and that such a rate only is authorised by the statute as might be reasonably expected to be necessary to defray the expenses incident to the water supply, and that they have no authority by the said Act or otherwise to receive any more money from the consumers than is required to pay the above-mentioned expenses. And further, that as the inhabitants have, on the faith of the existing rates, adopted the water supply of the appellants, and suffered their private resources to fall into disuse without special causes, it would be a breach of good faith to alter such rates. And that therefore the appellants are only rateable for the rent which a tenant from year to year would give for the land subject to the existing rates, and the same restrictions (if any) as those under which the appellants hold it, and not that which a tenant entirely unfettered might give.

18. The respondents, on the other hand, contend that it is right to rate the appellants in respect of the waterworks in Claines (as directed by sect. 1 of the 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 96) at what a tenant would give with liberty to raise the price of water as he might think proper, so far as not restricted by law; that there were no restrictions by law in the present case, and that the fact that appellants, in fixing their rates, looked only to the benefit of the inhabitants and ratepayers of the city of Worcester only transfers the advantage and benefit of the property from themselves to those inhabitants and ratepayers for whom they are trustees, and that it would be unfair that the inhabitants and ratepayers of the city of Worcester should enjoy this advantage and benefit at the expense of the parish of Claines and the rest of the Droitwich Union.

19. If the court should be of opinion that the contention of the appellants is right, then the said rate is to be amended, and so much of the valuation list as refers to the land and works in question is to be cancelled; and the income that the appellants have actually received from the land and works shall be taken as the fair annual value thereof, and the assessment shall stand at 600*l.* as the gross estimated value of the said land and works, and 540*l.* as the rateable value thereof, as aforesaid.

20. If the court should be of opinion that the contention of the respondents is right, then the assessment of 1750*l.* as the gross estimated value, and 1400*l.* as the rateable value, is to stand.

21. The court is to have power to draw inferences, and to send back the case for further information if required.

Dowdeswell, Q.C. and Castle, for the appellants. —It is not denied that these waterworks are liable to be rated; the question is whether the corporation of Worcester, having provided these works out of public moneys, are to be placed in the situation of private speculators, conducting waterworks as they think proper, and solely with a view to their own interest. The appellants are a public body, subject to the provisions of the Public Health Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63) which controls their powers. See sects. 75 to 78, and sects. 89 and 93. It is submitted that where a body has vested in it by Act of Parliament the power of levying rates for certain purposes, and such power is limited, the true principle is that the rate is only to be assessed on profits actually made in carrying out bonâ fide the purposes for which such body was elected. [CLEASBY, B.—Then if no profits are made there can be no rate. Field, J., referred to Staley v. Castleton (33 L. J. 178, M. C.). The case of the Mayor of Liverpool v. Overseers of Wavertree (39 Justice of the Peace, 101) is precisely in point. There the corporation of Liverpool held land in the parish of Wavertree, from which they pumped water, which, with water obtained from other sources, was sold over a large area, including the parish of Wavertree, at a rate which was only sufficient to cover the whole expenses, the corporation being prohibited by statute from making any profit by the supply of water. The court (Blackburn, J., and Lush, J.) held that they were not liable to be rated as a trading company making a profit, and that the test was what a yearly tenant would give who was subject to the restrictions put upon his use of the land by the statute. In the case of the Mersey Docks v. Cameron Jones (11 Clarke, H. L. Rep. 443; 20 C. B., N. S., 56) Lord Chelmsford in the course of his judgment says, "If an occupier shows no benefit of any description from his occupation, it forms no part of the general ability of the parish" (see Clarke, H. L. Rep. 519). They likewise cited

H. Matthews, Q.C. and A. E. Jelf, for the respondents, contended that for the purpose of rateability the fact of the appellants being a public body whose powers are in some degree limited by Act of Parliament ought not to be regarded, and that the capacity of the tenement to produce and not the actual produce was the true test of what should be its rateable value. They referred to Cour. adv. vult.

The judgment of the court (CLEASBY, B., and FIELD, J.) was delivered on 11th Feb. by Cleasby, B.—The question in this case is not the rateability of a public body in respect of premises occupied by them for public purposes. That question has been for some time settled; and it is not disputed that the appellants, who are the Local Board of Health for Worcester, are liable to be rated in respect of waterworks erected and occupied by them for the purpose of supplying the inhabitants with water. The question is, whether the rateable occupation is to be measured by the profits actually derived from the occupation, or by the profits which might be derived from it by a person or a company who occupied the works solely for the purpose of profit. The fact being that the corporation, having in view the benefit of the inhabitants, have made the scale of rates so low as to leave a profit only of 600*l.* upon the rates actually received, after deducting the expenses connected with the providing of the water, collection, &c., upon which amount they contend they ought to be rated; whereas the respondents contend that a trading company, with the same power of trading, might have realised a net profit of 1400*l.*, in which amount they say the rate ought to have been made. It seems to me the respondents cannot maintain the rate they contend for, and that the restrictions which are put by law on a public body as to the profit derivable from the occupation of waterworks or gasworks, or other property of that description, must be regarded in considering the profitable occupation of that body. For example, if the local board was prohibited from charging more than 2*d.* a week on a dwelling house, and the waterworks were so complete and the demand so great that a private trading company would be able to charge 6*d.* a house, we should feel, no doubt, whatever, that the local board, whose duty it was not to let to a trading company, but themselves to occupy, could only be rated upon the occupation and the rate which they were compelled to charge. This is not the present case but only an illustration of a restriction put by law upon the value of the occupation, and the effect of it could not be disputed, and indeed was barely disputed in the course of the argument. The hypothetical tenant subject to no restriction cannot represent the real occupier who is by law subject to restrictions; this conclusion would be well supported by Reg. v. Metropolitan Board of Works (19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 348; L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 15; 35 L. J. 24, M. C.); and Metropolitan Board of Works v. Overseers of West Ham (ubi sup.), and is fairly borne out by the opinion of Wightman, J., and Crompton, J., in R. v. Longwood (17 Q. B. 871). We were also referred during the argument to another case, Mayor of Liverpool v. Overseers of Wavertree (ubi sup.), and it may be said to have been there expressly decided. The only question, therefore, is, whether a public body, exercising their powers properly for the benefit of the inhabitants, and making their rates bonâ fide for that purpose, and so regulating their conduct by the restriction, as it may be called, of acting in obedience to the Act of Parliament, can be properly represented for the purpose of rating by a hypothetical tenant acting under no such restriction. We are of opinion they cannot; they only acquire the right to the rates by the Act of Parliament, for the purpose of carrying the objects of the Public Health Act properly into effect, and the profitable occupation which they in fact have, is the only one which they can properly have, and it would be strange to rate them, not in respect of what they can properly enjoy and do enjoy, but in respect of what they cannot properly enjoy and do not enjoy. We adopt the judgment of LUSH, J., in the before cited case of Metropolitan Board of Works v. Overseers of West Ham (ubi sup.), that the proper mode of estimating the profitable occupation is to take it as it actually is. No distinction was attempted to be made between the money derivable from the rates properly so called, and that derived from agreements with traders and manufacturers. The question above discussed was the only one argued before us; and it appears to us, for the reasons above given, that the contention of the appellants is right, and that as the sum of 600*l.* properly represents the value of the profits actually had, the gross estimated rental ought to be reduced to that sum, and the rateable value to 540*l.*

STOTT (app.) v. DICKINSON (resp.).

[DIV. APP.]

Thursday, Feb. 17, 1876.

STOTT (app.) v. DICKINSON (resp.)

Coal Mines Regulation Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 76, ss. 41 and 72)—Abandoned mine—Owner—Conclusion of agreement—Contractor.

In 1860 appellant proposed in writing to take from the landlord certain coal mines for fourteen years, from Michaelmas of that year, at a certain rent, a lease to be granted and accepted with provisions contained in a then existing lease of other mines. The landlord accepted this proposal in writing, but no lease was executed. One of the provisions mentioned was, that when and so soon as the pits, shafts, roads, &c., should be discontinued or become useless, the lessee would fill up or remove the same, unless the lessor should signify his wish that the same should be kept open or continued.

In 1871 the appellant discontinued working these mines.

In Dec. 1875 he was convicted by justices under the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1872, s. 41, upon a charge of not causing the tops of the shafts of these mines to be kept securely fenced for the prevention of accidents on the 29th Nov. previously.

Held, upon a case stated, that appellant was not at the date charged an owner of the shafts within the interpretation of that term in sect. 72.

Sect. 41 applies to a mine abandoned or discontinued at any time before or after the time of the Acts coming into operation.

THIS was a case stated by two justices of the peace in and for the county of Lancaster, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of this court on questions of law which arose before then as hereinafter stated.

At a petty sessions holden at the county sessions room, in the Town Hall, in Little Bolton, in and for the division of Bolton, in the county of Lancaster, on the 27th Dec. 1875, an information preferred by Joseph Dickinson (hereinafter called the respondent) against James Stott (hereinafter called the appellant), under sect. 41 of the Act 35 & 36 Vict. c. 76, charging "for that he, the said James Stott, within three calendar months last past, that is to say, on the 29th Nov. last, at Kearsley, in the said county, then being the owner of a certain coal mine there situate, the same being a coal mine within the intent and meaning of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1872, and which mine was then abandoned and the work thereof discontinued, did not after notice in writing duly given by the said Joseph Dickinson, as such inspector of mines as aforesaid, cause the tops of the two shafts of the said mine to be kept securely fenced for the prevention of accidents, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided," was heard and determined by the said justices, the said parties respectively being then present, and upon such hearing the appellant was duly convicted before them of the said offence, and they adjudged him to forfeit and pay the sum of 10*l.*, to be paid and applied according to law, and also to pay to the said respondent the sum of 1*l.* 6*s.* for his costs in that behalf; and if the said several sums were not paid forthwith, they ordered that the same should be levied by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of the said appellant; and in default of sufficient distress, they adjudged that the said appellant should be imprisoned in the county prison for the Hundred of Salford in the said county for the space of one month, unless the said several sums and all costs and charges of the said distress and of the commitment and conveying of the said appellant to the said prison should be sooner paid.

And whereas the appellant being dissatisfied with the justices' determination upon the hearing of the said information, as being erroneous in point of law, did pursuant to sect. 2 of the said statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, apply to them in writing to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and the grounds of such their determination as aforesaid for the opinion of the court, and duly entered into a recognisance as required by the statute in that behalf.

Now, therefore, the said justices in compliance with the said application and the provisions of the statute stated and signed the following case:

Upon the hearing of the said information, it was proved on the part of the respondent, and found as a fact, that he (the respondent) was one of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Mines, and was duly authorised by the Secretary of State for the Home Department to take proceedings against the appellant for the offence set out in the information.

It was proved by the respondent that in the month of Sept. 1875, his attention was drawn to the dangerous state of some disused pits in the township of Kearsley, in consequence of which the respondent visited the pits and found that the covering of one shaft had holes in it large enough for a person to drop through. This shaft was partly covered up, and the other shaft had one small hole in the cover, the plank cover entirely rotten at one end, and would have formed a trap if anyone had stepped on it. An occupation road goes close past these pits, and it was a likely place for accidents. The respondent then addressed the following letter to the appellant:

Pendleton, Manchester, 13th Sept. 1875.

Dear Sir,—Information has been received by me this evening that the old pits at Unity Brook, late in your occupation are in a dangerous state. It appears that the planks with which they were covered have become decayed, and that as children are frequently playing near, it is feared that an accident may occur. I feel sure that no one would regret such an occurrence more than yourself. Will you therefore be so good as to inform me who is the owner responsible for the secure fencing, and if it be yourself that you will have the fencing done without delay?

Faithfully yours,

JOSEPH DICKINSON, Inspector of Mines.

Jas. Stott, Esq., Westhoughton.

On the 14th Sept. 1875, the appellant addressed the following letter to the respondent in reply to the respondent's letter of the 13th Sept.

Westhoughton, Bolton, Sept. 14th 1875.

Dear Sir,—The pits of the old Unity Brook Colliery. My tenure of the place ceased five years or more ago, and before its expiration I offered to restore the ground, fill up the pits, &c., conditionally on having the privilege of moving the buildings. I never got any reply, but I have since the place ceased to produce coal at various times made the coverings of the pits temporarily secure to prevent accidents. I must now, however, decline to do anything more or to accept the slightest responsibility. The property is Major Starkie's, and Mr. T. F. Whitehead, of Bolton, is his mining agent. I should think a communication to him would command prompt attention.

Faithfully yours,

J. Dickinson, Esq.

JAS. STOTT.

After the receipt by the respondent of this letter, the respondent had some correspondence with the agents of Major Starkie. and on the 26th Oct. 1875, he (the respondent) again visited the pits and found them unvouched, and again on the

Div. App.]

STOTT (app. v.) DICKINSON (resp.).

[Div. App.]

29th Nov. 1875, respondent visited the pits and found them in the same condition as on the previous visits. On the 6th Dec. 1875, respondent received from the appellant the following letter:

Westhoughton, Bolton, Dec 6th 1875.

My dear sir.—Old pits at Unity Brook. A fortnight ago (Nov. 23rd) I wrote to Mr. Hopwood saying that I would (without prejudice) see that these pits were made secure at least for a time. I examined their state and ordered the work done, and I am annoyed it is not completed. You may prosecute me, but cannot hold me responsible. Faithfully yours,

Joseph Dickinson, Esq.

JAMES STOTT.

On the 10th Dec. 1875, the respondent received the following letter from the appellant:—

Westhoughton, Bolton, Dec. 10th 1875.

My dear Sir,—I hope you will not, after all, find it needful to prosecute either Major Starkie or his agents for the unsafe condition of the old pits at Unity Brook; they are now all right, and had the man I instructed a fortnight since last Monday done his duty and fulfilled his promise, the provocation would not have arisen. Faithfully yours,

Faithfully yours,

J. Dickinson, Esq.

JAS. STOTT.

In reply to this letter the respondent wrote to the appellant as follows:—

Pendleton, Manchester, 11th Dec. 1875.

Dear Sir,—Old pit at Unity Brook. I have received your letter of yesterday, but after all the delay you will not be surprised to hear that the matter is now in Messrs. Holden and Holden's hands, and the informations against you and Mr. Starkie are signed. The hearing is fixed for Monday, the 20th inst. Still faithfully yours,

James Stott, Esq.

JOSEPH DICKINSON.

On the 12th Dec. 1875, the appellant sent the following letter to the respondent:—

Westhoughton, Dec. 12th 1875.

Dear Sir,—Old pits at Spindle Point. Your kindness (as you subscribe yourself "still" yours faithfully) will, I trust, permit me to trouble you with one more letter on this subject to explain what I think might, with advantage, have been explained sooner.

1. I never had a lease.

2. There never was even a stamped agreement.

3. Never any memoranda of conditions except as to royalties, term, and a note that conditions should be those usual in that estate leases.

4. It is five or six years since my occupation came to an end.

5. At that time I offered to fill up the pits, and from that day to this never had a reply; now, however, Mr. Starkie is desirous I should fill up these pits.

6. I am negotiating for some of Mr. Starkie's coal here for my company, and quite expect, if he is fixed by you, he will be so vexed as to shut the matter up. (On this last account alone do I fear the result of the prosecution).

7. On the 23rd Nov. I was at the old pits, and ordered the manager at the present U. Brook Colliery to get them secured at once, and I even told him prosecution was imminent; on the 24th early I left for the west of Ireland; I did not return till Dec. 7th.

8. The manager referred to is leaving, and quite as much on account of this matter as anything else, his only excuse being his pretended close application to his colliery duties. Faithfully yours,

J. Dickinson, Esq.

JAS. STOTT.

On the part of the respondent it was proved that on the 6th Dec. 1875, the appellant forwarded the following telegram to Mr. Heywood, the estate agent of Major Starkie, the lessor of these pits:—

From J. Stott, Mail Packet, Holyhead, to Thos. Hopwood, Esq., Whalley.—Ordered pits secured a fortnight since to-day; only got your telegram in West of Ireland late on Saturday.

And on the same day the appellant forwarded the following telegram to Mr. Whitehead, the mining agent to Major Starkie:—

From J. Stott, Mail Packet, Holyhead, to F. J. Whitehead, Esq., Mawdsley-street, Bolton.—Ordered pits secured fortnight ago; will write you to night; have wired inspector.

On the part of the respondent it was proved that on the 20th Nov. 1875, the appellant forwarded to Mr. Hopwood, Major Starkie's agent, the following letter:—

Westhoughton, Bolton, Nov. 20th, 1875.

Dear Sir,—I have a pleasant recollection of the time Major Starkie allowed me for payment of rent accruing from the Old Unity Brook Colliery; and whatever may be my conviction as to liability for the present insecure condition of the pits, I am willing (of course without prejudice) to make them thoroughly secure within the meaning of the Mines Inspection Act, and to do so without loss of time. For this purpose I shall go over them on Monday morning. Yours very truly,

T. Hopwood, Esq.

JAS. STOTT.

On the part of the respondent the following document was put in and admitted as evidence:—

Sept. 4th, 1860.

The undersigned, Mr. Jas. Stott, of Kearsley Mount, coal proprietor, proposes to take from Le Gendre Nicholas Starkie, Esq., the mines called the Doe and Five, quarter mines under his lands in Kearsley, lately in lease to the trustees of Ellis Fletcher, Esq., for a term of fourteen years from Michaelmas, 1860, minimum rent to be for the first year 150*l.*, and for the remainder of the term 200*l.* per annum. The rent per Cheshire acre of one foot in thickness, and so in proportion, to be 110*l.* A lease to be granted and accepted, embodying mutatis mutandis the provisions contained in Mr. Starkie's lease of mines in Kearsley to Messrs. Knowles and Stott.

JAS. STOTT.

I, the undersigned, agree to and accept the foregoing proposal of Mr. James Stott.

Witness my hand, the 3rd Oct. 1860.

LE GENDRE N. STARKIE, Senr.

This document was stamped with a 1*l.* stamp.

On the part of the respondent, a counterpart of the lease to Messrs. Knowles and Stott, referred to in the above-mentioned agreement, was produced and put in as evidence. This lease is dated 1st Sept. 1857, and is made between Le Gendre Nicholas Starkie, Esq., of the one part, and James Knowles and William Stott of the other part, and is a lease of

All those, the mines, beds, veins, and seams of coal and cannel, called respectively the Trencher, Bore Mine, the Cannel Mine, the Yard Mine, and the Plodder Mine, already opened and worked, and also the Half Yard Mine, and the Three Quarters Mine intended to be opened and worked, lying within and under all or any part or parts of all the ancient inclosed lands and grounds, situate in the township of Kearsley aforesaid, whereof the said Le Gendre Nicholas Starkie is now seized as tenant for life in possession.

In this lease is the following covenant:—

And also that when and so soon as the said pits, shafts, roads, railings, cuts, canals, reservoirs, clay pits, and other places and conveniences, or any of them, shall be discontinued or become useless, the said lessees, their executors, administrators, and assigns will fill up or remove the same, unless the said lessor, or other the person or persons for the time being entitled as aforesaid, shall signify his or her wish that the same shall be kept open or continued, in which case the same shall be left open accordingly, with all the air gates, levels, tunnels, soughs, drains, sluices, and other works and conveniences belonging thereto, in proper and sufficient repair and good working condition.

On the part of the respondent it was proved that the pits referred to in the above agreement and lease were the pits called the Old Unity Brook Pits, and which were worked by the appellant, and the pits to which the information in this case relates.

On the part of the respondent it was proved that these pits were not then worked, and that they had not been filled up, and the banks levelled, according to the terms of the agreement and lease.

DIV. APP.]

STOTT (app.) v. DICKINSON (resp.).

[DIV. APP.]

On the part of the respondent, it was stated by Mr. Whitehead, Major Starkie's mining agent, that as between Major Starkie and the appellant the liability of the appellant to fill up the pits and level the banks still exists.

It was contended on the part of the appellant that he was not the owner of the mine within the meaning of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1872, and that he was not legally liable to fence these pits.

It was admitted by the respondent that the appellant had not worked the pits in question for about five years.

It was admitted by the respondent that he had laid an information against Major Starkie as the landlord of these pits for not fencing the pits in accordance with sect. 41 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1872, and he, the respondent, considered Major Starkie equally liable with the appellant to fence.

It was admitted by the respondent that some correspondence had taken place between himself and Major Starkie's agents which caused him to issue summonses against both the appellant and Major Starkie, in order to ascertain who was the owner, and who was liable to fence the pits.

The said justices, however, having regard to the interpretation of the word "owner" in sect. 72 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1872, and the covenant in the lease, dated 1st Sept. 1857, and other evidence, were of opinion that the appellant was the owner within the meaning of sects. 41 and 72 of the said Coal Mines Regulation Act 1872, and as such the person liable to fence the pits gave their determination against the appellant in the manner before stated.

The question of law arising on the above statement for the opinion of this court, therefore, is whether the appellant is the owner of the shafts within the meaning of the said sects. 41 and 72 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1872, and legally liable to fence them.

If the court should be of opinion that the said conviction was legally and properly made, and the appellant is liable as aforesaid, then the said conviction is to stand; but if the court should be of a contrary opinion, then the said conviction is to be quashed.

Torr, Q.C. (with him Foard), argued for the appellants.—By the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 76), s. 41, "where any mine to which this Act applies is abandoned, or the working thereof discontinued, at whatever time such abandonment or discontinuance occurred, the owner thereof, and every other person interested in the minerals of such mine, shall cause the top of the shaft any and side entrance from the surface to be and to be kept securely fenced for the prevention of accidents; provided that: (1) Subject to any contract to the contrary, the owner of the mine shall as between him and any other person interested in the minerals of the mines be liable to carry into effect this section, and to pay any costs incurred by any other person interested in the minerals of the mine in carrying this section into effect. (2) Nothing in this section shall exempt any person from any liability under any other Act or otherwise. If any person fail to act in conformity with this section, he shall be guilty of an offence against this Act. Any shaft or side entrance which is not fenced as required by this section and is within fifty yards of any highway, road, footpath, or place of public resort, or is in open or uninclosed land, shall be deemed to be a nuisance within the meaning of sect. 8 of the Nuisances Removal Act for England 1855, as amended and extended by the Sanitary Act 1866." This Act of 1872 was not, by sect. 2, to come into operation until the 1st Jan. 1873; and it was admitted by the respondent that the appellant had not worked the pits in question for about five years; the Act cannot have a retrospective effect upon a mine abandoned two years before it came into operation. [QUAIN, J.—The 41st section says "at whatever time such abandonment or discontinuance occurred;" and the object of the section is said to be prevention of accidents. Moreover that is not the point reserved; we are only asked if appellant was the owner of the shafts.] Sect. 72 is the interpretation clause, "the term 'owner' when used in relation to any mine, means any person or body corporate who is the immediate proprietor, or lessee, or occupier of any mine, or of any part thereof, and does not include a person or body corporate who merely receives a royalty, rent, or fine from a mine, or is merely the proprietor of a mine subject to any lease, grant, or licence for the working thereof, or is merely the owner of the soil, and not interested in the minerals of the mine; but any contractor for the working of any mine or any part thereof shall be subject to this Act in like manner as if he were an owner, but so as not to exempt the owner from any liability." The appellant's agreement was at an end at Michaelmas 1874, and after that time he would have been a trespasser if he had attempted to comply with the respondent's demand upon him to fence the shaft. The charge upon which the appellant was convicted was that he within three calendar months last past, that is to say, on the 29th Nov. last, then being an owner, &c., did not after notice in writing duly given cause the shafts to be securely fenced. The 29th Nov. last, i.e. 1875, was more than a year after appellant had any right on the land. [QUAIN, J.—Why "within three calendar months last past" ?] That is the limitation imposed by sect. 63, sub-sect. 1, "from the time when the matter of such complaint or information respectively arose." It is sufficient that the appellant's right to enter for any purpose ended in 1874.

Gorst, Q.C., for the respondent.—I presume I need not answer the contention against the retrospective effect of the 41st section. [GROVE, J.—No. Clearly it applies to mines abandoned at any time before the Act passed.] The appellant was guilty of a continuing offence from the day the Act came into operation until the summons. He would clearly have been liable until the end of his agreement, and part of that agreement was to fill up or remove the pits and shafts. [GROVE, J.—Only unless the lessor signified his wish that the same should be kept open or continued. There is no evidence of what his wish was.] The mining agent stated that the appellant's liability to fill up and level the pits and banks still existed; and in his letters the appellant admits his liability under his agreement. Further, the term "owner" is defined to include any contractor for the working of any mine or any part thereof. So long as the appellant's contract was not completed, he continued to be a contractor. [QUAIN, J.—Surely, after Michaelmas 1874, he would be a trespasser if he had gone upon the ground.]

Torr, Q.C. was not heard in reply.

GROVE, J.—The only question for us is whether the appellant was the owner of these shafts on the 29th Nov. 1875. He was certainly not the proprietor of the mine. He was not the lessee; in one sense he never was lessee, but there would have been no difference to my mind whether under lease or agreement if he were tenant; his agreement, however, was concluded at Michaelmas 1874. His occupation ceased long before that, so he could not be occupier. Was he then a contractor for the working of any part of the mine? It is doubtful whether the lessor could compel him to fence the shafts; but even if he could, that would not be the working of the mine. Besides, we know nothing of the condition upon which alone he could have any right to enter upon the land to level the pits. After Michaelmas 1874 the appellant was not in any sense the owner of these shafts. Up to that time possibly his liability continued.

QUAIN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The appellant, when he was charged, came within neither of the words included in the interpretation of "owner." I do not think he ceased to be the occupier when he ceased to work the mine; but after Michaelmas 1874 he did not lease, occupy, or contract for the working of any part of the mine. I think the matter is free from doubt, and the conviction must be quashed.

ST. HELEN'S CHEMICAL COMPANY (apps.) v. ST. HELEN'S CORPORATION (resps.)

Nuisance—Public sewers—Sulphuretted hydrogen gas—Mixture of liquids from different drains—The Nuisance Removal Act for England (18 & 19 Vict. c. 121, ss. 8 & 12.)

From the appellants' premises two culverts or barrel drains, some yards apart, communicated with the public sewer under a main street: through one drain liquid impregnated with muriatic acid, and through the other liquid impregnated with sulphur were respectively discharged by the appellants from their works into the sewer, and there mingled with each other and the ordinary drainage. The combination in the sewer produced sulphuretted hydrogen gas, which escaped into the main street and the adjacent houses, and was injurious to health.

By a local Act the sewers and drains, and the entire management of the same, with the appurtenances, were vested in and belonged to the respondents, who were to cleanse and flush the same, and also to provide proper traps to prevent stench.

There was evidence that the sewer had not been flushed or cleansed, and that but for defective trapping no gas could escape from the sewer; but the justices found as a fact that this was a nuisance which arose from the act or default of the appellants, and made an order of abatement upon them under 18 & 19 Vict. c. 121 s. 12.

Held, upon a case stated, that the interpretation clause (sect. 8) did not limit nuisances to open drains, but included a public sewer; that, assuming the respondents to blame, the appellants were not the less guilty of a breach of the statute; and that the order was rightly made.

THIS was a case stated by two justices of the peace in and for the county of Lancaster, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court on questions of law which arose before them as hereinafter stated.

At a petty session holden in and for the petty sessional division of St. Helens, at St. Helens, in the said county, on the 25th Jan. 1875, a complaint, preferred by Henry William Turner on behalf of the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of St. Helens, who are the local sanitary authority of the borough of St. Helens (hereinafter called the respondents), under sect. 12 of the Nuisance Removal Act for England 1855, for "in or upon a certain street there, called Old Atlas-street, in their district, under the Nuisance Removal Act for England 1855, the following nuisance exists, viz., a drain so foul as to be a nuisance and injurious to health, and that such nuisance is caused by the act or default of you," meaning the said appellants, was heard and determined by the said justices, the parties respectively being then present, and upon such hearing the appellants were convicted by them of the said offence, and they ordered them to abate the nuisance within twenty-one days.

Upon the hearing of the complaint it was proved on the part of the respondents, and found as a fact by the justices, that the drain in Old Atlas-street referred to was a certain public sewer, passing under Old Atlas-street, and forming part of the drainage system of St. Helens. That sulphuretted hydrogen gas was generated in the said public sewer in Old Atlas-street, below the appellants' works; that such sulphuretted hydrogen gas escaped into the said street in such quantities as to be a nuisance and injurious to the health of persons passing along the said street, and also to the inhabitants of the adjacent houses. It was also proved and found by the said justices as a fact that there were two culverts or barrel drains leading from the chemical works of which the appellants are owners and occupiers, which were both connected with the aforesaid public sewer in Old Atlas-street at points some yards from each other; and it was not disputed that the said culverts or barrel drains were properly connected with the said sewer, and that the appellants had a perfect right to drain into the said sewer from their said premises. That from the uppermost one of such drains, liquid, impregnated with muriatic acid, and from the other, liquid impregnated with sulphur, were respectively discharged by the appellants from their said works into the said sewer or drain in Old Atlas-street. That the said liquids combined with each other and mingled with the ordinary drainage in the sewer. That the combination of the said liquid so impregnated and discharged as aforesaid produced sulphuretted hydrogen gas, which was the gas the production and escape of which formed the cause of complaint. It was also proved that the contents of the sewer immediately above the point of entry of the appellants' uppermost culvert or barrel drain was ordinary sewage matter, in which was no acid or sulphur.

Div. App.]

ST. HELEN'S CHEMICAL COMPANY v. ST. HELEN'S CORPORATION.

[Div. App.]

Evidence was given on the one side, and denied on the other, that the water impregnated with sulphur from other land than the appellants, viz., from land belonging to the respondents, ran into the sewer at about the point where the appellants' lower drain entered it; but the justices found as a fact that the nuisance arose from the act or default of the appellants, as above set forth, and made an order for its abatement accordingly. No nuisance was proved to exist in either of the appellants' said two drains.

There was also evidence that the sewer in question, in which the alleged nuisance was said to exist, had never been flushed nor had any other measure been adopted for the purpose of from time to time cleansing the said sewer.

There was also evidence that, but for defective construction or trapping of the sewer, no gas could escape from it, either into the street or into the adjoining houses.

By sect. 8 of the said Nuisance Removal Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 121), it is enacted that the word "nuisances" under that Act shall include "Any premises in such a state as to be a nuisance or injurious to health. Any pool, ditch, gutter, watercourse, privy, urinal, cesspool, drain, or ashpit, so foul as to be a nuisance or injurious to health. Any animal so kept as to be a nuisance or injurious to health. Any accumulation or deposit which is a nuisance or injurious to health: Provided always that no such accumulation or deposit as shall be necessary for the effectual carrying on of any business or manufacture shall be punishable as a nuisance under this section, when it is proved to the satisfaction of the justices that the accumulation or deposit has not been kept longer than is necessary for the purposes of such business or manufacture, and that the best available means have been taken for protecting the public from injury to health thereby."

Section 12 enacts

In any case where a nuisance is so ascertained by the local authority to exist, or where the nuisance in their opinion did exist at the time the notice was given, and although the same may have been since removed or discontinued, is in their opinion likely to recur or to be repeated on the same premises or on any part thereof, they shall cause complaint thereof to be made before a justice of the peace; and such justice shall thereupon issue a summons requiring the person by whose act, default, permission, or sufferance, the nuisance arises or continues, or if such person cannot be found or ascertained, the owner or occupier of the premises on which the nuisance arises, to appear before the justices in petty sessions assembled at their usual place of meeting, who shall proceed to inquire into the said complaint; and if it be proved to their satisfaction that the nuisance exists or did exist at the time when the notice was given, or if removed or discontinued since the notice was given, that it is likely to recur or be repeated, the justices shall make an order in writing under their hands and seals on such person, owner, or occupier for the abatement or discontinuance, or prohibition of the nuisance.

By sect. 8 of the Sanitary Act 1866, it is enacted that "any owner or occupier of premises within the district of a sewer authority shall be entitled to cause his drains to empty into the sewers of that authority," on condition of complying with the regulations of the authority in reference thereto.

By the "St. Helens Improvement Act 1869" (32 & 33 Vict., c. cxx. sect. 149), it is enacted that "all existing and future public sewers and drains within the borough, and all existing and future sewers and drains in and under the streets and courts, with all the works and materials thereunto belonging, whether made or provided at the cost of the corporation or otherwise, and the entire management of the same, with the appurtenances, shall vest in and belong to the corporation, and the corporation shall cleanse and flush the same." And by sect. 163 "all sewers and drains, whether public or private, shall be provided by the corporation or other persons to whom they severally belong, with proper traps or other coverings, or means of ventilation, so as to prevent stench." The said sewer in Old Atlas-street was an existing sewer at the time of the passing of the St. Helen's Improvement Act.

The appellants contended as matter of law—

1. That the word "drain" in sect. 8 of the said Nuisance Removal Act 1855, meant an open drain, and not a covered barrel drain, such as those from the appellants' works, or as the sewer in Old Atlas-street.

2. That the alleged nuisance was not such a nuisance as contemplated by the Nuisance Removal Acts, inasmuch as it was generated and arose (if it did arise from the matter discharged from their drains) after it had been discharged into the sewer, which was by law the proper place for it to be discharged into, and into which they had under the Sanitary Acts a right, and were in fact bound to discharge it.

3. That the appellants, in getting rid of their drainage matter by so discharging it, fulfilled their obligations and were not answerable for the state of the public sewers arising from the chemical action of such drainage matter. But on the other hand the respondents, as the local sanitary and sewer authority, were responsible for the state of the public sewers, and it was their duty as such authority, and especially under the St. Helen's Improvement Act, sect. 149, before referred to, which requires them to flush the sewers to prevent by trapping or otherwise the escape of the sewer gas into the outer air.

The respondents on the other hand contended that the nuisance was clearly one within the scope of the Nuisance Removal Acts; that there was nothing in those Acts to limit their operation to open drains. That the fact of the matter discharged by the appellants' drains being a product of a manufacture, distinguished it in respect of the appellants' liability from ordinary drainage or sewage matter, that is, house drainage; and that the appellants had no right under the Sanitary Acts or otherwise to discharge it into the street sewer.

The questions submitted for this honourable court are:

1. Is the nuisance complained of and found by the justices to exist, in fact, a nuisance within the meaning of the Nuisance Removal Acts.

2. Whether, on the facts above stated, the order for abatement was properly made upon the appellants. If these questions be determined in the affirmative, the said justices' order will stand, otherwise not.

Webster argued for the appellants.—According to the definition in sect. 8 of the Act of 1855 the only drain which can be a nuisance must be of the same kind as the other nuisances there described, that is, an open drain, or pool, ditch, gutter, watercourse, or cesspool; it cannot refer to a sewer into which any owner or occupier is entitled to empty his refuse, nor even to the culverts or barrel drains which were properly connected with the sewer, and in which indeed it was proved that no nuisance existed. Even if any person could be convicted of causing a nuisance in a public sewer, in this particular case the appellants are not responsible. The corporation of St. Helens are, by the local Act, expressly required to cleanse the sewers, and to provide them with proper ventilating traps; this of itself should render the corporation alone liable for this nuisance, if it existed; and moreover the case finds that there was evidence of their negligence in both these particulars. A distinction is drawn in the Public Health Act 1848 between sewers and house drains; the former by sect. 43 are to be entirely under the management and control of the Local Board of Health; and by sect. 46 that body is to keep them so as not to be a nuisance or injurious to health, and properly cleansed.

Manisty, Q.C. (with him Gully) for respondents.

—The arguments on the appellants' behalf have been advanced unsuccessfully before this: In Brown v. Bussett, and Francomb v. Freeman (L. Rep. 3 Q.B. 251), it was held that under this Act the question whether or not the persons against whom the proceedings are taken, have a legal right to cause their sewage to flow in the given channel is immaterial. The first of these two cases was stronger than the present, because there the person ordered to abate the nuisance drained his premises into a barrel drain which also received the sewage of other premises. This drain passed for about 300 yards under a turnpike road, and thence the sewage was conveyed into an open drain, which was the nuisance, the matter from the appellants' premises in itself being sufficient to cause it. The order to abate was held to have been rightly made. There is no distinction between open and closed drains, nor between sewers and house drains, for the purposes of this Act of 1855. The difference in the provisions concerning sewers and house drains in the Act of 1848 is not incorporated in either of the subsequent Acts. The definitions of "nuisances" in sect. 8 are not exclusive; the nuisances may be drains of another kind from those there described, and may be either sewers or barrel drains. Although it is stated in the case that there was evidence of the nuisance being caused by the corporation, and evidence of their negligence, neither was found as a fact by the justices.

Webster in reply.—The cases cited have no relation to the present. In one, the nuisance was an open drain; and in the other, a watercourse. Here the nuisance is the escape of gas from the public sewer, which is the fault of the corporation.

Grove, J.—In this case I am of opinion that the conviction was right, and the order of the justices should be affirmed. The facts found are that a sewer, part of the public system of a district, receives two covered drains from the appellants' premises, where chemical works are carried on. It is admitted that these drains are properly connected with the sewer, and that no nuisance exists in either of the drains. But through one of these drains, liquid impregnated with muriatic acid, and through the other, liquid impregnated with sulphur, pass from the appellants' premises into the public sewer, where they mix and generate sulphuretted hydrogen gas. This gas, it is found, escapes into the street under which the sewer lies, and into the adjacent houses, and causes a nuisance. The contention on the first point is that the appellants have a right to discharge liquids through their drains which are not of themselves noxious, and it is no business of theirs if these liquids mix in the public sewer and cause a nuisance. It would be extraordinary if an injurious compound of two separately innocent fluids could be justified under these statutes. Probably few of the nuisances which this legislation was intended to restrain, are produced by one elementary cause, and we have to consider whether the Acts of Parliament compel us to hold that the appellants have evaded their provisions. Under sect. 12 of the Act of 1855, when a local authority has ascertained the existence of a nuisance, and made a complaint, the justices shall summon the person, by whose act, default, permission, or sufferance, the nuisance arises or continues; and if satisfied that the nuisance exists, shall make an order of abatement or discontinuance or prohibition of the nuisance. If this were a nuisance, there can be no doubt that the appellants are the persons by whose act, default, permission or sufferance it arose. The interpretation clause, sect. 8 of the same Act, does not strictly define all nuisances; it merely enacts that nuisances shall include certain things there mentioned, amongst them a drain so foul as to be a nuisance or injurious to health. Although a drain is there coupled with other things which can only be open and exposed, I do not see that the Act should apply less to a covered than to an open drain. But then it is said there is no nuisance existing in the drains themselves, which communicate with the sewer, and the appellants are not liable for what occurs in the sewer. There is a distinction in the Act of 1848, between sewers and house drains (sects. 43 to 54), but it does not seem to me to go so far as to render it impossible for a nuisance to exist in a sewer; but whatever is the effect of that distinction, it is not in any way imported into the subsequent Act of 1855. It is only a special application of the words for the purposes of the particular Act in which the distinction is drawn. There is nothing, therefore, to prevent this being a nuisance from its becoming injurious to health for the first time in a sewer; nor would it be reasonable at all so to limit the application of the Act. An argument on the second point is that the corporation of St. Helens can be alone responsible for this nuisance if it exists. It is not, however, found by the justices that the gas caused by the appellants could not have escaped from the sewer if the trapping had been defective; but, assuming that the corporation were not free from negligence, this is a public matter; and although the corporation are here the accusers, that would not exonerate the appellants. Upon the findings in the case, the appellants are not less guilty of a breach of the statute because another party is also guilty. As to the cases referred to, they are not conclusive upon the points raised here, but they support the result to which we have arrived and are consistent with our determination. The order of the justices will be affirmed.

QUAIN, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion.

HARE (app.) v. OSBORNE (resp.)—Earp v. FAULKNER.

[Ex. Div.]

Thursday, Feb. 17, 1876.

HARE (app.) v. OSBORNE (resp.)

Licensed person — Suffering gaming — Private friends—35 & 36 Vict. c. 94, s. 17; 37 & 38 Vict. c. 49, s. 30.

The appellant, a licensed person, was, after the hours of closing, bonâ fide entertaining some private friends at his own expense, and these friends, in his company, were playing cards for money. He was convicted under the Licensing Act 1872, s. 17, of suffering gaming to be carried on on his premises.

Held, upon a case stated, that there was nothing in s. 30 of the Licensing Act 1874, which exempts from liability for supplying intoxicating liquors to private friends, to render this conviction unlawful.

THIS was a case stated by two justices of the peace acting for the Newark division of the county of Nottingham, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court on a question of law which arose before them as hereinafter stated.

At a petty sessions holden at Newark-on-Trent, in the said county, on 5th Jan. inst., Charles Hare, of South Clifton, in the said county, alehouse keeper (called the appellant), was charged before the said justices, on the complaint of John Osborne, of Newark-on-Trent, police superintendent (called the respondent), for that, "he being at the time of the committing of the offence hereinbefore mentioned, the keeper of certain licensed premises (to wit), the Red Lion Inn, situate at South Clifton, within the division of Newark, in the said county, within six calendar months next before the prosecution of the offence hereinafter mentioned (to wit), on the 29th Dec. in the year aforesaid (i.e., 1875), and, whilst he was so licensed as aforesaid, did then and there unlawfully suffer gaming, (to wit) cards, to be carried on on his said premises."

Henry Darbyshire, a police constable stationed at Clifton, proved that on Dec. 29th last, he was passing the Red Lion Inn, at South Clifton, about eleven o'clock at night, when he heard voices within, and distinguished that persons were playing cards for money. He subsequently obtained admission to the premises, and there found several persons present. The landlord stated that they were his private friends, and he considered that he had a right to entertain them as such.

The said justices' attention was drawn to the case of Patten v. Rhymer (29 L. J. 189, M. C.).

The appellant's advocate admitted the persons in the inn were playing at cards for money, but contended that the Legislature when inserting clause 30 in the Licensing Amendment Act of 1874, whereby a licensed person was authorised to entertain and supply liquors after the hours of closing to his private friends at his own expense, intended that the licensed person should have the same right as any private person to entertain his friends in any manner he pleases, and that, therefore, neither the landlord nor his friends were liable to any penalties under the Licensing Acts.

The said justices were of opinion that, notwithstanding the persons on the licensed premises were, as they had no reason to doubt, and found as a fact that they were, private friends, to whom the landlord might after hours give at his own expense intoxicating liquors, under sect. 30 of the Licensing Act 1874, yet he was not thereby justified in allowing them to play for money. The justices, therefore, convicted the appellant.

The appellant being dissatisfied with this determination as being erroneous in point of law, requested a case to be stated for the opinion of the court.

Should the court be of opinion that the appellant being a licensed person may not during closing hours permit his private friends to play at cards for money; then this conviction is to stand, otherwise it is to be quashed.

Rolland argued for the appellant.—The case cited before the justices, Patten v. Rhymer (29 L. J. 189, M. C.) was decided upon the Act 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, and it was there held that facts, similar to those found here, constituted an offence against the tenor of the licence. The licence, according to the schedule, was required to have the following provisos concerning the innkeeper, "that he do not wilfully or knowingly permit drunkenness or other disorderly conduct in his house or premises, and do not knowingly suffer any unlawful games or any gaming whatsoever therein." And the words of 35 & 36 Vict. c. 94, s. 17, do not differ greatly from those contained in that form of licence. "If any licensed person (1) Suffers any gaming or any unlawful game to be carried on on his premises . . . he shall be liable to a penalty." But the Licensing Act 1874 expressly distinguishes between the entertainment of public guests and private friends; a distinction which did not exist before. By 37 & 38 Vict. c. 49, s. 30, no person keeping a house, licensed under this or the principal Act, shall be liable to any penalty for supplying intoxicating liquors, after the hours of closing, to private friends bonâ fide entertained by him at his own expense." The effect of this is to render a public-house, during the unlicensed hours, a private house in which the owner may entertain his friends in any way in which another person might be justified in doing at a house not licensed.

The respondent did not appear.

GROVE, J.—I do not think this case is arguable. The appellant is admitted to be a licensed person, and it is also admitted that he, in the words of the 17th section of the Act of 1872, suffered gaming to be carried on on his premises. The exemption in sect. 30 of the Act of 1874, as to the entertainment of private friends by supplying intoxicating liquors at the landlord's own expense, has nothing whatever to do with playing cards for money. The conviction must be affirmed.

QUAIN, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Judgment for respondent.

EXCHEQUER DIVISION.

Reported by H. LEIGH and A. FAWCEN, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Thursday, Dec. 9, 1875.

Earp v. FAULKNER.

Contagious disease — Cattle infected therewith — Straying — Scierter — Knowledge of servants — Negligence of master.

An action will lie to recover damages sustained by the negligence of servants having the care of cattle which they know to be suffering from an infectious disease in allowing such cattle to intermingle with other cattle.

EARP v. FAULKNER.

[Ex. Div.]

Upon the trial of such an action it was proved that the condition of the cattle was known to the servants of the defendants at the time the cattle came into contact with those of the plaintiff, and that shortly before defendants had been convicted at the petty sessions for allowing their cattle infected with the foot-and-mouth disease to be at large in a field insufficiently fenced. The certificate of such conviction was tendered and received in evidence, and the jury found in favour of the plaintiff.

Held that the knowledge of their servants was sufficient to make the defendants responsible, and that there was evidence of negligence to support the findings of the jury. That the certificate was improperly received in evidence, but this was cured by Order XXXIX., rule 3 of the Judicature Act (38 & 39 Vict. c. 77), as no substantial miscarriage of justice had been thereby caused.

THIS was an action to recover compensation for permitting cattle infected with the foot-and-mouth disease to come into contact with and thereby to infect the plaintiff's cattle, and was tried before Quain, J., at the last Stafford Spring Assizes, when a verdict was entered for the plaintiff with leave to the defendants to move to set aside the verdict on the ground that it was consistent with the findings of the jury that the disease might have been communicated to the plaintiff's cattle, at a time when there was no knowledge of such disease existing in their cattle on the part of the defendants; and also for a new trial on the ground that a certificate of conviction had been improperly received in evidence. The plaintiff was a cattle dealer, occupying a farm of about 100 acres near Wolverhampton, the defendants were farmers and cattle dealers at Wolverhampton. In the autumn of 1874 the defendants took from a Mr. Mason some keep for their cattle, i.e., the right to graze the grass, or afterwards, in certain fields adjoining the plaintiff's lands; the fences between the plaintiff's land and that hired by the defendants were out of repair, and in November of that year the defendants put some cattle into one of the fields hired by them. At that time the cattle were free from foot-and-mouth disease, although they had suffered from the same disease some few months before. Some of the cattle strayed on to the plaintiff's land, and were stated by the plaintiff to have infected his cattle that were in an adjoining field; the district inspector subsequently went down and examined the defendants' cattle, and found some of them suffering from foot-and-mouth disease. The defendants were summoned before the bench of magistrates at petty sessions, and convicted for keeping cattle infected with foot-and-mouth disease in a field insufficiently fenced.

Upon the trial the jury found that the defendants, by themselves or by their servants, knew of the state of health of the cattle at the time of their being put into the field adjoining the plaintiff's land, and that putting them there was negligence in the defendants.

A rule nisi having been obtained in Easter Term,

Staveley Hill, Q.C. and J. O. Griffiths, Q.C., showed cause.—The question is, did the defendants, either by themselves or by their servants Downs and Dairs, know of the infected state of their cattle? The jury have found that the disease was communicated to the plaintiff's cattle by the defendants, and that Downs, a servant in the defendants' employ, knew of the state of the cattle; and even if he did not know it was gross negligence on his part not to have ascertained that such was the case. The defendants knew the state their cattle were in, for they were convicted for keeping cattle suffering from foot-and-mouth disease, in a field insufficiently fenced, even if the certificate of such conviction, which was put in at the trial, was improperly received in evidence, it does not follow that there must be a new trial, as, by Order XXXIX., sub-sect. 3, of the Judicature Act (38 & 39 Vict. c. 77), "A new trial shall not be granted on the ground of misdirection, or of the improper admission or rejection of evidence, unless, in the opinion of the court to which the application is made, some substantial wrong or miscarriage has been thereby occasioned in the trial of the action; and if it appear to such court that such wrong or miscarriage affects part only of the matter in controversy, the court may give final judgment as to part thereof, and direct a new trial as to the other part only."

H. Matthews, Q.C. and Badcliffe Cooke, in support of the rule, cited

Cook v. Waring, 2 Hurl. & Colt. 272;

Raphael v. Bank of England, 17 C. B. 161.

KELLY, C.B.—I am of opinion that upon the substantial merits of the case the rule must be discharged. The action was brought to recover damages for that the defendants knowing their cattle to be infected with the foot-and-mouth disease, allowed them to stray on to the plaintiff's premises and to infect his cattle that were then in his fields. It is quite clear that unless the summing up of the learned judge was wrong, the jury could not with justice have found any other verdict. Now, as to the question when the diseased state of their cattle was known to the defendants or to their servants, it is proved by the evidence called upon the trial, that there were only four occasions, viz., 9th, 13th, 15th, and 18th Dec., upon which the plaintiff's cattle or any animal of his came into contact with the defendants' cattle. The question which arises thereon is, whether there is any evidence to justify the jury in finding that the defendants' cattle could have infected the plaintiff's. Now, the 9th is out of the question altogether because the learned judge in summing up told the jury that the act of the plaintiff in bringing into his field a cow that he had found straying on the high road, if such cow infected his cattle, was an act for which the plaintiff was alone responsible, and that though the defendants' cattle might have also come into contact with the plaintiff's upon that day, the defendants would not be liable. As to the 18th, the jury have found that the defendants' cattle did not come into contact with the plaintiff's on that day; there are, therefore, only two other days left, viz., the 13th and 15th Dec. The jury have found that upon both of these days the defendants' cattle came into contact with the plaintiff's. Now is there any evidence that either the defendants or their servants knew of the diseased state of their cattle on or prior to the 13th? There is evidence that Downs, a servant in the defendants' employ, knew of the existence of the disease at that time; and it was clearly proved and found by the jury that on both those days the defendants' cattle and the plaintiff's came into contact. Now, as to the defendants' personal knowledge of the state of their cattle, it was proved that a cow belonging to the defendants, and which had been ordered to be slaughtered on account of its being infected with the foot-and-mouth disease, had been in the fields in which the defendants afterwards placed the cattle which strayed on to the plaintiff's land. This, in my opinion, was notice to defendants that the field in which the cow had been was infected and made dangerous and not safe to turn other cattle into. It has been contended on behalf of the plaintiff that it was gross negligence in the defendants not to have known the state of their cattle; and it is the same for the purpose of this action as if they had known and neglected to take proper precautions to prevent their cattle straying. I am inclined to think that it is equivalent and that it was the duty of the defendants to have made themselves acquainted with the condition of their cattle, and such would be my opinion if I was called on to decide the point; but as the jury have found that defendants did know of the state of their cattle, the point does not arise here. Now as to the improper reception in evidence of the certificate of the defendants' conviction for keeping cattle infected with the aforesaid disease in a field insufficiently fenced, I am of opinion that the certificate of conviction was improperly received in evidence, and if it had not been for Order XXXIX., rule 3 of the Judicature Act (38 & 39 Vict. c. 77) there would have to be a new trial. It is with great reluctance that I apply it to this case, for if the learned counsel for the defendants had known that he would have been met in this way he would have tendered a bill of exceptions to the judge's ruling; but as the rule says that there shall be no new trial on the ground of the improper reception of evidence, unless in the opinion of the court some substantial wrong or miscarriage has been thereby occasioned, I think we are bound by it, as there can be no doubt that the plaintiff has sustained a severe loss, and I do not think that the certificate influenced the jury is arriving at the verdict they did. The rule must, therefore, be discharged.

WOOLER AND WIFE v. KNOTT.

CLEARY, B.—I am of the same opinion as my Lord; the rule of law is clear that if a man's cattle trespass on the land of another person, the owner of the cattle is responsible, provided there was no defect contributing thereto on the other man's part by allowing his fences to remain out of repair, and in this case trespass might have lain against the defendant for allowing his cattle to stray. But I will not deal with the case in that way, I will put it as if the defendants' cattle had been lawfully going along the highway, when it would have been the duty of the defendants, knowing that their cattle were so infected, to have taken care that they did not intermingle or get into the same field with the plaintiff's. The charge is that the defendants knowingly permitted their diseased cattle to intermingle with the plaintiff's. Now it is quite sufficient to support the conclusion at which the jury arrived to have proved that a cow belonging to the defendants, and infected with the disease, and which was subsequently slaughtered on account thereof, had been kept in the same field as the defendants' cattle were afterwards turned into, for a cow in such a condition would be calculated to infect the field and any other cattle going therein within a short time. But beside this, the jury have found that Downs the defendants' servant knew of the state of the cattle on or before the 13th Dec. It is not essential to prove the knowledge of the defendants themselves; the knowledge of their servants is quite enough to make the defendants liable. It would be unreasonable to say in such a case that the remedy should only be against the servant; the defendants ought to have known the state their cattle were in. With reference to the reception of the certificate of conviction in evidence, I quite agree with what has been said by my Lord; the Act was passed to prevent any injustice being done, and this case comes within the exception named in the rule.

POLLOCK, B.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think that we ought to disturb the verdict of the jury as long as it is founded upon the evidence brought before them on the trial; and from what is now before us I think that the jury had evidence before them which would warrant them in finding as they did, and that the defendants' knowledge of the state of their cattle at the time of their intermingling with the plaintiff's was included in the findings of the jury. Now, as to the reception of the certificate of conviction in evidence, there can be no doubt that if the Judicature Act had not been passed there would have to be a new trial; but on looking at the rule I think that it applies as the rule is a reasonable one, and there has been no substantial wrong done by the reception of such evidence. The rule must be discharged.

Rule discharged.

WOOLER AND WIFE v. KNOTT.

Landlord and tenant—Lease of public house—Tenant's covenant not to do any act that "can or may affect lessen or make void the licence"—Conviction of tenant by justices for offences against the Licensing Acts—Conviction not recorded on licence—Breach of covenant—Forfeiture—Licensing Acts 1872 and 1874 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94, and 37 & 38 Vict. c. 49).—Construction.

Subsequently to the coming into operation of the Licensing Act 1874, the defendant became the lessee of a public house belonging to the plaintiffs, and by the lease (which contained the usual clause for forfeiture in case of breach of covenant), the defendant covenanted "not to do, omit, or permit, or suffer to be done or omitted, any act, matter, or thing whatsoever that can or may affect, lessen, or make void either or any of the licences for the time being granted to the said public house." The defendant was convicted before the justices of having committed, on the same day, two offences against the Licensing Acts 1872 and 1874, but the convicting justices directed, under sect. 13 of the Act of 1874, that neither of the convictions should be recorded on the defendant's licence.

In an action by the plaintiffs, the lessors, to recover the possession of the premises from the defendant, the lessee, on the ground of forfeiture, and for damages for breach of covenant, it was Held by the court (Kelly, C.B., and Huddleston, B.), on demurrer to the plaintiff's statement of claim, that the conviction of the defendant not having been followed by a record of the conviction on the licence, the licence was not "affected" within the meaning of the covenant in the lease, and that there had been no breach of covenant by the defendant, and consequently no forfeiture. Goodtitle dem. Luxmore v. Saville (16 East, 95), and the dicta therein of Lord Ellenborough, C.J., and Le Blanc, J., cited and discussed.

THIS was an action by the plaintiffs to recover possession of a public house and premises, of which the defendant was tenant under a lease from the plaintiffs, on the ground that the defendant, having been convicted by the justices under the Licensing Acts 1872, 1874, for offences against the said Acts, had thereby committed a breach of her covenant in the said lease, and had so incurred a forfeiture of such lease.

The plaintiff's statement of claim:

1. On the 29th Aug. 1874, the plaintiff Dorothy Hannah Wooler, then Dorothy Hannah Heslop, spinster, by deed let to the defendant a public house or inn called the Black Lion Hotel, and premises, situated in Middlesbrough, in the county of York, for a term of six years from the 13th May 1874, at the yearly rent of 50*l.*, payable half yearly, the first payment of such rent to be made on the 23rd Nov. then next.

2. By the said deed the defendant covenanted with the said plaintiff, D. H. Wooler, her heirs and assigns, to pay the said yearly rent of 50*l.* at the times and in the manner so appointed as aforesaid for the payment thereof, and to "keep the said public house or inn and premises open as a publichouse, and that in the usual customary way and manner as houses of that description were kept, and that she would not do or omit or permit, or suffer to be done or omitted, any act, matter, or thing whatsoever, that could or might affect, lessen, or make void either or any of the licences for the time being granted to the said public house or inn and premises."

3. The said deed also contained a clause or proviso whereby it was agreed and provided that in case the rent thereby reserved, the same being legally demanded, should be in arrear for twenty-one days, or "in case any breach or default should be made in any of the covenants, clauses, or agreements in the said deed contained, upon the defendant's part to be observed and performed, it should be lawful for the said plaintiff, D. H. Wooler, her heirs and assigns, into or upon the said premises, or any part thereof, in the name of the whole, to re-enter and the same to have again, re-possess, and enjoy, as in her and their former estate as if the said demise had not been made, and the said defendants from thence to expel, remove, and put out, anything in the said deed to the contrary notwithstanding."

4. On the 26th day of Sept. 1875, the said D. H. Wooler, then the said D. H. Heslop, intermarried with and became the wife of the plaintiff, Edward Wooler.

5. On the 14th Oct. 1875, the defendant kept open the said public-house during prohibited hours. And on the same day she permitted drunkenness, and was herself drunk in the said public-house; and she was afterwards, on or about the 18th day of Oct. 1875. duly convicted before the magistrates sitting at Middlesbrough aforesaid, and fined by them in respect of the two former of the said offences.

6. No payment or satisfaction whatsoever has been made by or on behalf of the defendant to the plaintiffs or either of them in respect of the occupation by her of the said demised premises for the period of time which has elapsed since the 13th May 1875, from which time up to the present she has remained and still now remains in the possession and occupation thereof.

The plaintiffs claim—1, possession of the said public-house and premises; 2, 1000*l.* damages for the defendant's breaches of the said covenant respecting the mode of conducting the business of the said public-house and premises.

Statement of defence:

Demurrer by the defendant to the plaintiffs' statement of claim as bad in law, on the ground that it does not show any breach by the defendant of the covenants in the said deed contained, or of any of them, whereby the plaintiffs have a right to re-enter upon and recover possession of the said premises, or to receive from the defendant any damages for breach of covenant, or any payment or satisfaction for occupation by her of the said premises; and on other grounds sufficient in law to sustain this demurrer.

Joinder in demurrer by the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs' points.—First, that the facts alleged in the statement of claim, and admitted by the demurrer, are sufficient to entitle the plaintiffs to judgment in this action in respect of the matters claimed in such statement; secondly, that the facts alleged in the 5th paragraph of the statement of claim, and admitted by the demurrer, constitute a clear breach of the covenant mentioned in the second paragraph; thirdly, that the facts alleged in the 5th paragraph show that the defendant omitted or permitted or suffered to be done or omitted matters that could or might have affected the said licences for the time being within the true intent and meaning of the said covenant; fourthly, that the facts alleged in the 5th paragraph show, that the defendant did not keep the said public house or inn and premises in the usual and customary manner as houses of that description are kept, inasmuch as she did not keep it in accordance with the licensing statutes in force for the time being; fifthly, that upon the admitted facts, the defendant was guilty of offences against the provisions of the 35 & 36 Vict. c. 94, and the 37 & 38 Vict. c. 49, which were of a nature to affect and lessen and tended to make void the said licences by virtue of the several provisions of the said Acts; and sixthly, assuming the defendant was, upon the admitted facts, guilty in point of law of a breach of either of the covenants referred to in the 2nd paragraph, it follows that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover possession of the said demised premises under the proviso for re-entry, which is referred to in the 3rd paragraph.

The defendant's points: First, it does not appear by the statement of claim how any of the facts therein mentioned was or were a breach or default of or in any of the covenants, clauses, or agreements in the said deed contained, on the defendant's part to be observed and performed, which entitled the plaintiffs to recover possession of the said public-house and premises, or to recover any damages as claimed by the plaintiffs; secondly, it does not appear by the said statement that any rent reserved by the said deed was in arrear, or that the defendants did not keep the said public-house or inn open as a public-house in the usual and customary way and manner as houses of that description were kept; thirdly, it does not appear by the said statement what licence or licences was, or were, or had been for the time being granted to the public-house, or inn and premises, or how and in what manner the defendant did, omitted, or permitted, or suffered to be done or omitted any act, matter, or thing that could or might affect, lessen, or make void either or any of the licences for the time being granted to the said public-house, or inn, and premises; fourthly, if it be intended by the statement of claim to rely on the Licensing Acts of 1872 and 1874, and any licence which may have been granted, or is affected or regulated under or by virtue of those statutes or either of them, with respect to the said public-house, then it is to be observed that neither the 13th section of the former of the said statutes, which imposes a penalty, on persons licensed to sell excisable liquors by retail in any house or premises, for the offence of permitting drunkenness in such houses and premises, nor the 9th section of the latter statute, which imposes a penalty on such persons, &c., for the offence of keeping open such premises for the sale of intoxicating liquors during the time at which such premises are by the said statute directed to be closed, enacts that the committing by or the conviction of the licensed persons for such offences, or either of them, shall cause the licence or licences granted to such person to sell excisable liquors as aforesaid to be affected, lessened, or made void. By sect. 30 of the Licensing Act 1872 and sect. 13 of the Licensing Act 1874 it is only after two previous convictions of either of the offences of which the defendant was convicted, and where such two previous convictions are directed by the convicting justices in their discretion to be recorded on the licence, that a third conviction of either of such offences, also ordered to be recorded on such licence, causes a forfeiture of such licence. Sect. 13 of the 37 & 38 Vict. c. 49, enacts that the justices convicting any person of either of the offences of which the defendant was convicted, shall, as part of their sentence, direct whether or not the said conviction shall be recorded on the licence of such person. The statement of claim does not allege that any previous conviction of the defendant for either of the said offences had been so directed or ordered to be recorded on the licence, or even that any previous conviction of the defendant of such offences, or either of them, had ever been made or taken place. 6. The said Licensing Act 1872, sect. 15, enacts that any licensed person permitting his premises to be a brothel, shall not only be liable to a penalty not exceeding 20*l.*, but shall on conviction forfeit his licence. Other offences of a more venial nature do not by the said licensing Acts, or any other law, entail or cause such forfeiture, unless not only repeated but repeated under such circumstances of aggravation, negligence, or wilful default by the person licensed as to induce the convicting magistrates as part of their sentence to order such conviction to be recorded on the licence. Only on a conviction of the said offences, or either of them, of which the defendant was convicted after two previous convictions which have been so ordered to be recorded on the licence, is the licence forfeited. The defendant having been convicted and fined as in the 5th paragraph of the statement of claim is alleged, had undergone the punishment intended and prescribed by the statute. But neither of such convictions having been recorded, or ordered to be recorded on her licence, it is a harsh, forced, incorrect, unsound, and illegal construction of her covenants in her said lease, and of the dependent clause or condition of re-entry by the lessor, and contrary to the intention of the parties to the said lease to hold that the lessee has committed a breach of contract, and thereby has incurred a forfeiture of the estate and interest granted to her by the lease, in procuring which she may have invested all her means, and on retaining which her livelihood may depend.

By an agreement between counsel on both sides these additional facts were taken as admitted in the course of the argument, viz., that the justices who convicted directed, as part of their sentence, that the convictions should not be recorded on the defendant's licence, and that consequently neither of such convictions was so recorded.

Cave, Q.C. (with whom was Heath), for the defendant, in support of the demurrer.—The court are called on to say whether these two convictions, unaccompanied by any record of them on the back of the licence, constitute a breach of the lessee's covenant and a consequent forfeiture. Has the defendant done anything which, in the actual words of the covenant itself, "can or may affect, lessen, or make void the licence?" There is no pretence for saying that the licence has been "lessened" or "avoided," and therefore the sole question is, has it been "affected." Under sect. 13 of the Act of 1872, permitting drunkenness on the premises is an offence, and it is now an offence under sect. 9 of the Act of 1874, to keep a public house open for the sale of intoxicating liquors during prohibited hours, sect. 24 of the Act of 1872 being repealed. If two convictions are recorded on the licence, and then a third conviction ensues, the licence is rendered ipso facto void, and the premises are disqualified, unless the justices otherwise order (sect. 30 of the Act of 1874); but, in the absence of a record of the conviction on the licence, the licence is not avoided nor are the premises disqualified by any number of convictions. The indorsement of the licence is the test, and if the licence is not directed to be indorsed with a record of the conviction, it is not in any way "affected" by the conviction. Under the Act of 1872 the licence was to be indorsed by the justices' clerk, unless the justices otherwise directed; but by the latter Act of 1874, the burden is thrown upon the justices, and they are required to inspect the register of licences (which is provided for by sect. 31 of the Act of 1872), and to declare as part of their sentence whether the conviction shall or shall not be recorded on the licence. The Act of 1874 came into operation on the 30th July in that year, and the lease here was executed on the 20th Aug. following, and it is probable that the person who drew this covenant intended the word "lessen" to refer to the provision of that Act under which (s. 49) a licence may be reduced from a seven day to a six day licence, or (s. 7) the hour for closing may be made earlier, and each word of the covenant would thus have a definite meaning. An offence against the Act not followed by conviction cannot "affect" the licence, nor could the parties have meant to leave the question of forfeiture to a jury upon so vague, indefinite, and wide a question as that of drunkenness. Covenants, the breach of which involve a forfeiture, are always construed most strictly and with a strong leaning against the forfeiture.

Morgan Lloyd, Q.C. (with him was Willis) for the plaintiffs contra.—Whether or not the justices direct the licence to be indorsed is not the question, for whether the licence be indorsed or not the conviction must be recorded on the register of licences (sect. 31 of the Act of 1872), and thus the premises are immediately affected. There is a vested cause of action which is not and cannot be touched by the exercise of the justices' discretion. Protection to the landlord from proceedings which may incur the loss of the licence is needed, and by so reading the covenant a plain meaning is given to the words, "which may or can affect," &c. The words are not "any act which shall have affected" as the defendant's construction would seek to make them. That it is the conviction, and not the record of it on the licence which disqualifies the premises is obvious from sect. 56 of the Act of 1872, by which, on conviction of the tenant for an offence against the Act, "and such offence is one, the repetition of which may render the premises liable to be disqualified," the owner of the premises is to have notice of the conviction; but not a word is said about recording it. In the plain and ordinary understanding of language, a conviction for an offence against the Act must be held to "affect the licence." He cited Goodtitle dem. Luxmore v. Saville (16 East, 95), where the rule as to the construction of clauses of forfeiture is laid down.

Cave, Q.C., was not called on to reply.

KELLY, C.B.—In this case it appears to me that no offence has been committed leading to a forfeiture, and therefore our judgment should be for the defendant. The words of the covenant, the breach of which, it is alleged, has caused the forfeiture, are that the tenant "will not do, omit, or permit or suffer to be done or omitted, any act, matter, or thing whatever, that can or may affect, lessen, or make void, either or any of the licences for the time being granted to the said public house, or inn and premises." Now it appears that there was only one licence in existence at the time in question. I am glad to have had the assistance of my brother Huddleston, who was a member of the Legislature when one or both of these important Acts were passed, and who, therefore, is accurately acquainted with the question and the provisions of the statutes relating to it. Let us then, first of all, consider what is the state of the law upon the matter. The object of the landlord, is, of course, that the licence shall be kept intact, and ultimately un-avoided. Now, a licensed tenant may be convicted of one, or even of two, offences against the Act, but the licence is not avoided, and no forfeiture effected unless those two convictions are recorded on the licence itself, and are followed by a third conviction. The justices have the power of doing an act by which, and it is the first act by which, under these statutes, the licence may be in any wise affected, and that is, they may order the conviction to be indorsed upon the licence; but unless and until that indorsement is made, the licence is entirely unaffected. In a sense, no doubt, the licence may be said to be affected directly the offence is once ordered to be, or is, indorsed upon it; but it is only in case that is followed by subsequent offences, and the subsequent result of such offences, that the licence is avoided. The question, then, is, whether anything that has been done, or that may be done, which renders it more or less probable that at last the licence will be avoided, can be said to "affect" the licence and work a forfeiture. In considering the question, I do not propose to follow closely either Lord Ellenborough or Le Blanc, J., in the views taken by them upon the subject of forfeitures in Goodtitle dem. Luxmore v. Saville (16 East, 95). In my judgment, in order to work a forfeiture of property, the acts which are to effect the forfeiture or affect the property, should be expressed in language so clear, express, and intelligible, as to leave no room or reason for doubt in the mind of the judge who is called upon to decide the question, that the act in question does, according to a fair and reasonable construction of the language used, and the understanding and intelligence of the parties to the contract, amount to a forfeiture. Indeed, as has been justly observed by the learned counsel for the defendant, it would be highly inconvenient and unjust that persons who may have invested, it may be, their whole fortune, in taking and setting up a public house, should, by reason of the uncertainty or ambiguity of the language of their lease, be kept in perpetual dread of the risk of a forfeiture, which might be their ruin. I do not, therefore, propose to take, on the one hand, the too severe and strict view, or, on the other hand, the too lenient view of the language here used with regard to offences against these Acts of Parliament; but I say that, upon every principle of common sense and justice, the particular acts which are to constitute or to incur a forfeiture ought to be most clearly defined and expressed, and to be most clearly understood between the parties. Now it was contended by Mr. Lloyd for the plaintiffs, that any act amounting to an offence against the Licensing Acts would be a breach of the tenant's covenant, and cause a forfeiture, even before it is ascertained or known whether there will or not be a conviction. But see what the result of that would be. It is an offence against the Act, under the closing clause, if the premises are allowed to be kept open after the prescribed time for closing, and it might be that an accident had happened in the neighbourhood, and the injured person might be brought to the house in a dying state, and the house might be kept open beyond the hour for closing, in order to administer the requisite necessaries and stimulants, in the hope of saving the man's life, and thus an offence against the Act would have been committed. But who in such a case would dream of prosecuting for it? or, if anybody did, what magistrate would convict the innkeeper? I can only say, if the parties meant and intended to contract, that such acts as these should be followed by such consequences, nothing would have been easier than to say in a few words that, if the tenant should commit any offence against the Act followed by prosecution and conviction, and if he should repeat the offence and be again convicted, then the premises should be forfeited. If that was the intention of the parties, and the tenant chose to enter into such a covenant, and take his chance of the consequences, then no one could complain. It would be easy to express these consequences and what would be the cause of a forfeiture, in a single sentence, or even in a single line, if such were intended. I think it is only

WOOLER AND WIFE v. KNOTT.

when something is done which directly operates upon—I might almost say which touches—the licence, and which if it is followed by other acts is to lead to its avoidance, that the licence can, within the meaning of these words, be said to be “affected.” An unendorsed licence is just as operative for all purposes as it was the day after it was granted, and as if no offence had been committed, and no conviction had taken place, and it is therefore not in anywise “affected.” As to anything being done that would “lessen” the licence, I confess I do not know how a licence can be “lessened,” or what does, or can, or cannot “lessen” it. But the substantial question is whether anything has been done which “may or can” affect the licence. At the present moment the licence is just as valid and valuable as it was before, and it is only that something has been done which may or may not render it more or less probable that on some future occasion it may be forfeited. The words of this covenant are not, in my opinion, sufficiently clear and intelligible to be held to work a forfeiture, and the licence cannot be said to have been “affected.”

HUDDLESTON, B.—This question arises in the shape of a demurrer to a statement of claim under the Judicature Act, and I own when I heard Mr. Cave taking the most technical objections to the form of the statement of claim, I for one, speaking for myself, determined, in so far as I possibly could, to prevent the recurrence of those special demurrers, which certainly at one time rendered the observations upon the administration of justice somewhat well founded; and if this had been a mere technical objection to the form in which the statement of claim was drawn, I at least should not have given it any particular favour. But a very substantial question arises here. We have to consider, upon the facts which have been admitted upon both sides, whether there has been a forfeiture under a covenant which is set out in the statement of claim. The covenant has been already alluded to, and the facts that are to be taken as admitted, which show that there has been a forfeiture, and are not only the facts stated in paragraph 5 of the statement, but one also which was very properly admitted by Mr. Lloyd, will enable us to come to a just conclusion. The facts to be taken as admitted were, as I think, that the defendant had been convicted of keeping the house open in prohibited hours; of suffering drunkenness upon the premises, and of being drunk herself; and that two of such convictions, or two convictions for one or both cases, took place before the magistrates. But, and this is a fact which is admitted, these convictions were not accompanied by that which is placed in the discretion of the justices, namely, an indorsement recording them on the licence. What then is the meaning of the covenant here, and in what way are we to interpret it? In Goodtitle dem. Luzmore v. Saville (ubi sup.) Lord Ellenborough in his judgment said: “In the construction of covenants of this sort they are neither entitled to favour or disfavour, whether they are to create a forfeiture or to continue an estate; but we are to put the fair construction upon them according to the apparent intention of the contracting parties.” And Le Blanc, J., in the same case said, “the court must be thoroughly satisfied of the construction of the lease contended for as establishing such forfeiture before they give an opinion which is to destroy the lease.” Now in the present case I have not without difficulty come to a conclusion, and, in doing so, I have adopted Lord Ellenborough’s rule, and have endeavoured to look at the covenant neither adversely nor favourably; but according to what appears to be the clear and fair construction of the contract entered into, and what was the intention of the parties; not forgetting the well known rule that a covenant is to be construed most strongly against the stipulating party. As to the limited interpretation that Mr. Cave gave to the words “affect, lessen, or make void,” and his argument, that in the mind of the framer of this deed there was present the distinction introduced by the Licensing Act of 1874, which was passed in July 1874, the covenant in question being entered into in the following August, I can only say that I am not inclined to give much weight to that argument, which would attribute such immense and unusual diligence to the drawer of this deed. The Lord Chief Baron has alluded to my experience acquired in another place; but I may say that I have not been guided solely by that experience, nor have I allowed it to interfere with the full and proper interpretation of the Act. But it may not be amiss to remember that before the two recent Licensing Acts were passed there were certainly always two, if not more, licences, one by the magistrates, and one from the excise, and it may well be that the person who drew this covenant had that state of things in his mind in putting in the words “either or any of the licences.” I think that these words, “affect, lessen, or make void,” must be read according to their common, ordinary English meaning. My Lord, referring to the word “lessen,” said it was difficult to tell exactly or to understand how one could “lessen” a licence. But the licence is granted not to the premises, but to the individual. Of course, if it is taken away from the individual it affects the premises, and if the licence is taken away from the individual in the middle of the term it would “lessen” the term of that licence. But I think we must take the words “affect or lessen” as general terms, referring to certain acts, which may interfere with or diminish the duration or, it may be, the value of the licence. There is no doubt that the licence itself, that is speaking literally, the document, is not affected unless there is a record upon it of the conviction. and unless there is such a record the premises are not “affected.” I recollect, as a matter of history, the great arguments used against Lord Aberdare’s Act of 1872 with reference to its requiring a record of the conviction to be indorsed on the licence in every case unless the convicting magistrate or justices directed that it should not be so recorded; and that Act also required a register of all convictions to be kept. It was said that a result not at all intended was often the consequence of that enactment, inasmuch as, though the justices might not order the conviction to be recorded, yet the clerk was bound under the Act to record it on the licence in the absence of a special direction to the contrary, and the justices may have inadvertently omitted to give any direction. This was considered to be an undesirable state of things, and, accordingly, the 13th section of Cross’s Act of 1874 made it imperative upon the convicting justices, before passing sentence in the case of a conviction, to take into consideration not only the offence then in question, but the previously recorded convictions, if any, and to declare as part of their sentence whether the present conviction should or should not be recorded upon the licence. The burden is thus thrown upon the justices. I think, not giving to the words "may affect" the extended meaning for which Mr. Lloyd argued, viz., that they mean any act which, if other steps follow, will affect the licence, but giving to them a fair interpretation, that the reasonable construction of the covenant is, if the justices, having all the circumstances before them, choose not to order the conviction to be indorsed on the licence, then the licence is not affected; if, on the other hand, they choose to have it so indorsed, then the licence is affected substantially; then, for the first time there is something which may be regarded as the first step in a series of steps, which may end in that which may cause a forfeiture. That first step is a record of a conviction on the licence. By thus construing the words of this covenant I think we shall really be dealing fairly between the two parties, and putting on the words the interpretation which they may be reasonably supposed to have themselves intended. Mr. Morgan Lloyd, who omitted no possible point in favour of a harsh construction of the covenant, drew an argument from the 56th section of the Act of 1872, enacting that on conviction of a tenant for an offence, the repetition of which may render the premises liable to be "disqualified," the justices' clerk shall serve the owner of the premises with a notice of the conviction. It is obvious from the marginal note that the object of the section was to protect the owners, not only such owners as brewers, but mortgagees, trustees, and others interested in the property. Mr. Lloyd's argument, and it was a fair one, was that from the use of the phrase "repetition of the offence," the Legislature must be taken to have imagined that the mere conviction without indorsement on the record would affect the owner. I do not, however, think that that ought to alter our view of what is the fair meaning and construction of this covenant, and whether, upon the facts admitted, there has been a forfeiture. I have arrived at my present conclusion, not without considerable difficulty and doubt, but I congratulate myself upon being able to come to the same conclusion as that arrived at by the Lord Chief Baron, and to say that the defendant is not liable.

LEWIS v. CARR.

[Ex. Div.]

LEWIS v. CARR.

Municipal corporation—Alderman supplying goods to town council—Disqualification—"Having an interest in a contract"—Alderman acting subsequently to contract without re-election—Action against for penalties—5 & 6 Will. 4 c. 76, sects. 28 and 53.

By sect. 28 of the Municipal Corporations Act (5 & 6 W. 4 c. 76) "no person shall be qualified to be elected, or to be a councillor or an alderman of any borough . . . during such time as he shall have, directly or indirectly, by himself or his partner, any share or interest in any contract or employment with, by, or on behalf of the council of such borough." And by sect. 53 of the same statute, "if any person shall act as . . . alderman or councillor . . . for any borough . . . without being duly qualified at the time of making the declaration hereinbefore required in that behalf, or after he shall cease to be qualified according to the provisions of this Act, or after he shall become disqualified to hold any such office, he shall, for every such offence, forfeit the sum of 50l., to be recovered, &c."

The defendant was a tradesman and an alderman of the borough of M., and between 19th June and 31st Dec. 1874, different orders for the supply of goods by him for the use of the Corporation were given to him on the part of the town council, the defendant from time to time sitting in his capacity of alderman on the committee of the council by whom the resolutions for the ordering of the goods were passed. The orders were in due course on each occasion sent to the defendant's shop, and the goods therein specified were supplied by him; the prices of the goods supplied on the several occasions being 3s., 6s., 6s., 10l., 2l. 10s., and 5s. respectively. The total amount (13l. 10s.) was paid by the town council to the defendant by a cheque on the 6th May 1875.

In an action against the defendant for penalties under sects. 28 and 53 of the statute, for acting as an alderman after having become disqualified, the declaration charged that before and at the time of committing the offence, &c., the defendant, being an alderman of the borough, had become disqualified to hold the office by having an interest in certain contracts for the supply of goods to the town council for reward to the defendant, and after becoming so disqualified, and within three months before suit, he acted as alderman for the said borough, contrary to the form, &c.; and it was, upon the facts above stated, Held, by the Court (Bramwell, Cleasby, and Amphlett, BB.), that the dealing in question was a contract within sect. 28 (see Nicholson v. Fields, 31 L. J. 233, Ex.; 7 H. & N. 810), but that the allegations in the declaration were not proved, and the defendant, by acting as an alderman, as alleged, had not rendered himself liable to the penalties imposed by sect. 53.

By Bramwell, B.—Sect. 28 only shows that the defendant was not de jure an alderman, and sect. 53 imposes a penalty upon a person, not for acting when not de jure an alderman but, for acting without being duly qualified at the time of making the declaration required by the statute upon his election.

By Cleasby, B.—The words of sect. 53, "after he shall become disqualified, &c.," must be read to mean, "after he shall become disqualified, and while he is so disqualified."

This was an action by the plaintiff, as a burgess of the borough of Macclesfield, to recover under sect. 53 of the Municipal Corporation Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76) divers penalties of 50l. each against the defendant, for having acted as an alderman for that borough on various occasions after he had become disqualified to hold that office, by reason of his having a share or interest in a certain contract with the council of the said borough, within the meaning and provisions of sect. 28 of the said statute. By his declaration the plaintiff charged that, before and at the time of committing the grievances thereinafter mentioned, the borough of Macclesfield was a borough named in Schedule A of the Municipal Corporations Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76), and the defendant claimed to be an alderman of the said borough, and to use and exercise the office of alderman of the said borough; and before and at the time of committing the said offences the defendant had become disqualified to hold the office of alderman of the said borough, according to the said statute, to wit, by having a share and interest of and in certain contracts with the council of the said borough, to wit, certain contracts for the supply of goods by the defendant to the said council, for reward to be paid by the said council to the defendant for the same. Yet the defendant, not regarding the said statute, after the passing of the said statute, and after he had become so disqualified as aforesaid, and within three calendar months before the commencement of this suit, on divers, to wit, six several occasions, acted as alderman for the said borough, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made, whereby he forfeited for each of the said offences 50*l.*, amounting, to wit, to 300*l.* Yet he had not paid the same.

The defendant pleaded not guilty (by Statute 21 Jac. 1, c. 4, s. 4 (Public Act), and upon that plea issue was joined.

At the trial, before Lord Coleridge, C.J., at the last summer assizes at Chester, the following appeared to be the facts of the case as either proved or admitted.

The plaintiff was a Burgess of the borough of Macclesfield, which is a borough within schedule A of the Municipal Corporations Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76), and the defendant was an inhabitant of the same borough, carrying on the trade and business of a tallow chandler there, and was also an alderman of the said borough, and had previously been mayor of the borough. It appeared that between the 19th June and the 31st Dec. 1874, six different orders were given to the defendant on the part of the town council for the supply of goods (tallow) by him, for the use of the corporation, the defendant, from time to time, sitting as alderman on the committee of the town council by which the resolutions were passed ordering the said goods to be supplied. These orders were in due course sent to the defendant's shop, and the goods therein specified were supplied by him. The bill or invoice showing the different transactions was subsequently sent in to the town council:

The amount of the account (13*l.* 10*s.*) was paid in one sum by the town council by cheque on the 6th May 1875, and the account was duly receipted and signed by the defendant. Subsequently, and previously to the commencement of this action, on the 11th June 1875, the defendant sat and acted five times as an alderman of the said borough without having been re-elected, and it was to recover penalties under sect. 53 of the Municipal Corporations Act, in respect of his so acting, he being disqualified to act under sect. 28 of the statute, that the present action was brought.

The learned judge being of opinion that the case came within the mischief pointed out by the Act, a verdict was found for the plaintiff for 250*l.*, being five penalties of 50*l.* each, and though leave to move was refused to the defendant by the learned judge, execution was nevertheless stayed to give him an opportunity of moving, if advised so to do.

A rule nisi was accordingly obtained by McIntyre, Q.C., on behalf of the defendant, during the last Michaelmas sittings, calling on the plaintiff to show cause why the verdict for him should not be set aside, and a new trial be had on the ground that the learned judge misdirected the jury in telling them that any supply of goods to the council was within sect. 28 of the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, and disqualified the defendant from being an alderman.

The following are the sections of the Municipal Corporations Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76) which are material:

Sect. 28: That no person shall be qualified to be elected, or to be a councillor or an alderman of any such borough . . . unless he shall be seised or possessed of real or personal estate, or both, to the following amount, that is to say . . . or during such time as he shall have, directly or indirectly, by himself or his partner, any share or interest in any contract or employment with, by, or on behalf of such council. Provided that no person shall be disqualified from being a councillor or alderman of any borough as aforesaid by reason of his being a proprietor or shareholder of any company which shall contract with the council of such borough for lighting or supplying with water, or insuring against fire, any part of such borough.

Sect. 52: Provided that if any person holding the office of mayor, alderman, or councillor for any borough shall be declared bankrupt . . . or being an alderman, shall be absent for more than six months at one and the same time (except in case of illness) from the borough of which he shall be . . . alderman or councillor, then, and in every such case, such person shall immediately become disqualified, and shall cease to hold the office of such . . . alderman or councillor as aforesaid. . . and the council thereupon shall forthwith declare the said office to be void, and shall signify the same by notice in writing under the hands of three or more of them, countersigned affixed by the town clerk, to be affixed in some public place within the borough, and the said office shall thereupon become void.

Sect. 53: That if any person shall act as mayor, alderman, or councillor . . . for any borough without making the declaration hereinbefore required in that behalf, or without being duly qualified at the time of making such declaration, or after he shall cease to be qualified according to the provisions of this Act, or after he shall become disqualified to hold any such office, he shall for every such offence forfeit the sum of 50*l.*, such sum to be recovered with full costs of suit by any person who will sue for the same within three months after the commission of such offence by action of debt or on the case in any of Her Majesty's Superior Courts of Record, &c. . .

Arthur Williams, with whom was The Solicitor-General (Sir H. S. Giffard, Q.C.) now showed cause for the plaintiff against the rule. It has not hitherto been decisively settled how far such a transaction as the present comes within the provisions of sects. 28 and 53 of the Municipal Corporations Act, and that is the question now to be decided. The plaintiff contends that as soon as the defendant first entered into this contract, on the 9th June 1874, he became disqualified, or ceased to be qualified, under sect. 28, and by acting afterwards, whilst so disqualified, became subject to the penalties imposed by sect. 53. [BRAMWELL, B.—Suppose after payment of the amount he had resigned, and had been re-elected?] That would be different, and is what he should have done. He must be re-elected in order to regain his qualification. The material question is whether the transaction here comes within the meaning of sect. 28, as being the "having any share or interest in any contract, &c." The section makes him at once disqualified on becoming interested, and during such time as he shall be so. There are many decisions upon this and similar statutory provisions passed with a view of preventing the corruptions ensuing from such transactions between officials of public bodies and corporations, and members while in office. There are statutes, for instance, relating to poor law guardians, turnpike trustees, and so on. Sect. 28 here differs in its terms from those other statutes. In Le Fewere v. Lankester (3 E. & B. 530; 23 L. J. 254, Q. B.), the defendant, an alderman of a municipal borough, to a district wholly comprised within which the Public Health Act 1848 was applied, and the corporation of which borough were constituted the Local Board of Health, contracted to supply the board with iron railings, and purchased the iron for the purpose of performing his contract; and afterwards, continuing to be an alderman, was elected mayor. In an action against him for penalties under sects. 28 and 53 of the present Act, for acting as mayor while disqualified by being interested in a contract with the council, it was held that it was not an interest in a contract within sect. 28, and there was no liability to penalties. In the course of the argument that point was disposed of by Crompton, J., who said: "This was an action under sect. 6 of the 55 Geo. 3, c. 137, the words of which are much more extensive than those of sect. 28 of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76. If the contract with those executing the works had been colourable, so that Lankester was really interested in the contract, it would be another affair. The fact that goods used in a contract were supplied by a member of the council may be evidence that he had a concealed interest in the contract, but nothing of the sort is found here, and it would be a very strange thing to hold a member of the council liable to penalties because in the ordinary course of trade a contractor bought articles at the member's shop." The distinction between that case, as stated by Crompton, J., and the present one is obvious. [BRAMWELL, B.—If you cite that case for the purpose of distinguishing it from the present one you need not do so, for we are all agreed as to that.] Technically speaking, no doubt the purchase of two pennyworth of nails over the counter is a contract, and would technically come within the terms of the section, but of course the section must be viewed and construed reasonably. The intention of the Legislature here was clearly to prevent any such transactions going on. The matter was substantially concluded by Nicholson v. Fields in this court (31 L. J. 233, Ex.; 7 H. & N. 810). There, in an action against a Town Commissioner, under a local Act, incorporating the Commissioners Clauses Act 1847, for acting as commissioner after disqualification, a bill made out by defendant and addressed to the commissioners, for lime supplied at different times and receipted by defendant, was held evidence for the jury that he was concerned in a contract within the Commissioners Clauses Act (10 & 11 Vict. c. 16, s. 9), and that he thereby became disqualified under sect. 15 of the same Act, which imposes a penalty on commissioners acting after having become disqualified. The words in the section of that Act are substantially the same as those here. All the objections possible to be raised to a transaction like the present are dealt with and got rid of in the judgments in that case. Pollock, C.B., expressly said that the smallness of the amount was immaterial, and had nothing to do with the question, for that every description of dealing by the commissioners was intended to be put an end to. Martin, B., too, thought that where articles were supplied on credit from time to time over the counter, though of small amount, there would be evidence of a contract; and Channell, B., said: "I think we are giving a very wholesome effect to a very important Act of Parliament, which is intended to guard against not only actual abuse, but any possibility of abuse, and that in so doing we give a reasonable construction to the Act, and one which we may reasonably suppose the Legislature intended, and that we should be defeating its intention unless we went the length we do in making this rule absolute." The wording of sect. 28 is peculiar. It should be read as putting two distinct alternatives. A man shall not be "qualified to be elected during such time, &c.," so that if elected, while a contract exists, he would be subject to penalties for acting without being duly qualified. The words "during, &c.," were put in to meet the contingency of election or re-election, and are solely applicable to that. The words "or to be an alderman," refer to the continuance of the qualification. Had it been properly framed the section would have had two branches; first, disqualifying from election during such time, &c.; and, secondly, it would have said, "and he shall cease to be an alderman," as in the Commissioners Clauses Act. The moment the defendant became disqualified he could not act until re-elected. The words "cease to be qualified" in sect. 53, mean when he becomes "disqualified," and for acting after becoming "disqualified" he is subject to the penalty. The office may not be vacant until he is removed by proceedings in the nature of a quo warranto; but he cannot act till purged by re-election. [AMPLETT, B., referred to sect. 52 as showing the meaning of the word "disqualified," and referred also to the property qualification of an alderman under the first part of sect. 28, and asked if an alderman on ceasing for a day or a week to have that qualification, though he should afterwards regain it, would require to be re-elected before he could act again.] It would seem to be the logical consequence that he must be re-elected. [AMPLETT, B.—Justices of the peace are under heavy penalties for acting without qualification, but it is laid down in Burns' Justice, that becoming disqualified by loss of property will not prevent a justice acting, without any fresh commission, after regaining his qualification.] A commission, which would have to be renewed at the pleasure of the Crown, differs from an exress statutory provision like the present. The proviso at the end of sect. 28 shows that the section means a disqualification operating upon his being an alderman. The object of the Legislature is very clear, and it would be entirely frustrated and the statute become illusory, if the defendant's contention and construction were to prevail. (He cited also Barber v. Waite (1 A. & E. 514; 3 Nev. & Man. 611), and the observations of Tauntou, J. there, as to the object of the Legislature in statutes of this kind.)

McIntyre, Q.C. and Coxon, for the defendant, contra, supported their rule, and contended that the real and true meaning of the words, "shall not be qualified to be elected, or to be," &c., "during the time," &c., is, that whilst a contract continues in

LEWIS v. CARR.

existence, whether for a long or short time, a man shall cease to be qualified to be elected, or to be qualified to act or to be an alderman, but that his office is not vacated; and sect. 52 greatly aids that argument by showing that when the Legislature intended the office should be vacant, and the man should cease to be an alderman, it used apt, proper, and distinct words to effect the object. Two sets of circumstances were in the mind of the Legislature, and those mentioned in sect. 52 are not alluded to in sect. 28. Certain qualifications necessary for election are specified in sect. 28, and then come the words of disqualification now before the court. No doubt, during the time of an existing contract a candidate for office would be disqualified for being elected; but if the contract were completed during the canvass, what is there to prevent his being qualified to be elected? So, if the contract be entered into by an alderman, though he may have been in a state of suspension during the progress of it, the moment it is completed he is free, and requires no re-election. Had it been otherwise the Act would have declared the office vacant, and have directed a new election. It may be that during the progress of the contract, a quo warranto might have issued against him to show cause by what right he was an alderman. The section relied on by the plaintiff means that he shall not sit or act as an alderman during the continuance of his interest in a contract, but that if that interest ceases the moment the contract is completed, and every thing has been performed under it, then the disqualification ceases, and he is no longer disqualified from being an alderman, and does not require re-election. Nicholson v. Fields (ubi sup.) cited by the plaintiff is completely distinguishable. There there was no temporary disqualification, but an absolute cesser of holding the office, and on attempting and claiming the right to exercise the functions of the office under such circumstances he properly came within the penalty clause in the Act of Parliament in that case. So here, if a bankrupt alderman were to act he would be liable under sect. 52 of the Act to all the penalties, because he had by express enactment, by becoming bankrupt, "ceased to be" an alderman, and "ceased to be qualified to be" one. But under sect. 28 it is not a continuing disqualification beyond the time when the contract is concluded. [BRAMWELL, B.—Suppose an alderman to have committed some disqualifying act, and no quo warranto to be applied for within a year, does he thereby get over the disqualification?] Certainly, it is thought that he would. The case in the Queen's Bench of Reg. v. Francis (18 Q. B. 526; 21 L. J. 304, Q. B.), is precisely in point upon that very question, and the effect of that case is that if a man continues in office for more than a year after the last dealing, he cannot be ousted upon a quo warranto. The disqualification here existed only during the continuance of the contract, and the liability to penalties must be commensurate with the continuance of the disqualification, and therefore the liability to penalties is only in respect of his acting during the time the contract continues. The section is, no doubt, obscurely worded, but being a highly penal one, it must be construed most favourably to the subject, who is not to be mulcted in a heavy penalty in the absence of very clear and distinct grounds for making him liable. [BRAMWELL, B.—

There is this to be said on the other hand, that this being a highly reprehensible practice, the words of the statute should not be unnecessarily strained in order to give a liberal interpretation in favour of the subject.] Had a casual sale like this been intended to be prevented it would have been done by express words. [BRAMWELL, B.—I am afraid the case of Nicholson v. Fields (ubi sup.) is against you so far as it decides that a dealing such as this is a contract within the statute.] The contrary is not here contended for, but, unless the Legislature has clearly shown its intention that a contract, although concluded and done within five minutes, is to operate as a thorough disqualification, and that a man cannot accept office, or act in office, except at the risk of these onerous penalties, then the defendant ought not to be held liable, and this rule ought to be made absolute.

BRAMWELL, B.—I think that this rule should be made absolute, as the plaintiff did not, in my opinion, prove his case. Whether the Legislature intended that such contracts should or should not be within the purview of the Act is another matter; but I think that if a shillingworth of stationery were bought of an alderman by or on behalf of the corporation, it would be a contract within the Act of Parliament between the corporation and that alderman. Probably, if the Legislature had intended it, they would have used the word "dealing," or some such expression. However, independently of any reasoning upon the matter, I think the case is concluded by that of Nicholson v. Fields (ubi sup.) where a somewhat similar contract was involved. In that case it was a bill for lime supplied to certain commissioners. In the present case it is a supply of candles or tallow. The question is whether the defendant's position comes within the 28th sect. of the Act. Now, where it is necessary that the case should be logically stated, either under the old system or under the more modern form of pleading, one cannot help getting some assistance, by referring to the mode of stating it adopted by the pleader; and I think that if we look at the declaration here, it will be found that the plaintiff has not proved his case. For what does the declaration say? It says that the borough of Macclesfield is a corporation within the Municipal Corporations Act, that the defendant claims to be an alderman of the borough, that before and at the time of the committing of the grievance he had become disqualified to hold the office of alderman of the borough. That has certainly not been proved; because Mr. Williams concedes that if he had put himself up for election as an alderman at the time the declaration is speaking of, he would undoubtedly have been qualified to hold the office. It is true that possibly he could not have put himself up at that time, because he was already in office, and perhaps could not be removed except by a quo warranto; but still, if in some way or other he had got out of office, he would not have been, as the declaration says he was, "disqualified to hold the office of alderman." The declaration then goes on and says, "to wit, by having a share and interest in certain contracts with the council of the said borough." Now I construe that to mean, and it is obviously its plain meaning, that at the time he committed the offence he had an interest in a contract. If it had meant "having had," it should have said so, but it does not. This, to my mind, shows

LEWIS v. CARR.

the facts properly and correctly; but it also satisfies me that the plaintiff has no case. Now, instead of dealing with the declaration, I will deal with the substance of the matter. It is alleged that the defendant by what he has done has brought himself within the 53rd section of this Act of Parliament. Before considering the 53rd section it will be as well to direct our attention to the 52nd section, to which my brother Amphlett referred during the argument, and pointed out that that section states what is a disqualification, namely, that if any person holding the office shall be declared a bankrupt, or if any of the other things therein mentioned shall happen, he shall immediately become disqualified, and shall cease to hold the office. The 53rd section is this, "That if any person shall act as mayor, alderman, or councillor, &c. . . without being duly qualified at the time of making the declaration thereinbefore required, or after he shall cease to be qualified according to the provisions of this Act, or after he shall become disqualified . . ." Now the defendant had not become "disqualified," because that means "disqualified" as previously stated, and that he had certainly not become. Therefore the question is, whether he had "ceased to be qualified according to the provisions of this Act." In order to ascertain whether he had "ceased to be qualified," Mr. Williams referred us to the 28th section of the Act, and said that that showed that he had "ceased to be qualified." Now let us see what that section does say. It says, "No person shall be qualified to be elected" (and Mr. Williams desired us for the moment to leave out the words "or to be, &c.") during such times as he shall have any share or interest in any contract, &c." If that were all, of course that would not do for Mr. Williams, because the defendant had no interest at the time he was elected; but then Mr. Williams goes on to say, "No person shall be qualified to be elected, or to be an alderman of the borough, during such time as he shall have any interest in any contract," &c. The meaning of that, he says, is that he shall not be elected if at the time of the election he is interested in a contract, and that he shall not "continue to be," during the time that he is so interested, an alderman of the borough. The learned counsel had some little difficulty to contend with in the words "during, &c." but he was not, I think, averse from adopting this mode of dealing with them, that is, either to say that some sense must be made of them in some way which it was not for him to point out, or that, at all events, if the words were to continue in, then we were to take them with this consequence, that inasmuch as the man cannot be an alderman during the time he shall have ceased to be de jure an alderman, and shall be liable to be turned out upon a quo warranto, and does not come into a lawful aldermanic condition, that is to say, he does not resume the aldermanic status lawfully on ceasing to be interested in a contract, therefore the 28th section was to be read thus: "He shall not be elected if he is interested at the time of the election, and if he become interested afterwards he shall cease to be an alderman de jure." Now I do not think that that ingenious argument is well founded. I am not at all sure that the meaning is not one that is very commonly and properly expressed by the preclusion of doubts in this way; the law maker supposes that it is not enough to say that the man shall not be elected, because it might be said "they ought not to elect him, but they have done so." And so it is not unfrequently guarded against by this sort of expression, "he shall not be elected, or, if elected, he shall not be"—so and so. I am not sure that the Legislature had any further meaning in the words they used in that section than that. But, supposing we were to put upon them the meaning which Mr. Williams says we ought to do, and were to read them thus, "he shall not be elected if, at the time of his election, he is interested in a contract, or if, after election, he become interested in a contract, he shall cease to be an alderman." Is that within the 53rd section? The 53rd section says (I say nothing now about disqualification, as I have already dealt with that, but the 53rd section says) "that if he shall act without being duly qualified" a certain thing shall happen; but if Mr. Williams's argument was stretched to the utmost, and every part were made to agree together, it does not follow that the defendant here has acted "without being." The argument proves not that he is "disqualified," but that he is not an alderman at all. Now, if the statute had said that he shall not act, not being an alderman, then Mr. Williams's argument might have gone a long way to prove that he was not de jure an alderman; but the 53rd section says, "without being qualified." But he was qualified, because it is conceded, and it is manifestly so, that if by any chance he got out of office, he could immediately get in again by making himself duly qualified. It is impossible to read these words as "not being," because these consequences would follow, that if there was an informality in the election, which would subject the man to be turned out upon a quo warranto, during all the time he would be subject to penalties. As far as I know, there is no provision in the Act of Parliament against that. If we hold that this section is to extend to the case of a man who is acting, and who is not de jure an alderman, there is nothing to prevent his being subject to penalties. Without, however, having recourse to Mr. Coxon's argument as to the indulgent way of dealing with the subject, and giving the utmost weight to the plaintiff's argument, it seems to me that sect. 28 only shows that the defendant was not de jure an alderman, and that sect. 53 imposes a penalty, not upon a person who is acting when not de jure, or de facto an alderman, but upon one who acts without being duly qualified at the time of making the required declaration, and that is not the case with the defendant. There is another argument which has incidentally arisen, and which seems to me to be strong to show that that must be the meaning of the statute. Mr. Williams, in answer to our question, what would be the consequences of sect. 28 being interpreted, as he said it ought to be, and whether the office was ipso facto void, or whether it could be made void upon a quo warranto, said that it was not ipso facto void, but that it would be vacated upon a quo warranto. Now observe the consequence. The quo warranto must be moved for within a year. Suppose it is not moved for within that period, then the man is an alderman, and de jure an alderman, and cannot be turned out, and yet he cannot act without being subject to penalties. That seems to be an inconsistency, and to demonstrate that the contention on the part of the plaintiff here cannot be maintained. But then it is said that we ought to deal with the words of these sections strictly, and to put upon them the construction for which the plaintiff has contended, because the consequence of not doing so would be very disastrous. I do not agree with that. I am by no means clear, as I said before, that the Legislature intended to deal with such a case as this in this way. I am very much inclined to think that if they had intended that such a case as this should be included in the section they would have used such a word as "dealing," or some such comprehensive expression. I think that very likely what they had in their minds was one of those continuing contracts, that is to say a contract for the supply of coal for a year or so, a contract to do a large job of building, or something of that kind, where a man may make a large profit if he has got friendly persons to contract with him; and I doubt very much whether the Legislature intended these words to comprehend the case of a trifling dealing over the counter, and where the price paid for the article was well known, though I think the words which they have used here will comprehend such a case. This is one of those cases where the law maker has had a general intent in his mind, and has realised his intent in a way which, if we look at either half of the enactment, perhaps we should say that he has not done it, but which, if we look at the whole, we should say that he has done it. I do not, for my own part, think that any of the disastrous consequences which have been pointed out will flow from our decision. Mr. Williams has suggested that if this were to be allowed we should have an alderman who is a stationer, on one day, giving an alderman who is a coal merchant an order, on different terms to those which he would allow to a member of the public, to supply coals, and that then the coals would be supplied and paid for, and thereupon the alderman, who is the coal merchant, would do the same good turn to the stationer. I doubt very much whether that is the sort of thing that was intended to be provided against or that was apprehended by the Act of Parliament as likely to take place. I really think that when the whole of the provision is looked at, it will be seen that the prohibition is against a man's acting during the continuance of a contract, and that that was the mischief which the Legislature intended to guard against, and that they were content that, after the contract was over, he should act, knowing that under those circumstances it would prevent the making of long contracts because of the disqualification penalty in the case of an alderman acting, and not caring much about prohibiting short contracts of this kind. Really I do not feel pressed by the difficulty which Mr. Williams put to us as to the policy of the Act of Parliament. Upon the words of the statute I think that there was no case to go to the jury, and consequently that this rule must be made absolute. There is, however, nothing to be tried, and I should suggest to the parties that they should have the point decided upon a special case; but if they cannot so arrange it, why of course it must go down again. No doubt they can carry it up to the Appeal Court; but supposing the Court of Appeal to agree with us, the only thing the parties could do would be to draw up an order for a new trial. I should think they had better agree upon a special case.

CLEASBY, B.—I have come to the same conclusion, feeling that to some extent the case is within the mischief pointed at by the statute, but feeling bound at the same time to give a somewhat strict interpretation to this penal section of it. I have not myself much doubt that this contract is not only within the mischief contemplated by the Act, but that it comes within the very terms of it. Considerable assistance is derived in construing the Act, from considering the terms of the subsequent statute of 15 Vict. c. 5, which explains the Act and amends it. In that latter statute there is the following clause: "That from and after the passing of this Act no person shall be deemed to have had or to have an interest in a contract or employment with, or on behalf of such council, commissioners, or trustees, by reason only of his having had or having a share or interest in any newspaper in which any advertisement relating to the affairs of any such borough, council, commissioners, or trustees may have been or may hereafter be inserted," which shows that it applies to single acts of that sort, and not to a permanent contract. It seems to me that without that Act of Parliament a mere contract of that description would have been sufficient. It was merely put in ex abundanti cautela, to prevent any such question arising. It seems to me to indicate some idea that the Act of Parliament would apply in the disqualification clause to a contract of that description. That being so, the question which we have to deal with arises, first of all, on the 53rd section, and then we shall have to refer to the 28th section. Now, the 53rd section, which imposes the penalty, enacts that the individual shall be exposed to the penalty if he acts "after he shall become disqualified to hold any such office." But these words must be read to mean, "after he shall become disqualified, and while he is disqualified." Now, it is conceded that although the defendant may be disqualified, it is not one of those permanent disqualifications which attaches to a person for a particular period, as is the case in respect of some other matters; but that he might be re-elected, and that he might be, after such re-election, entitled to act, and, therefore, the 53rd section must necessarily (and I do not think that that has been disputed at all) be read as if it had in it the words, "and while he is disqualified," and as if it made the penalty attach if he acted while his disqualification existed. That will throw us back upon what I will call the qualification or disqualification power, that is to say, the 28th section. Whilst saying, in the first instance, that I have myself not the least doubt that, notwithstanding those disqualifications which have been referred to here, the office would continue full—indeed, it is pretty plain, under the 52nd sect., which has been already referred to, the language of which is much stronger and which says that "the Council shall thereupon declare the office to be void, and shall signify the same by a notice in writing," and so on, to be affixed in a particular way, "and the said office shall thereupon become void;" there is very little doubt that until that course has been pursued the office is not void, and looking at the words of the statute the course pointed out thereby must be strictly followed. That, I think, is quite clear. We come then to the real difficulty in the construction of the 28th section, viz., the introduction into it of the words "during, &c." It is said that in reading this section it would be giving due effect to it, and not be rejecting anything in it if we were to read it thus: "He shall not be qualified to be elected, or to act as an alderman during, &c." That would, no doubt, to a certain extent, be departing from the language of the Act, because the words are "or to be," &c. Then if we are to read it so as to give some effect to the words, "during such time," &c., we must in some way deal with those words "during, &c." The learned counsel for the defendant has been unable to do that, and was rather in a difficulty to suggest any form of expression to carry this provision into effect, except by a total alteration of the language, so as to obtain the effect which he sought to give to it. I do not feel myself bound to reject the word "during," nor to give a different effect to it with reference to the different parts of the clause; and giving to the word, when applied to the words "qualified to be elected," that meaning which is suggested as the proper one, I do not conceive that without some stronger reason than has been shown we should be justified in giving a different meaning to it when applied to the words "or to be," &c. We must give a reasonable meaning to the words, and though I feel rather more strongly than my brother Bramwell does with regard to our looking at the mischief which the Act of Parliament was intended to remedy, still I think it is manifest in this instance, particularly, as is often the case in others, that the Legislature has only imperfectly remedied the mischief. The law does not allow us to introduce words in order to explain the meaning of an Act of Parliament. I am of opinion, therefore, that it is not made out in this case that the acting by the defendant as alderman alleged in the declaration, took place under the circumstances of disqualification mentioned in the Act of Parliament, and, therefore, that the defendant's rule must be made absolute.

LEWIS v. CARR.

AMPLETT, B.—I am of the same opinion. I was present when the rule was moved for, and my mind at that time was so much impressed with the view that the case was within the mischief pointed at by the statute, that I was inclined to adopt what Mr. Williams stated to be the "common-sense view" of the matter; but I have now heard his very able argument in favour of the plaintiff, and I confess that further consideration has had upon my mind the reverse effect of that which he intended, and the result is that I have come, at the close of the argument, I will not say to a clear, but, to my mind, a satisfactory opinion, that this case does not fall within the statute. This being a penal statute we must look not only, on the one side, at the mischief intended to be remedied, but also on the other side, we must consider that persons are not to be made subject to penalties unless the offence charged is clearly brought within the purview of the statute. If we look at the words of the section they seem, as they stand, intelligible enough, and to require no violent interpretation to give a sensible effect to them. What the section says is that "no person shall be qualified to be elected, or to be an alderman, during the time that he shall have an interest in a contract," that is, if he is interested in a contract at the time of the election he shall not be qualified to be elected, and if he should afterwards become so interested he shall not be qualified to be an alderman during such time as he shall be so interested. It has been submitted to us that he does not "cease to be" an alderman, but that he is not qualified de jure to act as, or to be an alderman, and therefore "that he might be removed by a quo warranto." That gives a plain and intelligible meaning to the words, and I do not see why we are to travel out of them in order to give a more extensive effect to the clause than it would otherwise have; and I am confirmed in that opinion by seeing that in the same clause (sect. 28) it is said, and almost in the same words, that "no person shall be qualified to be elected, or to be a councillor, unless he shall have a certain property qualification," which is therein specified. Then Mr. Williams would say, and consistently with his argument he could not say otherwise, that if the person had the proper property qualification at the time of his election, but afterwards for a few days, or a day, or even for a single moment, ceased to have it, although he never acted during the time he had no property qualification at all, then if he subsequently re-acquired a property qualification, yet, nevertheless, he would be subject to penalties for acting, and that the only way of getting rid of his disqualification would be by re-election, although the statute did not at all point to the necessity of such re-election. Now all that the statute requires with regard to property qualification is, that when a man acts as alderman he shall have a certain qualification. It is difficult, therefore, to say that if he has ceased to have such qualification, by reason of some circumstance happening after his election, and he has subsequently re-acquired it, that he would still be liable to penalties; that is to say, that he would have ceased de jure to be an alderman. The case is, I think, as I pointed out to the learned counsel in the course of the argument, very analogous to that of a justice of the peace. Now it is enacted by the 18 Geo. 2, c. 20, s. 1, that from and after a certain date there specified, no person shall be capable of being a "justice of the peace, or of acting as such, for any county, &c.," unless he has the property qualification of the nature and amount therein specified, and by the 3rd section, "any person, who shall act as a justice of the peace for any county, &c. . . without being qualified according to the true intention and meaning of this Act, shall for every such offence forfeit the sum of 100*l.*, such penalty to be recovered by anyone who chooses to sue for it." It has been argued that, although the Act says that no person shall be capable of being justice of the peace unless qualified, &c., yet if, after becoming a justice of the peace he ceases to have the qualification which he originally possessed, he still remains a justice of the peace, and his acts are not void, but that he is liable to the penalty. I have looked minutely at the law as it is stated on the subject in Burns' Justice of the Peace—a work of high authority on the subject—and though no cases are there cited, it is there stated that it has been decided, although the actual point was not before the court, that "if a justice of the peace has become disqualified, and afterwards obtains a proper qualification, then he may act without having a new commission," that is to say, he may act as a justice of the peace without being subject to the penalties of the statute. That seems to be very analogous to the case now before the court. However that may be, I think the proper course is to abide by the words which can bear a sensible meaning, and not to have recourse to that which Mr. Williams invites us to do, namely, either to omit the words "during, &c.," or to put in other words such as "cease to be," which would, I think, do violence to the section. And now, just one word with respect to sect. 52, which I think affords an argument that the Legislature had in their minds a distinction between what they considered to be more prejudicial conduct on the part of a mayor and aldermen than that comprised under the 28th section; because by sect. 52 it is enacted that "when a person holding the office of alderman or councillor shall be declared bankrupt, &c., or shall be absent for more than six months at one and the same time (unless in case of illness) from the borough of which he shall be alderman or councillor, not that he shall be disqualified from being elected or from being an alderman or councillor, but that he "shall thereupon immediately become disqualified, and shall cease to hold the office of alderman or councillor as aforesaid," and that the office shall thereupon be declared by the council to be void, and provision is then thereby made for filling up such vacancy. Now, the language of sects. 28 and 53 is very different from this, and it is indeed admitted by Mr. Williams, that in this case, there was no actual vacancy in the office. In my opinion the present case does not come within the words of sects. 28 or 53, and the defendant's rule, therefore, ought to be made absolute.

GLEAVES v. MARRINER.

GLEAVES v. MARRINER.

Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Act (34 & 35 Vict. c. 45), ss. 29 and 53—Avoidance of the living—Dilapidations—Liability of last incumbent—Time in which surveyor to inspect and report—Bishop's order.

The defendant, who was the incumbent of a benefice, resigned, and within three months of such resignation the bishop of the diocese directed the surveyor of the diocese to inspect the buildings and premises which were out of repair.

After the expiration of the three months the surveyor inspected the buildings, and made his report to the bishop, who thereupon, under the Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Act 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 43), made an order upon the defendant for the costs of the repairs.

The new incumbent having brought an action upon this order against the late incumbent, the latter pleaded that the surveyor neither inspected nor reported to the bishop within three calendar months after the avoidance of the benefice, as required by sect. 29 of 34 & 35 Vict. c. 43.

Held, that this was no defence to the action, for the three months mentioned by the section do not refer to the time within which the surveyor is required to make his report to the bishop, but to the time within which the bishop is to give his direction to the inspector.

(a) The plaintiff has given notice of his intention to appeal from the above decision.

Semble, that the section is only directory even as regards the time within which the bishop is to give his direction to the inspector.

This was an action brought by the present incumbent of a living against the late incumbent, to recover the sum of 314*l.* 13*s.*, which he had been ordered by the bishop to pay for dilapidations pursuant to the Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Act of 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 43).

The defendant, amongst other pleas, pleaded, that the surveyor did not inspect the buildings within three calendar months after the avoidance of the benefice, in accordance with sect. 29, and that the surveyor did not report to the bishop what sum was required to make good the dilapidations for which the defendant was liable within three calendar months after the avoidance of benefice, as required by the Act.

The plaintiff demurred thereto.

Cave, Q.C. and F. H. Scott for the plaintiff.—The pleas are bad upon two grounds, either of which is sufficient to support the demurrer. Sect. 29 says that "Within three calendar months after the avoidance of any benefice after the commencement of this Act, unless the late incumbent shall under this Act be free from all liability to dilapidations, the bishop shall direct the surveyor, who shall inspect the buildings of such benefice, and report to the bishop what sum, if any, is required to make good the dilapidations to which the late incumbent or his estate is liable." Sects. 30 to 35 relate to the sending in of the surveyor's report, and the making the order by the bishop for the payment of the sum as found by the surveyor. Sect. 36. "The sum stated in the order as the costs of the repairs shall be a debt due from the late incumbent, his executors or administrators, to the new incumbent, and shall be recoverable at law or in equity." Sect. 53. "No sum shall be recoverable for dilapidations in respect of any benefice becoming vacant after the commencement of this Act, and to which this Act shall apply, unless the claim for such sum be founded on an order made under the provisions of this Act." The limitation of three months mentioned in sect. 29 can only apply to the bishop. It cannot apply to the surveyor, for, supposing the bishop away from home at the time of the avoidance, it might be impossible to communicate with him in time for the surveyor to inspect and report within the three months. Secondly, the section is only directory, and not absolutely imperative; if this were not so, the plaintiff's remedy would be barred by a delay in the bishop over whom he has no control, as, by sect. 53, he can only recover upon an order made by the bishop. [He was then stopped.]

Manisty, Q.C. and Forbes for the defendant.—Before the passing of the Act, the universal practice was to settle the question of dilapidations immediately after the death or resignation of the incumbent, and this Act was merely in substitution of the old practice. The object of the Act is to insure that there should be a speedy inspection and report as to the dilapidations, and there is an obvious reason for such a course, as the dilapidations increase by time, and the liability of the estate of the late incumbent would be much larger if the time within which the inspection was to be made was unlimited. When a benefice is full, and under sequestration, sects. 12, 13 and 14 say that the surveyor shall inspect "as soon as conveniently may be" after the bishop's direction, because in such a case speed is of no great consequence. The difference between the language used here and that used in sect. 29 shows very plainly what was meant by the Act when a benefice is avoided.

Cave, Q.C. was not called upon to reply.

BRAMWELL, B.—This is a very plain case. The limitation of time is not in respect of the surveyor. The words of the section are, "Within three calendar months after the avoidance of any benefice, &c., &c., the bishop shall direct the surveyor, who shall inspect the buildings of such benefice, and report to the bishop," &c., &c. If the words had been "and the surveyor shall inspect," &c., there might have been a possibility of suggesting that the three months applied to the time within which the surveyor was to inspect and report; but even then I doubt if they would apply. Beside this—and it is not to be supposed that I say anything to the contrary—there is the question whether the limitation of three months is anything more than directory, even as regards the time within which the bishop is to direct the surveyor.

CLEASBY, B.—I am of the same opinion. It would be strange if the plaintiff were to lose his right against the late incumbent because the bishop delays directing the surveyor until the three months are nearly expired, so that the surveyor has no time to inspect and report within the three months.

AMPHLETT, B.—I am of the same opinion. I am far from saying that if from accident, necessity, or some other cause, the bishop omitted to direct the surveyor within the three months, the late incumbent's estate would be free. Our judgment must, therefore, be for the plaintiff.

Nuisances — Chimney emitting black smoke — Nuisances Removal Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 121), ss. 12, 13, 14—23 & 24 Vict. c. 77, s. 13—Sanitary Act 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 90), s. 19—Order for abatement of nuisance—Order prohibiting its recurrence—Two convictions for same offence under the two orders.

An order for the abatement of a nuisance caused by the sending forth black smoke from a chimney having been made on E. in 1871, under the Nuisances Removal Act 1855 and the Sanitary Act 1866, and another order prohibiting the recurrence of the nuisance having upon the complaint of B., under the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 77, s. 13, been made on E. in respect of the same chimney in 1874, E. was afterwards, in 1875, convicted and fined on each of two informations then laid against him, for having by one and the same act of sending forth black smoke from the said chimney in Feb. 1875, disobeyed the said two orders respectively.

Held by the Court (Kelly C.B. and Cleasby and Pollock BB.) that E. could not be convicted twice in respect of an offence which was identically the same in each case, and that one of such two convictions, therefore, must be quashed.

THESE were two special cases stated by the justices of Halifax, under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the opinion of the court on appeal from two several orders of justices convicting the appellant under the circumstances hereinafter stated. By consent the two cases were heard together, and so far as is material for the present purpose, the facts were shortly as follows:

The appellant and his partner, George Briggs, carried on business as dyers at Sowerby Bridge, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, and in March 1871, they were summoned before the justices on an information charging that on a certain day therein named they did send forth black smoke from a certain chimney belonging to premises occupied by them (not being the chimney of a dwelling house) in such quantity as to be a nuisance, contrary to the provisions of the Nuisances Removal Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 121), and the Sanitary Act 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 90), which makes the Act of 1855 apply to smoke. The persons charged on this information did not appear on the return day of the summons, the 11th March 1871, and thereupon an order was made for the abatement of the nuisance under sects. 12 and 13 of the Act of 1855, which order, after reciting the information, proceeded as follows: "Upon proof . . . that the nuisance so complained of doth exist on the premises, and that the same is caused by the act or default of the said R. Edleston and G. Briggs, we, in pursuance of the Acts, do order the said R. Edleston and G. Briggs within one calendar month from the service of this order, or a true copy thereof according to the Act, to cease to send forth black smoke from the chimney aforesaid, so that the same shall no longer be a nuisance or injurious to health. And if the above order of abatement be not complied with, then we authorise and require the said John Barnes from time to time to enter upon the premises, and to do all such works, matters, and things as may be necessary for carrying this order into execution."

In March 1874, an information was laid under sect. 13 of the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 77 (under which the proceedings are similar to those under the Nuisances Removal Act 1855, but the complaint may be by an inhabitant) against the appellant and his partner G. Briggs, for sending forth black smoke from a certain chimney belonging to the premises occupied by them (not being the chimney of a private dwelling house) in such quantity as to be a nuisance, and that such nuisance was likely to recur.

The existence of the nuisance complained of was proved before the justices at the hearing of the information on the 14th March 1874, and the justices were of opinion that the same or a similar nuisance was likely to recur, and they accordingly made an order for the prohibition of the said nuisance in the following terms: "We, in pursuance of the statute in such case made and provided, do order the said R. Edleston and G. Briggs within fourteen days from the service of this order, or a true copy thereof according to the statutes,

Ex. Div.]

EDLESTON (app.) v. BARNEY (resp.).

to discontinue the said nuisance; and we further, in pursuance of the said statutes, do prohibit the recurrence of the said nuisance."

On the 26th April 1875, two informations were laid by the respondent against the appellant, in which it was alleged that he, on the 9th Feb. 1875, unlawfully had not obeyed the order of abatement of the 11th March 1871, and the order of prohibition of the 14th March 1874, respectively. On the hearing of the first of these informations it was proved that on the 9th Feb. 1875, between the hours of ten and eleven o'clock in the forenoon, black smoke was emitted from the chimney for a period of eight minutes, in a quantity sufficient to be a nuisance, and the appellant was convicted and fined in a penalty of ten shillings and costs for disobedience to the order of abatement of the 11th March 1871. And immediately afterwards, upon exactly the same evidence, he was convicted and fined in a penalty of twenty shillings and costs for disobedience to the order of prohibition of the 14th March 1874.

The appellant contended that it was not competent to the justices to convict him twice, as the disobedience to both orders was by the same act. He also raised the point that as the orders had been made against him and one G. Briggs jointly, the respondent could not proceed against him alone, but as no reliance was placed by counsel for the appellant on this point, it is not necessary further to allude to it.

The question for the opinion of the court is whether the appellant could be so convicted twice in respect of the same penalty.

The appellant's points.—First, that the order for prohibition of the 14th March 1874, merged the order for abatement of the 11th March 1871, and from the time of the latter order having been made no penalty could be inflicted for contravention of the prior order; secondly, that the two informations of the 26th April 1875, for contravening the orders of 11th March 1871, and 14th March 1874 respectively, were laid in respect of one and the same act of nuisance alleged to have been committed, and that the appellant could not be convicted twice for the same act; thirdly, that concurrent penalties could not be inflicted for the same acts, although the acts might have been done in contravention of both orders, but that the respondent should have elected to proceed for penalties for disobedience to the one or the other order.

The respondents' points.—The order for abatement was a valid and subsisting order in which separate and successive convictions might be made for separate acts of disobedience: (Reg. v. Waterhouse, 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 761; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 545.) Secondly, that the order for prohibition did not supersede or vacate the order for abatement; thirdly, that the offence under the order for abatement is constituted by the unlawful neglect to cease committing the nuisance, but the offence under the order for prohibition consists in knowingly and wilfully disobeying the order, and the same act may, therefore, be an offence against both orders.

The following sections of the Nuisances Removal Act 1865 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 121) are material.

Sect. 12 enables the local authority to cause complaint to be made of any nuisance, and "if it be proved to the justices' satisfaction that the nuisance exists, or did exist at the time when the notice was given, or if removed or discontinued since the notice was given, that it is likely to recur, or be repeated, the justices shall make an order in writing under their hands and seals for the abatement or discontinuance and prohibition of the nuisance as hereinafter mentioned."

Sect. 13. Gives authority to the justices to order work necessary to abate the nuisance, and if the justices are of opinion that such or the like nuisance is likely to recur, they may further prohibit the recurrence of it, and direct the works necessary to prevent such recurrence.

Sect. 14. "Any person not obeying the order of abatement, shall, if he fail to satisfy the justices that he had used due diligence to carry out such order, be liable for every such offence to a penalty of not more than 10s. per day during his default; and any person knowingly and wilfully acting contrary to the order of prohibition shall be liable for every such offence to a penalty not exceeding 20s. per day during such contrary action."

By the Sanitary Act 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 90), s. 19, the word "nuisance" under the Nuisances Removal Acts includes "any chimney (not being the chimney of a private dwelling house) sending forth black smoke in such quantity as to be a nuisance."

Maule, Q.C. for the appellant.—The conviction for disobedience to the order of abatement is good, but the other conviction for disobeying the order of prohibition is bad, and should be quashed. Both convictions are for one and the same act, and the evidence given in support of the second conviction is identically the same as that by which the first conviction was procured. Both, therefore, cannot be allowed to stand, for the appellant would then be punished twice for the same offence.

Anstie for the respondent, contra.—Cumulative penalties are given by the statute, and on the proper construction of the statutes the single act of the 9th Feb. 1875, constituted two distinct offences, and therefore both convictions should be upheld. There is a difference between the two cases; disobedience to an order of abatement is an offence and punishable where the party has failed to use due diligence to comply with the order; and disobedience to an order of prohibition is an offence when the party prohibited knowingly and wilfully acts contrary thereto. Here the fact of the penalties being different shows that the two offences committed by the appellant are separate and distinct. He referred also to

Kelly, C.B.—It is perfectly clear to my mind that one of these two convictions must be quashed. Taking the two statutes together, the result in substance is that the Legislature has made the causing or permitting the issue of black smoke from any chimney, not being the chimney of a private dwelling house, in such quantities as to be a nuisance, illegal and an offence. That is the offence which the appellant has committed in this case, and power is given to the justices under sect. 12 of the Act of 1855 to order such a nuisance to be abated, and any person disobeying an order for the abatement of such nuisance is liable for every such offence to a penalty not exceeding 10s. a day during his default. But the statute also gives further power to the justices to prohibit by order the recurrence of the nuisance in future, and imposes upon any person knowingly and wilfully acting contrary to such order of prohibition, a penalty not exceeding 20s. a day during such contrary action. In the case which has been referred to of Reg. v. Waterhouse (ubi sup.), in the Court of Queen's Bench, the order there, which, like the earlier order here, was called an order of abatement, was treated as infringed on each occasion that black smoke issued. But I think it is pretty clear, from the construction which was put upon it by the Court of Queen's Bench, and especially by Blackburn, J., that that order was also in effect an order for the prohibition of the recurrence of the nuisance; and to that part of the order the judgment of the court gave effect. Now I cannot help thinking that any nuisance which existed so long ago as 1871, and was at that date directed by an order of justices to be abated, must have been abated a long time ago, and that the only way in which that order can be treated as having been disobeyed in 1874 is by construing it as an order of prohibition. The later order of 1874 was certainly an order of prohibition, or, at all events, it was an order for prohibition as well as abatement; and in 1875 two informations were lodged against the appellant, one for disobeying the order of abatement, the other for disobeying the order of prohibition. The appellant, I think, was justly and rightly convicted of disobeying the order of prohibition made in 1874, and that conviction should, I think, be affirmed; but as to the other conviction for disobedience to the order of abatement made so long ago as the year 1871, I am of opinion that that conviction should be quashed. But as the learned counsel for the appellant is desirous that the later conviction should be quashed, and the earlier one should stand, we see no objection to that course being taken, and so therefore it will be.

Codd (app.) v. Cabb (resp.).

CLEASBY, B.—I also am of opinion that one of these convictions must be quashed. There is some difficulty in this case in applying the language of sect. 12 of the Act of 1855 to a nuisance that is made such by the Act of 1866, as interpreted by the Court of Queen's Bench. Under the Act of 1855 alone there would be little or no difficulty in applying the two penalties with regard to the nuisances with which that Act deals. The nuisances there enumerated are existing things, as, for instance, urinals, dust heaps, dung hills, and other accumulations of filth or refuse, and not certain acts done, producing certain results which are called nuisances. Nuisances, when ascertained by the local board to exist, are dealt with in sect. 12 in a precise way, and provision is made for the case of their being likely to recur, or to be repeated. Power is given, with this probability of a recurrence of the nuisance in view, for making two sets of orders, the one abating the nuisance itself as existing at the time, the other prohibiting its recurrence or repetition at any future time. What is made a nuisance by the Sanitary Act of 1866 is something of the same kind as those things which are dealt with in the Act of 1855. The Court of Queen's Bench, however, in Reg. v. Waterhouse (ubi sup.), held that the nuisance is the act of emitting black smoke, and so, therefore, there cannot be two convictions, inasmuch as there is only one condition—namely, the causing black smoke to be emitted, to which this state of things can be applicable. One of these convictions, therefore, must certainly be quashed.

POLLOCK, B.—The question which we have to determine here is whether the appellant ought to be convicted twice, and I am of opinion that he ought not to be. It is clear that there were two orders made, the one in 1871 and the other in 1874, and no doubt, therefore, logically speaking, as Mr. Anstie has argued, what was done by the appellant on the 9th Feb. 1875, was done by him in disobedience to both those orders, but, that being so, then comes the question whether the evidence being precisely and identically the same in each case, there can be two offences which can be dealt with concurrently, and visited with cumulative penalties. I think there cannot. I am far, however, from saying that that can never happen. It is quite possible that a man may, by one and the same act, violate the provisions of the revenue law, and of some other law. But here the statutes are in pari materia, the orders are in pari materia, and the conduct complained of in each information is the same. I am of opinion that one of these convictions should be quashed, and that our judgment, therefore, must be in favour of the appellant.

Peace officer—Execution of office—Warrant—Trespass in search of game—Illegal arrest.

A warrant for neglecting to appear to a summons for trespass in search of coney, under 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32 s. 30, was issued against the appellant, directed to all the peace officers in the county. The respondent, a peace officer in the county, met the appellant and said he apprehended him under this warrant, but the warrant was not in his possession at the time. The appellant resisted, and having severely injured the respondent, escaped, but afterwards surrendered himself. The justices fined him 10s. for the trespass, and sentenced him to six months' hard labour for assaulting the respondent in the execution of his office.

Held, upon a case stated, that the arrest under the circumstances would not have been in the execution of the respondent's office, and that the conviction for assault must be quashed.

THIS was a case stated by three justices of the peace in and for the County of Devon under the stat. 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the purpose of

(a) The judgments of the court as entered were that the conviction for disobedience to the order of abatement of the 11th March, 1871, should be confirmed, and that the conviction for disobedience to the order of prohibition of the 11th March, 1874, should be quashed.

obtaining the opinion of the court on a question of law which arose before them as hereinafter stated.

At a petty sessions holden at the Guildhall in Totnes, in and for the division of Stanborough and Coleridge, in the county of Devon on the 20th Dec. 1875, an information, preferred by Alfred Cabe (hereinafter called the respondent), against Wm. Codd (hereinafter called the appellant) charging for that he (the said appellant) on the 16th Oct. 1875, at the parish of East Portlemouth in the said County of Devon, unlawfully did assault the said respondent, he being then one of the constables for the said county of Devon duly appointed and in the due execution of his office and duty as such constable, was heard and determined by the said justices, the said parties respectively being then present; and upon such hearing the appellant was duly convicted before them of the said offence, and they adjudged him to be imprisoned in the county gaol at Exeter in the said county of Devon, and there to be kept to hard labour for the space of six months. And the appellant being dissatisfied with such determination in point of law, applied to the said justices in writing to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and grounds of such determination for the opinion of this court. The said justices, in compliance with the said application, stated and signed the following case:—

On the 2nd April 1874, an information was laid before Richard Huxham Watson Esq., one of Her Majesty's Justices of the Peace for the county of Devon, by Wm. Hodge, of the parish of Berry Pomeroy, in the said county, woodman, against the appellant; for that he the said appellant on the 31st March 1874 at the said parish of Berry Pomeroy, did unlawfully commit a certain trespass by being in the day time of the same day upon a certain close of land in the possession and occupation of His Grace the Duke of Somerset, there in search of coney, and there without the licence or consent of the owner of the land so trespassed upon, or of any person having the right of killing the game upon such land, or of any other person having any right to authorise the said appellant to enter or be upon the said land for the purpose aforesaid." And the said justice thereupon issued a summons under his hand and seal requiring the appellant to appear on Monday, the 6th April 1874, at the hour of eleven o'clock in the forenoon, at the Guildhall in Totnes in the said county of Devon, before such justices of the peace for the said county as might then be there to answer to the said information, and to be further dealt with according to law.

On the same day a second information was laid before the said Richard Huxham Watson, Esq., by the said Wm. Hodge against the appellant, "for that he the said appellant on the 31st March 1874, at the said parish of Berry Pomeroy, unlawfully did assault and beat the said Wm. Hodge contrary, &c.," and the said justice thereupon issued another summons under his hand and seal, requiring the appellant to appear at the same time and place as mentioned above to answer the charge of assault. The appellant was duly served with the summonses.

On the 6th April 1874, the said William Hodge appeared before the justices at the Guildhall in Totnes at the required time, but the appellant did not attend, and a warrant for his apprehension for disobeying the aforesaid summons was on that day issued by the bench and placed in the hands of the Devon county constables. The said warrant was as follows:—

To the constables of the parish of Stoke Gabriel, in the county of Devon, and to all other peace officers in the same county.

Devon, to wit. Whereas William Codd, late of the said parish of Stoke Gabriel, miner, has been duly summoned to appear before Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said county assembled at the Guildhall in Totnes, in the said county, on this 6th April 1874, at eleven o'clock in the forenoon, to answer an information laid against him, for that he, the said Wm. Codd, with one John Marshall, on the 31st March last, at the parish of Berry Pomeroy, in the said county, did unlawfully commit a certain trespass by being in the daytime on certain lands there situate in search of coney, without having first obtained proper authority. And whereas the said Wm. Codd hath neglected to be or appear at the time and place so appointed by the said summons, although it hath now been proved upon oath to me, the undersigned, that the said summons hath been duly served upon the said Wm. Codd.

These are therefore to command you in Her Majesty's name forthwith to apprehend the said Wm. Codd, and to bring him before me or some other of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said county, to answer unto the said information, and to be further dealt with according to law.

Given under my hand and seal this 6th day of April 1874, at Totnes, in the said county.

J. FINCHER TRIST. (L.S.)

The appellant was a miner, and then resided in the parish of Stoke Gabriel, which adjoins the parish of Berry Pomeroy, where the alleged offences were committed.

In accordance with the usual regulation when a warrant is issued by a magistrate for the apprehension of a person, the constables throughout the county were informed through the chief constable for the county of Devon that a warrant was in existence for the apprehension of the appellant.

It was proved on oath before the said justices at the hearing that the appellant was not met with by the police until the 16th Oct. 1875, when the respondent in uniform met him in the parish of East Portlemouth, in the said county of Devon, and said to him, "Is your name Wm. Codd?" The appellant answered, "Yes." The respondent then said, "I apprehend you under a warrant for not appearing at a Totnes Petty Sessions to answer a summons, and you must go with me." The appellant said in reply, "Not to day."

There was no evidence that the appellant made any demand whatsoever to see the warrant, but the warrant at that time was not in the personal possession of the respondent.

Upon the respondent attempting to apprehend the appellant, he was thrown down and rendered insensible for half an hour, and during that time the appellant made his escape.

On the 13th Dec. 1875, the appellant surrendered himself, and on the following day he was remanded and was ordered to be brought before the county magistrates sitting at the Totnes Guildhall on the 20th of the same month, which was done.

At the hearing of the three cases on the 20th Dec. 1875 at Totnes, the appellant pleaded guilty to the coney trespass, and the said justices convicted him, and adjudged him to pay the sum of 10s. by way of penalty and costs. The appellant paid the amounts.

Codd (app.) v. CABB (resp.).

[DIV. APP.]

The said justices dismissed the second charge against the appellant of assaulting and beating the said William Hodge on the said 31st March 1874; and for the third charge made by the respondent against the appellant for assaulting him whilst in the execution of his office and duty as constable, they convicted him and adjudged him to be imprisoned in the Devon County Gaol, and there to be kept with hard labour for six months.

After the respondent in the third charge and his witnesses had been examined, the attorney for the appellant took the following objection:

That the attempted arrest was illegal, because the warrant of the 6th April 1874 was not in the possession of the respondent when he attempted to arrest the appellant, and therefore he was not in the execution of his duty as constable at the time he so attempted to arrest him.

There was no denial of the assault being made by the appellant on the respondent, and the said justices were satisfied that a very serious assault had been committed, and they convicted and sentenced him as before mentioned.

The appellant's attorney applied for a case under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, on the point of law raised, and the justices agreed to grant the same, and submit for the opinion of this court the question, Whether the warrant of the 6th April 1874, having been issued by a justice of the peace for the county of Devon for the apprehension of the appellant for disobeying a summons, and being in the hands of the Devon county constabulary, the respondent, as one of the officers of the same force, then on duty in uniform, but not having the warrant in his own personal possession at the time of the attempted arrest, was legally justified in attempting to arrest the appellant.

April 28.—St. Aubyn argued for the appellant.—Galliard v. Laxton (31 L. J. 123, M. C.) is a case exactly in point, and the considered judgment of Wightman, J. is a clear authority that this conviction was wrong. He said at p. 127, "We have already expressed our opinion that, if requested, the officers were bound to produce the warrant; and if so the keeping in custody after such request and non-compliance would not be legal; and it could hardly be contended that the arrest itself could be legal, though the detention, under the circumstances above supposed, would be illegal; and in this view of the case it appears to us that the officers were bound to have the warrant ready to be produced, if required, and that if they had it not, the arrest would not be legal. If an action had been brought against the officers for making the arrest, and they had pleaded a plea of justification under the warrant, they must, according to all the precedents, have pleaded that it was delivered to them to be executed; and though it is not stated in the precedents that they had actual possession at the time of the arrest, it is to be presumed from the allegation of delivery to them that they continued to hold it."

McKellar, contra, in support of the conviction.—Galliard v. Laxton was an arrest under a warrant for disobedience to a bastardy order, which is merely a civil process. The report of the case, (2 B. & S. 363), expressly limits the decision to a warrant of that nature; the argument for the appellant and the remarks upon it were chiefly addressed to warrants or writs between individual subjects; and the judgment itself distinguishes the facts of the case from an arrest upon a warrant for felony. Wightman, J. says, at p. 372, "As they were obviously police constables we think that they were not bound in the first instance to produce the warrant at the time they made the arrest, but that as this was not a charge of felony, but rather in the nature of a civil than of a criminal proceeding, the warrant ought to have been produced, if required, and that an arrest without without such production would not be legal." The charge against the appellant here was made under 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, s. 30, by which it is enacted, "That if any person whatsoever shall commit any trespass by entering or being, in the day time, upon any land in search of or pursuit of game, or woodcocks, snipes, quails, land rails, or coney, such person shall, on conviction thereof before a justice of the peace, forfeit and pay such sum of money, not exceeding two pounds, as to the justice shall seem meet, together with the costs of the conviction." This is not the less a criminal charge because the penalty is only a fine; it has been held that offences under this Act are criminal offences, and that the penalties are not in the nature of civil claims; Cattell v. Ireson (1 E. & B. 19). Moreover, in the case of Galliard v. Laxton, no counsel appeared for the respondent, and it is difficult to understand how the authorities there cited justify the conclusion of the court. Mack-alley's case (Coke's Reps. vol. 5, part 9, p. 65, b) was a charge of murder for killing an officer about to arrest a debtor on civil process: "It was answered and resolved (at p. 69, a) that it is true that it is held in the Countess of Rutland's case, that the sheriff, &c., or sergeant, ought, upon the arrest to show at whose suit, &c., but that is to be intended when the party arrested submits himself to the arrest, and not when the party (as in this case Murray did) makes resistance and interrupts him, and before he could speak all his words, he was by them mortally wounded and murdered, in which case the prisoners shall not take advantage of their own wrong." According to East's Pleas of the Crown (vol. 1, p. 319, § 84), even in cases of arrest upon process, notification of the officer's business is all that is necessary to make the arrest legal. He says, "If he be a known sworn officer, the law in the instances above-mentioned will imply notice; if he be a special bailiff named in the process he must declare his business and authority, as by using words of arrest or the like; and if such declaration be true and the process legal, and afterwards he be killed, it is murder; for after that declaration the party killing acted at his peril. But if the officer declare his business, it is not necessary he should produce the warrant itself where it is not demanded." And previously he says, at p. 302, § 70, "As to arrests in cases of misdemeanor and breach of the peace" . . . "But as in case of felony, so here, if the officer meet with resistance and kill the offender in the struggle, he will be justified; and if he be killed it will be murder." Assuming, however, that Galliard v. Laxton is decisive of the law concerning arrests upon civil process, the question here is whether this warrant is not rather analogous to one issued upon a charge of felony, the production of which is admittedly unnecessary. [DENMAN, J.—In Reg. v. Chapman (12 Cox C. C. 4) Hannan, J. acted upon Galliard v. Laxton in the case of a misdemeanor.] Attention does not seem there to have been called to the limited application of that decision.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 29.—BRAMWELL, B.—We are all of opinion that this conviction must be quashed. There is an authority which to my mind is exactly in point. Here the warrant was issued against the appellant in consequence of his non-appearance to a summons requiring him to answer a charge of trespassing in pursuit of coney, which is subject to a penalty upon summary conviction. In Galliard v. Laxton the warrant was for non-obedience to a bastardy order requiring the person against whom the order and warrant were issued to pay a certain sum per week to the mother of his child. This is the only difference between the two cases, and to my mind it constitutes no difference in principle. A distinction is drawn in that case between felonies and orders of the kind there considered. An arrest for felony may be made without a warrant at all; it is not, therefore, necessary for an officer making an arrest upon a warrant for felony to be able to produce the warrant. The judgment in Galliard v. Laxton treats felonies, however, as the only exception, and includes warrants issued for all other purposes in the rule upon which that case is decided. I not only think that case is in point, but I should have entertained the same opinion if there had been no authority on the subject. I have always had it in my mind, as an elementary idea, that a man who is arrested upon the authority of a warrant alone must have a right to see the warrant before he is compelled to submit, although I could not perhaps have given any reason for thinking so. It would be impossible for a man to exercise that right if the police officer making the arrest had not the warrant in his possession at the time; and it is immaterial, therefore, whether a sight of the warrant is demanded or not. In my opinion authority and reason agree in the appellant's favour. He had a right under the circumstances to resist his arrest, and there is no finding that he used excessive force in so doing. Our judgment is, therefore, for the appellant.

MELLOB, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I was party to the judgment in Galliard v. Laxton, and I think I can say it was our intention only to except felonies from the principle upon which we acted in that case. I have always considered that an officer cannot arrest without having with him a warrant to show, unless the offence be one for which no warrant is required. This, therefore, was not a legal arrest, and the appellant was justified in resisting.

DENMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The conviction here was for assaulting a constable in the due execution of his office. The charge could be supported only if the officer were acting within his authority. In Galliard v. Laxton it was held that an officer had no authority to arrest a man upon a warrant without having the document at the time in his possession, when that warrant was issued to compel obedience to a bastardy order. We thought it desirable to take time to examine the authorities, and to consider further whether that decision applied only to civil process. The appellant in this case was charged with an offence more of a criminal than of a civil nature, but I see no distinction in the authority of an officer to arrest upon warrant, so long as the offence charged is not felony. In felony no warrant is required at all, and its production, if it exists, is unnecessary; but in misdemeanor and in every other case, if a warrant be issued, it is the only authority for the arrest, and it must be within the power of the officer executing it to produce it at the time. The case of Galliard v. Laxton was acted upon by Mr. Justice Hannen in Reg. v. Chapman, a charge of murder tried on the Home Circuit, where the warrant had been issued upon a misdemeanor. It does not appear that the distinction contended for in the present case was taken before that learned judge, but as far as it goes that decision is exactly in point, and is one of considerable weight. It is most desirable for all police officers to know that in executing a warrant without being able to produce it at the time, they act at their own peril, and are not making a legal arrest.

Upon application for the respondent the court made no order as to costs.

JONES v. DANGERFIELD.

Sequestration—Sequestrator's liability for dilapidations—Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Act 1871 (34 & 35 Vict., c. 43.)

A benefice was under sequestration at the incumbent's death. During the vacancy the buildings were inspected by the diocesan surveyor, and the archbishop made an order under s. 34 of 34 & 35 Vic., c. 43., stating the cost of the necessary repairs, and that the personal representatives of the late incumbent were liable.

Held, under s. 53 of the Act, that the sequestrator was not liable, and was not entitled to deduct the amount due for repairs from the proceeds of the benefice in his hands.

Adjourned summons.

THE Rev. James Brothers, at the time of his death, in October, 1872, was incumbent of the living of Brabourne, in Kent. The benefice was under sequestration. A deed of assignment had been executed by Mr. Brothers in December 1851, of which Mr. Abraham Dangerfield, the sequestrator, was trustee. An order was made in the cause on the 27th June, 1863, which declared which of the creditors were entitled to the deed of assignment. Soon after the living became vacant, the buildings were inspected and reported on by the diocesan surveyor, and, in pursuance of the Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Act 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 43), the Archbishop of Canterbury made an order respecting the necessary repairs, the cost of which was estimated at 174*l.* 18*s.*, for which the personal representatives of the late incumbent were declared liable. Mr. Dangerfield collected the tithes which had accrued due in Mr. Brothers' lifetime, and under an order of the court dated 31st March 1875, paid £650 into court on account thereof, having been advised that he was liable to pay the cost of repairs out of moneys coming into his hands as sequestrator. The court was now asked to make an order that Dangerfield should pay into court 139*l.* 15*s.* 3*d.*, the amount certified to be due by him on paying the final amount as sequestrator, in order to decide the question of his liability for dilapidations. Mr. Brothers, who had taken the benefit of the Insolvent Act in 1853, died intestate, and it was stated that there were no assets to administer.

Davey, Q.C. and Rigby for the plaintiff, in support of the summons.

Chitty, Q.C. and W. W. Karslake for the sequestrator and for Mr. Perry, the new incumbent.—The condition on which sequestrations are granted is that the sequestrator keeps the buildings in repair, and is liable for dilapidations. Sect. 20 of the Act of 1871 enacts that the dilapidations are to be charged to the sequestrator in respect of the profits of the benefice. They referred to:

Hubbard v. Beckford, 1 Hag. Cons. 397;
Whinfield v. Watkins, 2 Phill. 1;
Cripp's Laws of Church and Clergy, 322.
Phillimore's Ecclesiastical Law, 1390.

Langley, for the official assignee of Mr. Brothers, claimed the balance of the fund after payment of the persons entitled under the deed of assignment.

Sir GEORGE JESSEL.—The question I have to decide concerns the liability of the sequestrator in respect of the balance in his hands from the profits of a sequestered benefice for dilapidations reported after the incumbent's death. The sequestration issued many years ago, and remained in force to the incumbent's death, in Oct. 1873. The avoidance occurred subsequently to the commencement of the Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Act 1871, and that Act, therefore, applies to this case. The law, whatever it was previously to that Act, is remodelled by it. By sect. 53 it is declared that no sum shall be recoverable for dilapidations in respect of any benefice becoming vacant after the commencement of the Act and to which the Act shall apply, unless the claim for such sum be founded on an order made under the provisions of the Act. Now the Act contains two distinct sets of provisions: the one, comprising ss. 12 to 24, provides for the inspection of buildings at times when a benefice is not vacant; the other, ss. 29 to 53, for the inspection of buildings on a vacancy. No inspection seems to have taken place of the buildings of this benefice in Mr. Brothers' lifetime; but after his death, that is, on the vacancy, an inspection took place, and the archbishop, according to sect. 34, made an order stating the repairs required to be done, and their cost, for which the late incumbent's executors and administrators were declared to be liable.

It appears to me that the provisions of sect. 20, and the other sections of that Act, have no bearing on the present case, but that it falls under sect. 36, which casts the liability on the executors or administrators of the late incumbent. The result is that the sequestrator is under no liability for repairs. I must make an order in the terms of the summons, as I am of opinion that the sequestrator is not liable for the dilapidations, and is not entitled to have the amount deducted from the profits of the benefice collected by him.

REG. v. RIPPON.

Quo warranto—Local board—Election to casual vacancy—11 & 12 Vict. c. 63.

A member of a local board resigned more than a year before his time for going out of office, as regulated by the board. At the next election, which annually took place to fill the three vacancies which occurred by rotation, notice was given that four candidates would be appointed; but no explanation of the fourth vacancy was published, nor was any distinction made either in the notice or at the election between the candidates for the different vacancies. After the election, the board selected that one who received the smallest number of votes of the four successful candidates to fill the casual vacancy.

Held, upon a quo warranto, that there was no authority before the Public Health Act 1875, for thus filling up a casual vacancy; and that the election was void.

THIS was a rule to show cause why an information in the nature of a quo warranto should not be exhibited against the four defendants, Jabez Rippon and three others, for exercising the office of members of the Local Board of Newbold-cum-Dunston, in the county of Derby, on grounds therein stated.

From the affidavits it appeared that the said local board consisted of nine members, the whole of whom were appointed at the first election in Sept. 1873. It was arranged by the board that three of their members should go out of office annually in rotation; and the election to fill those vacancies is in pursuance of 37 & 38 Vict. c. 89, s. 26, now held on the 26th March of each year.

On 26th Feb. 1875, a member of the board, whose period of office would not expire according to the arrangement of the board until March 1876, resigned; and in consequence there were four vacancies to be filled up in March 1875.

On the 6th March 1875, the chairman of the board duly published a notice of the election, containing the particulars thereof required by sect. 23 of the Public Health Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63). He stated in the said notice that the number of persons to be elected was four, but

REG. v LEE.

made no reference to the cause of the fourth vacancy, nor explained that there was any distinction in the periods for which the successful candidates would serve.

The election was held in the same manner as if all the vacancies had occurred by rotation. Eleven candidates were nominated, and the four defendants obtained the highest number of certified votes. They were declared by the chairman to be duly elected; and the local board subsequently selected the defendant Rippon, who had received the smallest number of votes of the four successful candidates, to fill the casual vacancy occasioned by resignation. The other three defendants, who received the highest number of votes, were at the same time selected to fill the vacancies caused by rotation.

The objection upon which the relator relied was stated in the rule to be that there were only three vacancies for the term of office for which the election was held.

Cave, Q.C. and Foulkes showed cause.—If this objection be valid, there must have been two separate elections, for which there is no provision in the Public Health Acts. By sect. 13 of the Act of 1848, with respect to all districts, "And the first election for any district or part of a district shall take place on a day to be appointed by order of Her Majesty in Council or by Parliament (as the cases may require); and one-third of the number elected for the whole or any part or parts of a district respectively shall go out of office on such day in each year subsequently to that of the first election as shall be appointed by such order in council or provisional order as aforesaid (as the case may require); and the order in which the persons first elected shall go out of office shall be regulated by each local board. . . . But no person elected shall in any case continuously remain in office for more than three years; and on the days appointed for going out of office a number of persons shall be elected equal to the number of those so going out, and so many others as may be necessary to complete the full number of the local board of health in respect of which the election is to be made." This last paragraph is perfectly consistent with what has been adopted as the practice in this case; and although there is no express provision for filling up vacancies caused by resignation, they are clearly contemplated in the statute. In the 14th section such vacancies are twice alluded to, and one of its paragraphs is, "And in the event of any vacancy in the number of persons elected by death, resignation, or otherwise, between the times appointed for election as aforesaid, or if at any time the said local board be without its full number of members, the remaining members shall continue and be as competent to act until the time appointed for election, or until the full number is selected or elected (as the case may require), as if no vacancy had occurred." There is no suggestion of any separate elections for any different kind of vacancies in the sections relating to notice, nomination, or election; e.g., sects. 23, 24, or 27. Where there is no express provision with respect to these elections, it has been held that the board must do its best to constitute itself: (Howitt v. Manfull, 6 E. & B. 736.) That in this case the board did its best, is clear from the fact that it obeyed by anticipation the provisions of the Public Health Act which has since been passed; by 38 & 39 Vict. c. 55, schedule 2, rule 65, this very course is prescribed in the case of a casual vacancy being filled up at an annual election. This new Act consolidates without altering the old law, so that it may be said retrospectively to justify the proceedings of the board in this case. Although 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98, s. 24, sub-sect. 7, provides one plan of filling casual vacancies by choice of the board within a month, that is merely permissive; and the board in this case has clearly followed the intentions of the statute.

Bigham appeared for the relator to support the rule, but was not heard.

COCKBURN, C. J.—I think the objection to this election is fatal. I do not say how many elections ought to have been held, but it is clear to me that a distinction ought somehow to have been made between the casual and the regular vacancies. In default of express regulation possibly this could only have been secured by separate elections. There was no provision in any of the Acts in force at the time of this vacancy for filling it by election; and although the Act of 1848 alludes to vacancies of the kind, it provides no means for filling them at all. The Legislature has now made good this omission by specific legislation; but previously to the Act of last year the voters should have had an opportunity for distinguishing the kinds of vacancies for which they supported their candidates. There was no such opportunity given them here, and I am therefore of opinion that the election was void.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not see why all the four new members should not have been elected at the same time; but at all events, there should have been some notice as to the difference in the offices for which the votes were to be given. There was at that time no means of fixing which of the elected candidates should fill the casual vacancy, and the voters were not consulted on the subject. I do not consider this can be a valid election.

FIELD, J.—I am of the same opinion.

REG. v LEE.

Highway—Indictment for non-repair—Highway not found as in summons—Costs of prosecution—5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 95.

By 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 95, if, on the hearing of any summons respecting the repair of any highway, the duty or obligation of such repairs is denied by the surveyor on behalf of the inhabitants, the justices may direct an indictment, and the judge of assize before whom the indictment is tried may direct the costs to be paid by the parish.

Upon the trial of an indictment directed under this section, it was found that the common highway for horses, carts, and carriages, as described in

Q.B. Div.]

REG. v. LEE.

[Q.B. Div.]

the summons, was only a footpath and bridle-way.

Held, that the justices had no jurisdiction to make their order upon this summons; and that therefore an order for costs made by the judge of assize at the trial must be quashed.

A RULE nisi had been obtained calling upon Robert Lee, the prosecutor, to show cause why a writ of certiorari should not issue to remove into the High Court of Justice a certain order of assize made by Field, J., at York, on 3rd Aug. upon an indictment against the inhabitants of the township of Ellerton, for the non-repair of a certain highway in the said township, ordering the costs of the prosecution to be paid out of the rates and levied on the said township, in pursuance of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50.

By sect. 95 of that statute it is enacted "That if on the hearing of any such summons respecting the repair of any highway, the duty or obligation of such repairs is denied by the surveyor on behalf of the inhabitants of the parish, or by any other party charged therewith, it shall then be lawful for such justices, and they are hereby required to direct a bill of indictment to be preferred and the necessary witnesses in support thereof to be subpoenaed at the next assizes to be holden in and for the said county, or at the next general quarter sessions of the peace for the county, riding, division, or place wherein such highway shall be, against the inhabitants of the parish or the party to be named in such order, for suffering and permitting the said highway to be out of repair; and the costs of such prosecution shall be directed by the judge of assize before whom the said indictment is tried or by the justices of such quarter sessions, to be paid out of the rate made and levied in pursuance of this Act in the parish in which such highway shall be situate; provided, nevertheless, that it shall be lawful for the party against whom such indictment shall be so preferred at the quarter sessions aforesaid, to remove such indictment by certiorari or otherwise into his Majesty's Court of King's Bench."

It appeared that on the 5th Aug. 1874 the said Robert Lee preferred an information before justices against the surveyors of highways of the township of Ellerton alleging that part of a highway described as a common highway for horses, carts, and carriages, within the said township, was out of repair. At the hearing of the summons issued upon this information the surveyor of the township denied their liability to repair the highway, and the justices thereupon ordered an indictment to be preferred against the inhabitants of the township; an indictment was accordingly preferred before the grand jury at York at the assizes in March 1875. A true bill having been found, the indictment came on for trial before Field, J. at York, in Aug. 1875, when, the evidence being insufficient to support the allegation that the highway was a cart and carriage way, the learned judge so directed the jury. It was, however, not disputed at the trial that the highway was a public bridleway and footpath, and at the close of the case the learned judge, under the provisions of 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, amended the indictment by striking out all the words having reference to a cart and carriage way, and upon the indictment, so amended, a verdict of guilty was recorded.

Application was made on behalf of the prosecution to the judge for an order under the above sect. 95 of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50 for payment of the costs, and he, considering himself bound to do so under the Act, made the order. It was now sought to remove this order by certiorari for the purpose of quashing it.

At the hearing of the information before the justices there appeared to have been no admission then made on the part of the inhabitants that the road was a highway of the limited character afterwards admitted at the trial; but their solicitor objected to the jurisdiction of the justices on the general ground that the highway was not a common highway repairable by the township. It seemed also that the information being for non-repair of the road as a cart and carriage way, no special attention was called to the liability, whether admitted or otherwise, of the township to repair it as a bridle road.

Maule, Q.C. and Wilberforce showed cause against the rule on behalf of the prosecutor.—The jurisdiction given to justices by the Highway Act 1835 in such a matter as this is now governed by 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61, by sect. 19 of which it is enacted that "When on the hearing of any summons respecting the repair of any highway the liability to repair is denied by the waywarden on behalf of his parish, or by any party charged therewith, the justices shall direct an indictment to be preferred at the next assizes or at the next quarter sessions for the county, &c., wherein such highway is situate, against the inhabitants of the parish or the party charged therewith for suffering the said highway to be out of repair." It has been held under that section that the jurisdiction of the justices is limited to admitted highways; and that justices have no jurisdiction to order an indictment to be preferred where it is bonâ fide denied by the parties charged that the road is a highway, and the liability to repair the road if it is a highway is not denied (Reg. v. Farrer, L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 558; Reg. v. Heanor, 6 Q. B. 745). Here, however, the liability was denied generally, and therefore the justices had jurisdiction to direct the indictment. The prosecution succeeded in establishing a highway, and the judge at the assizes was compelled by the statute to make the order for costs which is now in question. [MELLOR, J.—The justices did not direct an indictment for the repair of a limited highway, which was the only highway established by the verdict.] There is nothing in the words of the section to limit the order for costs to a successful indictment. The amendment was made in the indictment upon the authority of Reg. v. Sturge (3 E. & B. 734).

Wills, Q.C. appeared to support the rule.

COCKBURN, C.J.—We do not think it will be necessary in this case to call on Mr. Wills. The power of a judge to order the costs of a prosecution ordered by justices under sect. 95 of the General Highway Act must depend on whether the justices who made the order had jurisdiction to make it. Now, it seems upon examination of the statute, that they only have jurisdiction when the highway in question is found to be a highway. The order here, accordingly, proceeded on the assumption that this road was a general highway, for it was in respect of the non-repair of such a highway that the inhabitants of the parish indicted were charged. This assumption failed to be proved in fact at the trial. It was only proved

Q.B. Div.]

REG. v. COLLINS.

that this was a special or limited highway, and the prosecution having failed in this respect, the jurisdiction of the justices to order the prosecution failed, and consequently the judge had no power to make this order for costs.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the order was made by the justices, they assuming that the road in question was a highway; and the costs which a judge on the trial of the indictment is empowered to give are limited to the costs of such a prosecution as that which the justices had jurisdiction to order and did order. There is here no question as to the amendment of the indictment at the trial because that was done by consent of both sides in order that it might accord with what was actually proved; but as the highway proved was not that ordered to be indicted, the costs of the prosecution cannot be ordered.

FIELD, J.—I am of the same opinion. I made the order at the trial reluctantly, because I thought I was compelled by the terms of the statute to do so. But now, on further consideration, and after hearing the argument of the case, I am satisfied that my Lord and my brother Mellor are right, and that in this and other cases where the prosecution fail in establishing that which is the foundation of the jurisdiction of the justices, substantial justice will be done by a construction of the section adversely to their right to claim an order for costs. The costs of this case were really those incurred by the prosecution in endeavouring to establish the cart way, in which endeavour they entirely failed.

REG. v. COLLINS.

Quo warranto—Scrutiny of votes—Certificate of chairman—Titles of votes—Mistakes in counting—11 & 12 Vict. c. 63. s. 27.

At an election of members of a local board of health, the chairman certified under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, s. 27, that seven persons, of whom the defendant had the smallest number of votes, were elected. The relator, who was a candidate, had three votes less than the defendant.

Upon a scrutiny before a judge of assize without a jury it appeared that, by correction of mistakes in counting, the votes for the relator and the defendant were equal; that one vote for the relator had been mislaid and not counted at all; and that two votes for the relator which the chairman had found to be valid, no objection having at that time been made to them, ought not to have been received; one being written by some other person than the voter, contrary to sect. 25; the other being that of a person who had not been rated or paid rates, contrary to sect. 20:

Held by Mellor and Field, JJ., (Blackburn, J. dissenting), that by quo warranto only the mistakes in a chairman's mechanical acts, and not the titles of votes, can be rectified; and that therefore the relator was ahead of the defendant, and was duly elected.

THIS was a quo warranto, the circumstances of which are fully described in the following judgment of Blackburn, J., before whom the case was tried at the Dorchester Summer Assizes 1875. The verdict was entered for the defendant, leave being reserved to the relator to move to enter the verdict for him.

The election of the members of the Local Board of Health for the Isle of Portland, the validity of which was questioned, took place in May 1874.

The rule for the quo warranto was made absolute on the 28th Jan. 1875. (Reported 23 W. R. 325).

The rule nisi in pursuance of the leave reserved at the trial was granted on the 4th Nov. 1875 upon the motion of Kingdon, Q.C. for the relator who relied upon the authority of

Reg. v. Cross, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 35;

Reg. v. Diplock, L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 549.

The following is the 27th section of the Public Health Act 1848, (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63):

That the chairman shall, on the day immediately following the day of the election and on as many days immediately succeeding as may be necessary attend at the office of the local board of health, and ascertain the validity of the votes by an examination of the rate books and such other books and documents as he may think necessary, and by examining such persons as he may see fit; and he shall cast up such of the votes as he shall find to be valid and to have been duly given collected or received, and ascertain the number of such votes for each candidate. And the candidates to the number to be elected who being duly qualified shall have obtained the greatest number of votes shall be deemed to be elected and shall be certified as such by the said chairman under his hand; and to each person so elected the said chairman shall send or deliver notice of such election; and the said chairman shall also cause to be made a list containing the names of the candidates together with (in case of a contest) the number of votes given for each and the names of the persons elected; and shall sign and certify the same and shall deliver such list together with the nomination and voting paper which he shall have received to the local board of health at their first or next meeting (as the case may be), who shall cause the same to be deposited in their office, and the same shall during office hours therat be kept open to public inspection, together with all other documents relating to the election, for six months after the election shall have taken place, without fee or reward; and the said chairman shall cause such lists to be printed and copies thereof to be affixed at the usual places for affixing notices of parochial business within the parts for which the election shall have been made.

Jan. 20.—Cole, Q.C. and Pinder on behalf of the defendant now showed cause against the rule.

Kingdon, Q.C. and A. Collins were heard in support.—The arguments and the authorities discussed are fully stated in the following written judgments of the court.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 25.—BLACKBURN, J.—This was a quo warranto on the relation of Andrews calling on the defendant to show by what title he acted as a member of a local board of health. The plea was that the defendant was duly elected and this was traversed. The issue came on for trial before me and a jury at the last assizes at Dorchester. As the case involved a scrutiny it was agreed that the jury should be dispensed with and that what I found as facts were to be considered as found by the jury. It appeared that there were seven vacancies and nine candidates. The voting papers were duly collected and received and the chairman proceeded on the proper day to ascertain the number of valid votes for each candidate in pursuance of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, s. 27. The nine candidates consisted of six persons whose election was not disputed, and of Collins, Andrews, and Coombe. The chairman certified that the six others and Collins were duly elected. He made out a list, containing the names of the candidates and the number of votes given for each and the names of the persons elected, which he signed and certified; and he delivered it along with the voting and nomination papers to the local board who, in pursuance of the section, deposited this list together with the voting papers for public inspection as required by the section. The chairman did what, though not in terms required by the Act, was fair. He not merely put down the number of votes given for each candidate, but also made out and kept a list, by reference to the numbers of the voting papers of the voters whom he had reckoned as voting for each candidate, so that there was no difficulty in fact in ascertaining how he made out the majority. According to this list the six persons whose elections were not disputed had most votes; Collins had 382 votes, Andrews and Combe, 379 votes each. If the certificate was conclusive, Collins was entitled to the verdict. Subject to objections on both sides, evidence was received of three classes of mistakes. It was agreed that no inquiry should be made as to Coombes's votes, and that if Collins had a majority over Andrews, the verdict should be for him. The counsel for the relator proceeded to prove what may be called clerical errors by showing that votes which by the voting papers appeared not to have been given for Collins had been, as appeared by the list, by mistake put down for him, and that votes which as it appeared by the voting papers had been given for Andrews, had, as appeared by the list, not been put down for him but for some one else. The counsel for the defendant showed that there were similar blunders made with respect to Andrews. On the balance of these mistakes Andrews had three in his favour, showing an equality of votes between him and Collins. The counsel for the relator then showed a second kind of mistake. One voting paper had been mislaid and was not reckoned at all. It was found next day in the room, and proved to be a vote in favour of Andrews. This, if properly received, put Andrews in a majority of one over Collins. The counsel for the defendant then gave evidence of a third kind of mistake. He proved that one of the voting papers received, and, as it appeared by the list, reckoned for Andrews, was a vote by a person who could not write, and was wholly written and signed in his name by another person. It was not alleged that there was any intended fraud in this, but the vote was bad under sect. 25. Another vote which also was reckoned for Andrews was that of a person who had not been rated nor paid rates, and this vote was bad under sect. 20. The chairman had not had his attention called to either of these two last votes, and consequently did not examine any persons as to the genuineness of the signatures in the first case, or the rate books as to the last, or in point of fact come to any conclusion as to the validity of those votes before receiving them: though if his attention had been called to them he had power, under sect. 27, to have investigated the matter. If evidence of this kind of mistake was admissible, Collins was again in a majority over Andrews. No further evidence was offered on either side. The counsel for the defendant contended that the certificate of the chairman was conclusive, and that no evidence of any mistake on his part was admissible; but that, if evidence of any one kind of mistake could be shown, all three sorts might be shown. The counsel for the relator contended that the certificate might be impeached by showing any errors in the mechanical process of reckoning and casting up the votes; but that no error could be shown in receiving votes as valid, as to which he might have made a judicial, or, at least, quasi judicial investigation, though an ex parte one. I directed a verdict for the defendant, reserving to the prosecutors leave to move with some arrangements as to appealing, which it is not necessary now to mention. A rule was obtained, which was argued before my brothers Mellor, Field, and myself, when the same points which were made at the trial were again stated. The case of Reg. v. Cross (19 L. T. Rep. O. S. 35) was cited. In that case the election of the defendant was questioned on the ground that the election was held before a person who was not the chairman. The issue taken was like this, whether the defendant was duly elected. It was proved that the person who held the election was duly appointed as deputy to the chairman. Then the counsel for the relator said, that the defendant to prove his election must affirmatively prove that he had a majority of votes, and that the certificate was not even evidence of his being so. Lord Campbell very properly overruled this objection. In doing so, he is reported to have said that the language of this section made the certificate conclusive. It is very probable that he did use such language, but the point was not before him, and the case can hardly be considered as showing his deliberate opinion. At most, the opinion of Lord Campbell, was but a nisi prius decision, and as from the nature of the evidence, and the point really raised, it was not necessary for the decision of the case, it could not be reviewed in banc, and is therefore of less weight as an authority. It was decided in Reg. v. Backhouse (L. Rep. 2 Q.B. 16), that the duties of the chairman were so far of a judicial nature, that he could not delegate them, except in the manner allowed by the statute. And even if there was no decision to that effect, I should not entertain any doubt that such was the law. But it does not follow that his decision was final and incontrovertible. The duties of a mayor of a corporation acting as returning officer at the election of a councillor are to this extent judicial, Reg. v. Owens (2 E. & E. 86); Reg. v. White (L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 557): yet his return may be questioned on quo warranto. The duties of the mayor and assessors revising the burgess list under 5 & 6 Will. c. 74, s. 18, are beyond doubt judicial. There have been several quo warranto at least moved for to try the right to be on the burgess roll (see R. v. Anderson, 2 Q. B. 740; Re Milner, 5 Q. B. 589), without any objection being raised on the ground that their decision was final. I do not find any reported case in which the burgess was actually ousted, but the objection lay on the surface, and, if it had been thought good, would surely have been taken. No doubt

REG. v. COLLINS.

the Legislature may make any tribunal they please the final judges of any matter they please, but I do not think they sufficiently express an intention to make the decision of a returning officer final merely by intrusting him with some powers of a judicial or quasi-judicial nature. It is a question in each case, on the construction of the particular statute, whether they have done so or not. If this be correct, the question for our decision depends entirely on the true construction of sect. 27 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 65, and does not, I think, admit of much elucidation by argument. It seems to me, prima facie, unlikely that the Legislature should intend to make the decision of the chairman, on an inquiry made ex parte and in the absence of the parties interested, final and conclusive as to who was elected; and I cannot see with what object it should have been provided that the lists should be made out and deposited along with the voting papers for public inspection, unless it was to give an opportunity to the public to challenge his decision. If his decision can be reviewed at all, it must be by quo warranto. It is worth noticing that the Act now in force, 38 & 39 Vict. c. 55 (by rule 51 of schedule 2), provides that the examination shall no longer be conducted in the absence of the candidates or their agents, but as the agents, though allowed to be present, are forbidden to interfere, it remains ex parte, and it seems to me that the presence of the agents can only be useful with a view to call the decision of the chairman in question. If the local board of health had very unimportant functions to perform, it would have been an intelligible policy to prevent litigation by making the decision of the chairman, even though likely to be a local partisan, final; though I think the Legislature would have used clearer language if such had been their intention. But the functions of the local board are by no means insignificant. It seems to me that the true construction of sect. 27 is, that powers and duties are imposed on the chairman, so as to increase the probabilities that his decision, which puts the member whom he declares elected into possession, shall be right; but that there is an absence of language to express that his decision shall be final; and I think it not likely to have been intended that it should be so. I think, therefore, that evidence of all three classes of mistake was properly received, and that the rule should be discharged.

MELLOR, J. delivered the judgment of himself and FIELD, J.—This case was tried before my brother Blackburn sitting by consent without a jury, and it is upon the facts as found by him that the judgment depends. The case was argued before him, my brother Field and myself. The facts are sufficiently stated in the judgment of my brother Blackburn, and it is not necessary to repeat them. I cannot concur with him in the conclusion at which he has arrived, and I think that all the authority upon the subject which is to be found is adverse to the view which he has expressed. That some of the functions of the returning officer are judicial must, I think, be admitted; and certainly the expressions attributed to my brother Blackburn in Reg. v. Loft-house (L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 439), and more especially to myself (ib. 441), are strong to that effect; and again in Reg. v. Backhouse (L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 16); and the same view was expressed by me not only of the law, but as to what had been actually decided in Reg. v. Loft-house. Again, we have the authority of Lord Campbell in Reg. v. Cross (19 L. T. Rep. O. S. 35), as to the effect of this sect. 27, when he stated that its operation was to make the certificate of the returning officer conclusive. It is true that this was an opinion expressed at Nisi Prius, and not so deliberately given as it would have been after argument in banc; but it is not the less an authority in favour of the view which I entertain of the effect of the 27th section. It is to be observed that the decision was given after much discussion, and at the end of the evidence; and I cannot doubt that it was a deliberate expression of Lord Campbell's opinion as to the true construction of the section. It determined the case, and I am not aware that it was ever questioned, although leave to do so was expressly reserved. It is true that the section does not contain such complete machinery as might have been provided. Still it may be asked, if the functions intended to be cast upon the returning officer were merely ministerial, why should language so inappropriate be used? He is required "to ascertain the validity of the votes by an examination of the rate books, and such other books and documents as he may think necessary, and by examining such persons as he may see fit." Again, with regard to the duties to be performed by him, he is "to cast up such of the votes as he shall find to be valid," and then in the result it enacts that the candidates to the number to be elected, who shall have obtained the greatest number of votes, "shall be deemed to be elected, and shall be certified as such by the chairman under his hand." It is not easy to discover by what words judicial duties can be assigned to an individual if the above are insufficient; and that this was Lord Campbell's opinion is clear from the words attributed to him in Reg. v. Cross (19 L. T. Rep. O. S. 36): "I am at a loss to see what words could have been employed better calculated to convey that intention." The Legislature appears to have assumed that all the machinery necessary for the distributing, collecting, and receiving the voting papers had been provided by the statute, and that the performance of the duties imposed upon the various persons employed in carrying out the election would be sufficiently secured by the penalty imposed by sect. 28; and I think that there is nothing inconsistent with the view I take of the nature of the functions of the returning officer in the fact that he is required to deliver a certificate, "together with the nomination and voting papers which he shall have received" to the local board of health, who are to deposit them in their office for six months for public inspection. I think that the Legislature intended to circumscribe the litigation likely to arise in the election of these temporary officers, and to prevent the title of votes from being inquired into by the expensive proceedings in quo warranto, leaving only mistakes and errors in the mechanical acts required to be done by the chairman to be rectified, but not permitting inquiry into acts done by the chairman when acting judicially. It seems to have been the object of the Legislature to limit litigation as far as possible in constituting these very numerous bodies called local boards of health. I do not think much assistance is to be derived from other cases in which different words are used, but that this case must entirely depend upon the Confession—Inducement—Second confession without inducement to a third party—Connection of the two confessions.

To render a confession admissible, it is not so much material to prove to whom or when it is made, as it is to ascertain the mind of the party making it, and see whether or not it is probable that it was made voluntarily.

The prisoner, a servant girl, was questioned by the mother of a child who had been found dead in a ditch; and she was asked whether she had anything to do with its disappearance; upon which she cried, and said, "If you won't send for the police I will tell the truth," whereupon her mistress replied, "I will not hurt you if you tell the truth; you will be much happier if you tell the truth;" and she promised not to send for the police; whereupon the prisoner made a confession, which upon the trial was rejected as being made under an inducement. It further appeared that shortly after this confession, the mistress sent for a neighbour and informed him of the confession, whereupon he had an interview alone with the prisoner, and asked her questions upon the subject, but he held out no inducement, and she then made a similar confession.

Held, that the second confession was so connected under the circumstances with the first, that it was inadmissible.

The prisoner was indicted for the wilful murder of John Barnard, a child a year and nine months old.

Hooper and Neville appeared for the prosecution.

St. Aubyn (at the request of the judge) watched the case for the prisoner.

It appeared that the child, on the day of its death, had been last seen alive in the arms of the prisoner, who was a servant in the family of its parents, and it was afterwards discovered dead in a ditch of water, where it had died from suffocation. No charge at that time was made against the prisoner, but, about two months after, a fire having broken out in the farmyard of the Barnards, suspicion rested upon the prisoner with reference to it, and she was questioned upon the subject by Mrs. Barnard (the mother of the child), and after some conversation as to the fire, she said to the prisoner, "Had you anything to do with my child disappearing from the doorstep?" Upon this the prisoner cried, and said, "If you won't send for the police

I will tell the truth." To this Mrs. Barnard replied, "I will not hurt you if you tell the truth; you will be much happier if you tell the truth," and she promised not to send for the police. Upon this, it was proposed to give evidence of a confession then made, which, however, the learned judge refused to allow, as being inadmissible on the ground of the inducement. Evidence was then given that a neighbour (a Mr. Sweet) had been shortly afterwards sent for by Mrs. Barnard, to whom she stated the fact of the confession, whereupon, being in the room alone with the prisoner, he put certain questions to her which resulted in her also (as it was alleged) confessing to him.

Hooper proposed to give in evidence this alleged confession, and did so upon the ground that this was a voluntary confession made to another person without any inducement.

St. Aubyn contended that this second alleged confession was the offspring of the inducement held out shortly before by Mrs. Barnard, and that the two were under the circumstances so connected as to be each inadmissible.

DENMAN, J.—There are cases which hold that a confession once rejected on the ground that it was made under an inducement, does not become admissible merely from the fact that it was again made to some other person who has not held out an inducement, the inducement being deemed to be a continuing one. But I am not at this moment aware of any case in which it has been held that where the person who held out the inducement is absent, then a confession made to a third party is not admissible, no fresh inducement having been held out. The general principle is clear, that if it is made out to the satisfaction of the judge that the statement was not made voluntarily, it is not admissible. It is not merely a question as to whom the confession is made to, or when it is made; but it is a matter in which you have to get at the mind of the prisoner, and see whether or not it is probable that the confession was made voluntarily in the proper sense of the word. The objection to it here is, that it would not have been made but for the previous involuntary statement, and it is made in answer to questions put by the person to whom it was made, which questions were induced by the information obtained from the person to whom shortly before a confession had been made under an inducement. [His Lordship here retired to consult with the Lord Chief Baron upon the subject. Upon his return he said:] Having considered the point with the Lord Chief Baron, we are both agreed in thinking that the confession to Sweet must be rejected upon the ground that it was so connected under the circumstances with the inducement held out by Mrs. Barnard as to be inadmissible in law.

The prisoner was convicted of manslaughter, and ordered to be kept in penal servitude for life.

RICHMOND WATERWORKS COMPANY, &C., v. VESTRY OF RICHMOND.

Supreme Court of Judicature.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

CHANCERY DIVISION.

Barristers-at-Law.

Feb. 10 and March 23, 1876.

RICHMOND WATERWORKS COMPANY, AND SOUTHWARK AND VAUXHALL WATERWORKS COMPANY v. VESTRY OF RICHMOND.

Waterworks company—Statutory powers—Public Health Act 1848 and 1875—Urban sanitary authority—Monopoly of water supply—Transfer by incorporated company of all its shares to another company—Company able and willing to supply water—Injunction.

The R. Water Company was incorporated by Act of Parliament in 1835 to supply the parish of R. with water drawn from the Thames. The Public Health Act 1848, s. 75, empowered the vestry of R., acting as the local board, to construct waterworks and supply water for certain purposes to the district, but not without giving notice to any existing company, nor so long as any such company should be "able and willing to lay on water proper and sufficient for all reasonable purposes," required by the local board.

The R. Water Company supplied the parish until 1862, when the source of their water supply having become polluted, they applied to Parliament to authorise them to amalgamate with the S. Water Company, who were a neighbouring company, and who were able to procure purer water. The Bill was not passed, and the shareholders in the R. Company transferred all their shares and property to the S. Company, and practically ceased to exist, the S. Company supplying the parish, though they had no statutory powers enabling them to do so. In 1873 the vestry gave the R. Company, as the only authorised company, notice under the Act of 1848, of their intention to construct waterworks. The Public Health Act 1875, sects. 51, 52, empowered the vestry as urban sanitary authority, to supply water to the parish for all public and private purposes, but subject to conditions similar to those in the Act of 1848.

The R. and S. Companies brought an action to restrain the vestry from proceeding with their works, on the ground that the R. Company was "able and willing" to supply the parish with water:

Held, on motion for injunction, that the R. Company could not delegate its powers to the S. Company, and was still a legally existing company, though not both "able and willing" to supply; that the S. Company was not authorised to supply, and that, therefore, there was no company who could assert a monopoly against the vestry. Injunction refused.

THE object of this action was to obtain an injunction restraining the defendants (acting as the urban sanitary authority for the parish of Richmond, and in that character assuming to exercise the powers vested in such authorities under the Public Health Act 1875) from proceeding to construct waterworks for the supply of the parish of Richmond, unless and until they should have complied with and performed the preliminary requirements or conditions in that behalf imposed by the 52nd section of the Act.

The Richmond Waterworks Company was incorporated by Act of Parliament, passed in 1835, for the purpose of supplying water to the parish of Richmond, taken from a certain point in the river Thames, and in pursuance of the powers of their Act the Richmond Company continued until the year 1861, to supply water to the parish by means of a tunnel or aqueduct made from the river Thames to certain premises which had been purchased for the purposes of the company, but in course of time the water in that district having become defiled with sewage matter, the Richmond Company determined to procure water of a superior quality from another source, and accordingly, in the month of Aug. 1860, an arrangement was made between the Richmond Company, and the Southwark and Vauxhall Water Company, by which the Southwark Company undertook either themselves to supply the parish of Richmond with water, in case they should be able to procure an Act of Parliament enabling them so to do, or otherwise to do so in co-operation with the Richmond Company in case they should be able to effect such an arrangement with them in that behalf.

Accordingly by memorandum of agreement between the Richmond Company and the Southwark Company it was agreed that (subject to the sanction of Parliament being obtained) the Southwark Company should purchase the undertaking of the Richmond Company for the sum of 16,500*l.*, and in the ensuing session the Southwark Company applied to Parliament to confirm the agreement, and to vest in them the undertaking of the Richmond Company. The Bill, however, was opposed, and in consequence of some requirement by the Committee of the House of Lords, to which the Southwark Company objected, the Bill was abandoned. Eventually it was arranged between the two companies that certain persons who were either shareholders or directors in the Southwark Company should purchase on behalf of their Company all the shares of the Richmond Company, which at that time consisted of only about eleven persons, together with their works, buildings, land, and property, and this was carried into effect under the terms of a deed of arrangement dated the 20th Feb. 1862, the transferees becoming, as the plaintiffs alleged, the sole shareholders in and so constituting the Richmond Company, such shares having ever since been held by them as trustees on behalf of the Southwark Company. From that time the Richmond Company ceased to take water from their former source of supply, but having connected their mains with those of the Southwark Company, they were supplied with water by the Southwark Company, and from that time the water rates payable by the inhabitants of Richmond were collected by the officers of the Southwark Company, though they were demanded sometimes in the name of the Richmond Company and sometimes in the name of the Southwark Company. In consequence of this arrangement the Richmond Company had, however, practically ceased to exist.

In the year 1873 the defendants resolved to undertake the supply of water to the parish of

[CHAM. DIV.]

Richmond, and accordingly, in the month of August 1873, in order to bring themselves within the provisions of the Public Health Act 1848, sect. 75 (set out below), they gave notice of their intention to the Richmond Company, having been advised that if the Richmond Company and the West Middlesex Water Company, who were also served, were not "able and willing" to supply the district with water, the defendants might themselves proceed to do so under the powers of the Act of 1848.

By sect. 75 of the Public Health Act 1848, it is provided as follows:

That the Local Board of Health may provide their district with such a supply of water as may be proper and sufficient for the purposes of this Act, and for private use to the extent required by this Act.

And for those purposes, or any of them, the said local board may from time to time, with the approval of the General Board of Health, contract with any person whomsoever, or purchase, take upon lease, hire, construct, lay down, and maintain such waterworks, and do and execute all such works, matters, and things, as shall be necessary and proper.

And any waterworks company may contract with the local board of health to supply water for the purposes of this Act in any manner whatsoever, or may sell and dispose of or lease their waterworks to any local board of health willing to take the same.

And the said local board may provide and keep in any waterworks constructed or laid down by them under the powers of this Act, a supply of pure and wholesome water, and the water so supplied may be constantly laid on at such pressure as will carry the same to the top story of the highest dwellinghouse within the district supplied:

Provided always, that before constructing or laying down any waterworks under the powers of this Act, within any limits within, for, or in respect of which any waterworks company shall have been established for supplying water, the said local board shall give notice in writing to every waterworks company within whose limits the said local board may be desirous of laying on or supplying water, stating the purpose for and (as far as may be practicable) the extent to which water is required by the said local board.

And it shall not be lawful for the said local board to construct or lay down any waterworks within such limits, if and so long as any such company shall be able and willing to lay on water proper and sufficient for all reasonable purposes for which it is required by the said local board, and upon such terms as shall be certified to be reasonable by the general board of health, after inquiry and report by a superintending inspector in this behalf, or (in case such company shall be dissatisfied with such certificate) upon such terms as shall be settled by arbitration in the manner provided by this Act.

And in case any difference shall arise as to whether the water which any such company is able and willing to supply or lay on is proper and sufficient for the purposes for which it is required by the said local board, or whether the purposes for which it is required are reasonable, the same shall be settled by arbitration in the manner provided by this Act.

By the interpretation clause of the Act the expression "waterworks company" is defined to mean "any corporation, person, or company of persons supplying, or who may hereafter supply, water for their own profit."

In or about the month of Jan. 1874, the defendants made application to the Local Government Board under the Local Government Act 1858, to sanction the borrowing by the defendants of 28,000*l.* for the construction of waterworks to supply the parish, and to recommend a loan to be made to them by the Public Works Loan Commissioners. The Southwark Company thereupon represented to the Local Board that the defendants by their resolution and proceedings were acting in excess of their powers, and also that proper notices had not been given to the plaintiffs by the defendants according to the provisions of the Public Health Act 1848, sect. 75. Ultimately the board, without assuming to decide the question as to the legal position or powers of the defendants, decided to accede to their application, and to sanction the borrowing by the defendants of the sum of 28,000*l.*, and to recommend the Public Works Loan Commissioners to make the advance.

Before, however, this decision of the Board was made, the Public Health Act 1875 had been passed, sect. 52 of which contained provisions somewhat similar to those of the Act of 1848, sect. 75.

Under the provisions of the Public Health Act 1875, sect. 51, the defendants, as urban sanitary authority, were invested with effectual powers to provide their district with a supply of water proper for "all public and private purposes," and for those purposes to construct and maintain waterworks. Sect. 52 of the Act is as follows:

Before commencing to construct waterworks within the limits of supply of any water company empowered by Act of Parliament, or any order confirmed by Parliament to supply water, the local authority shall give written notice to every water company within whose limits of supply the local authority are desirous of supplying water, stating the purposes for which, and (as far as may be practicable) the extent to which water is required by the local authority. It shall not be lawful for the local authority to construct any waterworks within such limits if and so long as any such company are able and willing to supply water proper and sufficient for all reasonable purposes for which it is required by the local authority; and any difference as to whether the water which any such company are able and willing to lay on is proper and sufficient for the purposes for which it is required, or whether the purposes for which it is required are reasonable, or (if and so far as the charges of the company are not regulated by Parliament) as to the terms of supply, shall be settled by arbitration in manner provided by this Act.

On receiving the decision of the Local Government Board, the defendants proceeded to advertise for tenders for the construction of their works, on which the plaintiffs applied to them, requesting them not to proceed further with their works until the requirements as to notice and arbitration contained in the 52nd section of the Act of 1875 had been complied with. On the defendants refusing to discontinue, this action was brought, the plaintiffs charging that they, and in particular the Richmond Company, were entitled to the benefit and protection of the provisions of the Public Health Act 1875, and alleging that the Richmond Company were empowered and were "able and willing" to supply water throughout the parish for all reasonable purposes for which the defendants, as the local authority, were entitled to require the supply of water; they charged also that unless and until the defendants should have proceeded, in compliance with the requirements of the said Act, to give to the Richmond Company such notice as was required by the Act, and in case of difference to proceed to arbitration, they were not entitled to construct their intended waterworks, and prayed an injunction against the defendants, restraining them from commencing or proceeding with their waterworks, or at all events, until they should have given the plaintiffs a written notice of the purposes for which, and, so far as practicable, the extent to which, under the provisions of the Public Health Act 1875, water was required by them as the urban sanitary authority for the parish, and unless and until in case of difference as to whether the water which the Richmond Company was able and willing to lay on was proper and sufficient for all reasonable purposes, or whether the purposes were reasonable, or (so far as the charges of the company were not regulated by Parliament) as to the terms of supply, such difference should have been settled by arbitration in manner provided by the said Act.

The defendants, by their statement of defence, denied that the plaintiffs were entitled to any benefit under the Public Health Act 1875. They contended that since the Richmond Company had ceased to take their water from their old source, in the year 1862, there had not been any company or person acting, or capable of acting, as or for the Richmond Company; that the Southwark Company never had any legal powers of water supply in the district, and had no locus standi in the action; that the defendants had duly complied with the Public Health Act 1848, by giving notice to the Richmond Company and the West Middlesex Company.

The writ was issued on the 30th Nov. 1875, and a motion for injunction was made on the 10th Feb. 1876, and it then appearing that the Southwark Company were about to apply to Parliament for an Act to give them further powers, the motion stood over until the result of that application should be known. That application, however, having been withdrawn the motion now came on again.

J. Pearson, Q.C., Michael, and J. Beaumont for the motion.—The whole question is whether the defendants have complied with the Act of 1875. Under the Act of 1848 they had very limited powers for supplying water, and the Act of 1875, which enlarges those powers, contains careful provisions in favour of existing companies. Both the Acts render it necessary for the defendants, before undertaking the supply of water to the parish, to apply to the existing company to ascertain whether they are able and willing to supply. We contend that the Richmond Company is the company "able and willing" to supply the parish with water, and to whom the defendants were bound, therefore, to give notice under the Act of 1875. The defendants recognised the right of the Richmond Company in 1873, when they served them with notice. We contend also that the defendants have not power under either Act to do what they propose. It will be said that the Richmond Company has ceased to exist, by virtue of the transfer of the shares in the company to the Southwark Company, but a company created by an Act of Parliament cannot cease to exist by any act of its own. We submit, therefore, that the Richmond Company is still in existence, and that it is, by means of the Southwark Company, as its agent, a company "able and willing" to supply the parish of Richmond with water. Glasse, Q.C., Meadows White, and Glen, for the defendants.—There is not now any company legally qualified and at the same time "able and willing" to supply the parish. The Richmond Company have not acted as a water company since the time when they transferred their shares to the Southwark Company. The Richmond Company is practically defunct, and the Southwark Company, who have actually supplied the water, cannot have done so as their agents, because the Richmond Company could not delegate their powers. As, therefore, the Richmond Company is not a working company, and the Southwark Company have no legal powers to enable them to act, we submit that there is no company "able and willing" to supply the parish to whom we are bound to give notice or to recognise. THE VICE-CHANCELLOR.—This is a motion by the Richmond Waterworks Company and the Southwark and Vauxhall Water Company against the Vestry of the Parish of Richmond, in Surrey, asking for an injunction to restrain the vestry from erecting waterworks in opposition to those of the plaintiffs. The parish of Richmond has for many years been supplied with water by virtue of an Act passed in the year 1835. By that Act the plaintiffs, the Richmond Company, were incorporated with the power of making, completing, and maintaining the works thereby authorised. [His Lordship then referred to the provisions of the Richmond Company's Act, and continued:] Therefore the Richmond Company has all these privileges conferred upon it of taking water at a place they should fix upon in the river Thames, in the parish of Richmond, and constructing the necessary works, and the inhabitants have the protection that they shall have a sufficient supply of water, and if not that the company shall be liable to the penalties I have mentioned. In pursuance of the powers of that Act of Parliament the works were constructed, and down to the year 1861, that is a period of twenty-six years, the parish of Richmond uninterruptedly, and, as far as I know, satisfactorily were supplied with water drawn from the river Thames, in the parish of Richmond. In the year 1861 it seems to have become the object of the proprietors of the Richmond Company to amalgamate with the Southwark and Vauxhall Water Company, and, accordingly, an application was made to Parliament for power to amalgamate the two companies, and to transfer to the Southwark Company all the powers of the Richmond Company. The application to Parliament was unsuccessful; they did not obtain from Parliament the powers they sought for, and, therefore, the Richmond Company was left in its former condition, namely, clothed with the obligations imposed upon it by the Act of 1835, and the inhabitants had the protection which that Act also afforded them. The result of this being unsatisfactory to the proprietors of the Richmond Company, they proceeded to do indirectly that which Parliament had refused to authorize them to do directly. Finding that Parliament would not give them this power, all the shareholders in the Richmond Company (they were only eleven in number, I think,) agreed to sell their shares to the Southwark Company, and accordingly, by a deed dated in 1862, stated by the plaintiffs themselves in their statement of claim, the shares were transferred to the Southwark Company, and powers were given to them of a very extensive nature. I am far from thinking it in itself an unreasonable thing or disadvantageous to the inhabitants of Richmond that the Richmond Company, either because the source of the supply of water was unsatisfactory, or because the water was not sufficiently pure, or because of some inconvenience arising from taking it at that particular place, should have made this arrangement with the Southwark Company, a more powerful company, taking its water much higher up in the river Thames, so that instead of taking the impure water at Richmond, they should take the comparatively pure water at Hampton. I say I do not at all see that there was anything unreasonable or to blame in that, but I still adhere to what I have said, that a company constituted by Act of Parliament can cease only by virtue of another Act of Parliament, and that until that has been brought about it is still legally an existing company. Now the Richmond Company having agreed to transfer all their powers to the Southwark Company, agreed also to sell the property in the place where they took the water from the river Thames. Then having handed over all their powers and all their property as far as they could, although legally continuing to exist, practically I take it they ceased to exist from that time, 1862, and from that time down to Nov. 1875, there are no directors, the minute book is a complete blank. It has been proved distinctly that whereas up to 1862, the demands for water rates were made in the name of the Richmond Company, from that time the demands were made in the name of the Southwark Company, and the Southwark Company, when they proceeded to exercise the power of opening streets and so forth, were the parties who gave the notices. No doubt they professed on some occasions to give the notices on behalf of the Richmond Company, but it was the officers of the Southwark Company who did those things, and the Richmond Company had, in point of fact, practically ceased to have any existence. I say practically as distinguished from legally, because as I have already said, legally, no doubt they had and still have an existence. From this time, 1862, down towards the end of 1873, as far as I know, things went on satisfactorily, though I have been told great complaints were made on the part of the inhabitants of Richmond, first on account of the great increase in the rates charged for the water, and on other grounds, namely, insufficient supply, and the unsatisfactory quality of the water. The result of the evidence given before the special commissioner appointed by the Government was a report against the Southwark Company, and in favour of the vestry's right to construct independent works. Application was made to the Public Loan Commissioners, when the matter was again investigated, and they having been satisfied that the construction of these works was proper, having due regard to the interests of the inhabitants of Richmond, authorised a loan of 28,000*l.* for the construction of these new works. These circumstances are very strong in favour of the right of the vestry to construct their own water works, but this is a motion for an injunction to prevent their doing so. Apart from the provisions of the Act of Parliament to which I am about to refer, here is a parish which is already supplied with water, but yet there is nothing in the original Act of Parliament to say that other waterworks may not be established by another Act, or in any other way whatever. The Richmond company have certain privileges, but nothing more than a railway company running over a certain district who cannot claim the right to prevent any other railway from running from the same point. Independently of the other Acts to which I am about to refer, there is no monopoly, but the Richmond Company and the Southwark Company claim by virtue of these Acts of Parliament a monopoly in the supply of water for Richmond. The right to that monopoly first of all depends upon the Act which was in force at the time when the vestry first proceeded to give the necessary notices, as they were bound to do, and which they did, as I understand, by a notice dated the 22nd, and served on the 23rd Aug. 1873. At that time the Act which was then in force was the Public Health Act 1848. [His Lordship read the 75th section of the Act.] Mr. Pearson referred to the Act of last year, 1875, in which I do not find any very material difference. The Act of 1875 may be considered as laying down the law to the same effect, that any urban authority, that is, such as the vestry of Richmond, may provide that district or any part thereof, and any rural district may provide their district with a supply of water, proper and sufficient for public and private purposes, and for those purposes may construct and maintain waterworks, dig wells, and so on, and that is what the Richmond vestry propose doing. Then they may take on lease or hire any waterworks, or purchase any waterworks, or any water, or right to take or convey water, either within or without their district, and any rights, powers and privileges of any water company. [His Lordship then read the 52nd section of the Public Health Act 1875.] Now, on the 10th Feb. last, it turned out that the Richmond and Southwark companies were at that time promoting a Bill in Parliament which, if passed into law, would remove all these difficulties, and would transfer to the Southwark Company all the powers of the Richmond Company. Under those circumstances I ordered the motion to stand over until the result of the application to Parliament was known, because if it had been successful Parliament would have defined the rights of these parties, and probably it would have been unnecessary to renew this motion. Since that the Bill has been withdrawn, and I am now in the same situation, except that the arguments have been completed, as I was upon the 10th Feb. last. I have already said two things must concur in order to secure to the water company this monopoly. If there is an existing company, as there is here, and that company is able and willing to give a good supply of water, as is required by the Legislature, then in that concurrence of circumstances the company is entitled to the monopoly; but if it has merely a legal existence, and is not able and willing to give that supply, then the two conditions do not concur, and the mere legal existence will not entitle the company to that monopoly claimed by the Richmond Company. It is as plain as anything can be that the Richmond Company, by the sale of their pipes, mains, land, and so forth, have absolutely disabled themselves from supplying the town of Richmond with water. They, therefore, quâ the Richmond Company, are not able, they may be willing, but they are not able, and they must be "able and willing." But then they say (intending, I suppose, to adopt the legal maxim, "Qui facit per alium facit per se"), "Although we do not do it we have done it by our agents." Their agents are the Southwark Company. The answer to that is, the Southwark Company is a distinct company, created by different Acts of Parliament, having limited powers unquestionably, and no powers at Richmond. I have already intimated my opinion that there was nothing unreasonable, though it might not be legal, when the Richmond Company found themselves unable to do this, in their applying to an adjoining company whose pipes were laid through or near Richmond, to turn the pipes into Richmond so as to give a better supply than the Richmond Company could. Then comes this question, can one company delegate to another its powers, and can it arm that company with the powers which itself relinquishes? Upon the last occasion the decision of Sir. Geo. Turner, V.C., in The Great Northern Railway Company v. The Great Eastern Railway Company was appealed to, and Mr. Pearson this morning referred to other authorities, for instance, Shrewsbury and Birmingham Railway Company v. London and North-Western Railway Company and others, which he so much relied upon; but it appears to me to be a totally distinct case. That was a case in which certain railway companies had the power of running over amongst them a large tract of country, and the consequence of their running in opposition to each other was to destroy each other; thereupon they came to an arrangement that they would throw the common earnings into one purse, and divide them in certain defined proportions. What is there illegal in that? Nothing at all, and it was decided by the Court of Queen's Bench not to be an illegal contract. But where one company attempts to transfer all its powers, its privileges, and authorities to another company, then I apprehend it does fall within the rule laid down by Sir Geo. Turner, V.C., in the case of The Great Northern Railway Company v. The Great Eastern Railway Company, which I have heard no authority dispute, and in which I entirely agree. In that case it was decided, as appears by the marginal note, "An agreement between two railway companies, made without the authority of the Legislature, whereby one company delegates to another all the powers which have been conferred upon it by Parliament, is an unlawful attempt to effect that which Parliament alone can authorise, and is against public policy; and in such a case the court will not interfere to assist either of the parties in obtaining a collateral benefit, which the agreement would give, or aid them in any manner which would promote the object of the agreement." The rule is laid down by Sir Geo. Turner, V.C., (9 Ha. 310) as follows: "If, therefore, this case had rested wholly upon the construction of the agreement between the plaintiffs and the defendants, I should have thought it the duty of this court to interfere to some extent by injunction; but I think there lies at the root of this case a question of public policy, which precludes the interference of the court. It is impossible to read the agreement between the plaintiffs and the East Anglian Railways Company without being satisfied that it amounts to an entire delegation to the plaintiffs of all the powers conferred by Parliament upon the East Anglian Railway Company. All the stock of that company is to be taken by the plaintiffs without any obligation to restore it. The plaintiffs are to manage and regulate the railways of the East Anglian Company for the purposes of the agreement; and, although in form it is declared that the instrument shall not operate as a lease or agreement for a lease, it amounts in substance either to one or the other. It is framed in total disregard of the obligations and duties which attach upon these companies; and is an attempt to carry into effect, without the intervention of Parliament, what cannot lawfully be done except by Parliament in the exercise of its discretion with reference to the interests of the public." In the present case the Richmond Company attempted to transfer every power that they had, and, as I have already said, when the streets were opened, the notices were served by the Southwark Company, and when the rates were levied they were levied by the Southwark Company, and it is the Southwark Company who demand the payment of the rates and give the receipts for them. I would say here it is extremely remarkable that for thirteen years this state of things should have gone on without any legal proceedings being instituted, because it does seem to me perfectly plain that the Southwark Company, when they made out their charges, could not have enforced them, because any ratepayer might have said, "You have no power to come against me; you must not come into the parish of Richmond, and I do not submit to your jurisdiction." On the other hand, if the Southwark Company do not supply the water, there are powers which enable the inhabitants to proceed against the Richmond Company; therefore, that these defects of power should not have been the subject of litigation is somewhat remarkable. I have already said that the case lies in a very narrow compass, and it all depends upon the question whether, there being admittedly a legally existing company, it is a company "able and willing" to supply the district. How can they be able to supply the district when the only means they had of supplying it was from the River Thames, at a particular place, and that is now closed against them by their own act? How can they be able to do this when they have no power whatever of getting water anywhere except they buy it, because that is the effect of it, from the Southwark Company? The Legislature having, by an Act of Parliament, secured to an existing water company in the district in which the proposed works had to be erected, a monopoly on certain conditions, I think upon general principles the persons who are claiming that monopoly are imperatively bound to show that they have performed every part of the conditions in such a manner as shall leave no doubt in the mind of the court, and it seems to me, on the principle laid down by Sir Geo. Turner, V.C., that the plaintiffs have deprived themselves of the right to this monopoly by attempting illegally, not unreasonably to my mind, to transfer their powers to an existing company, which company cannot exercise the powers attempted to be conferred upon them by the original company, and, in my opinion, the original company, for the reasons I have stated, have entirely lost the power of exercising these privileges themselves. Upon these grounds, therefore, I come to the conclusion that the case made by the plaintiffs to prevent the vestry from constructing waterworks for the supply, or better supply, of the neighbourhood has failed. Being dissatisfied with the supply, in my opinion, the vestry have the right to proceed to erect new works, unless the Richmond company can distinctly establish a state of things which entitles them to say, "We have the monopoly and no man shall interfere with us," but that, in my opinion, they have failed to do, and, consequently, the motion must be dismissed with costs.

RICHMOND WATERWORKS COMPANY, &c. v. VESTRY OF RICHMOND.

JEPSON v. GRIBBLE.

Inhabited house duty—Exemption of hospital, charity school, or house provided for reception or relief of poor persons—14 & 15 Vict. c. 36, sect. 2—48 Geo. 3, c. 55, schedule B, case 4—Lunatic asylum—Residence of medical superintendent, detached from but within boundary of the asylum—Garden communicating with asylum.

The committee of visitors of the City of London Lunatic Asylum, established under the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97, appointed the appellant to be the medical resident superintendent of such asylum in accordance with sect. 55 of that Act, which contained a provision that he should be resident in such asylum. He lived in a separate and detached house, built upon ground within the boundary of the asylum (as the servant of the committee), and which was allotted to him as his residence, having been specially built for and occupied by the medical resident superintendents of the asylum, and not containing more accommodation than is reasonably necessary for the appellant and his family. From the rear of the house the appellant had ready and convenient access to the main buildings of the asylum by passing through a portion of the grounds of the asylum through a door or gate in the wall, which inclosed his garden on that side. The front part of the appellant's house abutted immediately upon the public road, thereby affording direct communication with the lane without passing through the asylum. On the right and left side the garden was inclosed by brick walls, in each of which was a door or gate leading into the asylum grounds. 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, schedule B, case 4, of the exemptions, provides for the exemption from the payment of inhabited house duties "any hospital, charity school, or house provided for the reception or relief of poor persons." The appellant having been assessed by the commissioners to the inhabited house duty in respect of such house under 14 & 15 Vict. c. 36,

Held, upon appeal, that the house formed part and parcel of the asylum, and was therefore within the exemption.

THIS was a case stated by the commissioners for executing the Acts relating to the inhabited house duties under and in pursuance of the Customs and Inland Revenue Acts 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 16), s. 9.

The appellant is the medical resident superintendent of the City of London County Lunatic Asylum, situated at Stone, near Dartford, in the county of Kent.

The respondent is the surveyor of taxes for the district in which the said asylum is situated.

The said City of London Lunatic Asylum is a lunatic asylum established under 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97, and is a hospital and house provided for the reception and relief of poor persons—that is to say, "for the lodging, maintenance, medicine, clothing, care, and treatment of pauper lunatics."

The committee of visitors of the asylum duly appointed the appellant to be the medical resident superintendent of such asylum under sect. 55 of the last-mentioned Act, by which he is compelled to reside in the asylum. His duties are defined by the Act.

The appellant lives in a separate and detached house built upon ground within the boundary of the asylum, as the servant of the committee, and which house is suitable and convenient for the performance of his duties, and is allotted to him for that purpose.

From the rear of the house the appellant has ready and convenient access to the main buildings of the asylum by passing through a door or gate in the wall which incloses the garden on that side.

The front part of the garden of the appellant's house abuts immediately upon the public lane, so that he has direct communication with such lane without passing through the asylum. The garden is inclosed on the right and left by brick walls, and in each of these walls is a door or gate leading into the asylum grounds.

The house is occupied by and was specially built as the residence of the medical superintendent of the asylum, and does not contain more accommodation than is reasonably necessary for himself and family.

In respect of this house the appellant was assessed for the year 1874 ending the 5th of April 1875 (under 14 & 15 Vict. c. 36) to the inhabited house duty, upon 50*l.* at 9*d.* in the pound, making 1*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*

The appellant contended before the commissioners that his residence formed part of the asylum, and was therefore part of a hospital and house provided for the reception and relief of poor persons, and was exempt from the payment of house duty under case 4 of the exemptions contained in 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, schedule B, which exempts "any hospital, charity school, or house provided for the reception or relief of poor persons."

The respondent Gribble, the surveyor of taxes for that district, contended that the residence of the appellant was a separate and distinct house from the asylum, although it was situate and built upon the asylum land, and therefore did not fall within the exemption.

[Ex. Div.]

JEPSON v. GRIBBLE.

[Ex. Div.]

The commissioners decided that the appellant was not entitled to the exemption, but was liable to pay the 1*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* as inhabited house duty.

The question for the opinion of the court is whether the appellant is liable, with respect to his said residence, to be assessed to the inhabited house duty. The court to draw inferences of fact.

Poland, for the appellant. — The appellant's house falls within the exemptions contained in 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, and is therefore exempt from assessment; it is as much within the exemption as if it were physically a part of the main buildings of the asylum. By 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97, which regulates "lunatic asylums for the maintenance and care of pauper lunatics," it is enacted by sect. 55 that the committee of visitors of every asylum shall appoint a medical officer, "who shall be resident in such asylum;" and by sect. 132 the word "asylum" is defined as meaning "any asylum, house, building, or place already erected or provided, or to be erected or provided under the provisions of this Act." Under these provisions the land was bought, the plans settled, and this house built upon the ground and within the walls of the asylum, and the appellant occupies the house not as tenant but as the servant of the committee, merely having the permissive use of the premises, and being obliged to reside within the asylum, and is liable to be turned out of his residence without notice. In Congreve v. The Overseers of Upton (19 L. T. Rep. 384; 4 B. & S. 857; 33 L. J. N. S. 83, M. C.), it was held that a medical superintendent whose house was situated with reference to the asylum very much as is the case here was not liable to be rated to the poor rate because he was resident in such asylum, and thus came within the exemptions above mentioned.

The Attorney-General (Sir John Holker, Q.C.), and Pinder, for the respondent. — This house forms no part of the asylum, and therefore does not fall within the exemption. The main buildings of the asylum are no doubt exempt, but the appellant's residence is neither in letter nor spirit "a hospital, charity school, or house provided for the reception or relief of poor persons." The effect of holding that such residence is within the exemption would be to hold that one entirely detached and separate house complete in itself is part of another building. The case of Congreve v. The Overseers of Upton, cited by the other side, is not an authority on the present point. That was a question not of house duties or exemptions, but of rateability to the poor under a special clause, the facts being quite different to the present case. The observations of Blackburn, J., as to the residence in the asylum only establish that the medical officer complied with sect. 55 of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97, which requires him to be resident in the asylum, and they must be read with reference to the subject matter and the decision, was that the building in which the medical officer resided was acquired for the "purposes of the asylum." Formerly, under 43 Geo. 3, c. 161, s. 73 (since repealed), these cases were heard before the judges sitting in Serjeants' Inn, the case on both sides having been impartially stated by the Commissioners of the Inland Revenue; the present point has been decided in favour of the Crown in three cases thus heard, as appears from the records of those cases and the decisions which are kept in the archives of the Inland Revenue. In the first (McCulloch's case) the medical superintendent was held not to be within the exemption; the house was in the asylum grounds, and separated from the asylum by a turnpike road, which ran through the grounds of the asylum; the only distinction between that case and the present is, there the house was built on grounds of the asylum, but upon the other side of a turnpike road, here the appellant's house is separated from the asylum by a wall. [KELLY, C.B. — That is the distinction; the wall is the property of the asylum.] Yes, but so was the turnpike road the property of the asylum, as it owned the land on each side, the public having only an easement over the road. In the second case, the judges held that the chaplain's house, which, as in the present case, was in the grounds of the asylum, was not exempt. [AMPHLETT, B. — But 16 & 17 Vict. c. 97, s. 55, does not require the chaplain to be resident in the asylum.] The construction of an exemption cannot depend upon whether another statute requires residence within the asylum, nor on whether that requirement is obeyed. It may be that the present appellant has disobeyed the provisions of sect. 55, or even that his appointment is not valid within that section. In the third case (Gibb's case) the governor and the chaplain of Kirkdale Gaol each resided in a house separated from the gaol itself, but within the grounds of the gaol, the governor's house forming part of the boundary of the gaol, with two fronts, one towards a public road and the other towards the gaol yard; he lived in the house rent free; there was a door leading into the street, and another into the prison; and it was held that the governor's and chaplain's houses were not exempt from the payment of house duty. That case certainly was not a decision upon the exemption in favour of "a house for the reception or relief of poor persons," but came under another Act of Parliament, but the position was analogous.

Poland replied.

KELLY, C.B. — I think that in this case the appellant is entitled to our judgment. It is perfectly clear that this lunatic asylum is within the words of the Act, "any hospital charity school, or house provided for the reception or relief of poor persons;" and the only question is, whether the house in which the appellant, the medical superintendent, lives, and which is the subject of this assessment, is part and parcel of the asylum, so as to come within the exemption contained in case 4. I think it is. It is within the curtilage, and is provided for the residence of a person whose attendance may at any moment be required for the inmates of the asylum, and who ought, therefore, to be always at hand. Under these circumstances I hold, without any doubt, that the Legislature intended that what is substantially part and parcel of the asylum shall be exempt, unless there be some recognised decision given by a Superior Court to the contrary effect. Of the cases cited by the Attorney-General only one resembles the present, and that one was not decided in the courts of law. There is this broad distinction between it and the present: there the medical superintendent's house was separated from the asylum, and was on the other side of a public road, and it is therefore clear it formed no part of the asylum. Here it must be taken actually to form part and parcel of the asylum, so as to exempt it from assessment within the meaning of the Legislature.

AMPHLETT, B.—I am of the same opinion, and for the same reasons, and I should have had no doubt even were there no authority on the question; but the case of Congreve v. The Overseers of Upton, though a case of a poor rate, has a strong bearing on the present point, because the question there was, whether the medical officer's residence was within the asylum, and was therefore very much the same as in the present case. I observe in that case there were two appeals, one by the chaplain and one by the medical superintendent, who had each been rated for their respective houses. With regard to the chaplain, the court held that, inasmuch as it was not necessary that he should always be present or resident, and since his house was not used "for the purposes of the asylum" within the meaning of the statute, he must be rated for his house at the actual value. But with regard to the medical superintendent, Mr. Justice Blackburn says, "This statute expressly directs by sect. 55 that he shall be resident in the asylum." Mr. Welsby argued that the words "in such asylum" must be construed to mean strictly within the curtilage of the building where the patients sleep at night, a place which might be so laid in an indictment for burglary. But that is not a reasonable meaning of those words. They mean that his residence must be in grounds appropriated to the asylum, so as to be reasonably within it. Now, looking at the position of the building as described in this case, we cannot say that it was not in the asylum, if we once assume that it need not be under the actual roof. The position of the medical superintendent's house was much the same as in the present case; and since it is necessary that there should be a resident medical officer, and that he should be accommodated with a proper house, whether it be actually part of the main building of the asylum or not, it is a necessary adjunct, and is therefore part of the asylum. As to the cases cited from the Revenue Office books, there are none of them which exactly agree with the present. The nearest, perhaps, is that of the Governor of Kirkdale Gaol; but there there was no such exemption as in the present case, nor any exemption on the ground that the house was in the occupation of the Crown, and the judges thought it was not. It has therefore no direct bearing on the present case; and our judgment therefore be for the appellant.

HUDDLESTON, B.—I am of the same opinion. Even without any interpretation clause, it is clear that the asylum itself would be within the exemption, because it is expressly found in the case that the asylum "is a hospital and house provided for the reception and relief of poor persons." I agree with my Lord and my brother Amphlett, that the whole of the grounds form part of the asylum, and it is found in the case that the medical superintendent's house is built on part of the grounds of the asylum. According to the modern method of treating lunatics, the gardens and grounds are almost as necessary as the dormitories or any other part of the building. I think, therefore, that the medical superintendent's house is part of the asylum. Now, with regard to the cases that were quoted by the Attorney-General as having been decided by the judges in Serjeants' Inn, I have no doubt that the records existing in the Inland Revenue Office have been correctly drawn up; but I must enter my protest against these being cited as in any way binding upon us. The reasons for the decisions are not given, the records have not the guarantee of a reporter known to the public, and they have never been properly laid before the public so as to be discussed, and to enable any defects which there may be in the reports to be detected. I do not feel inclined to look at them; moreover, none of the cases cited are conclusive of the present point.

RIDSDALE v. CLIFTON AND OTHERS.

MOTION IN AN APPEAL FROM THE ARCHES COURT OF CANTERBURY.

Ecclesiastical law—Public Worship Regulation Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 85, s. 9)—Practice—Inhibition—Discretion.

The issuing of an inhibition pending an appeal, though almost a matter of course before the passing of the Public Worship Regulation Act 1874, was still a matter for the discretion of the court; and the power given to the judge by the 9th section of that Act to suspend the execution of a monition pending an appeal must be taken as an indication that, looking at the balance of convenience in each particular case, it ought to be considered whether the decree should be executed or stayed.

It will not be stayed with regard to matters only affecting the manner of performing the service, in which no inconvenience or irremediable injury will arise from its being obeyed pending an appeal; secus, with regard to matters such as the removal of a figure, which might involve more serious consequences. Judgment of the court below affirmed with a variation.

THE appellant in this case was the incumbent of St. Peter's Church, Folkestone, in the Diocese of Canterbury.

In 1875 the respondents, who were parishioners of the parish, commenced proceedings against him under "The Public Worship Regulation Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 85)." The representation contained twelve charges, as follows: (1) the use of altar-lights; (2) wearing unlawful vestments; (3) using wine at the Communion with which water had been mixed; (4) using wafer bread at the Communion; (5) standing on the west side of the Communion table with his back to the people during the prayer of consecration; (6) kneeling during that prayer; (7) causing a hymn called the "Agnus" to be sung immediately after that prayer; (8) celebrating the Communion when only one person communicated with him; (9) and (10) taking part in processions round the interior of the church with a cross and banners; (11) the erection of a chancel screen with a metal crucifix and candles upon it; (12) the erection of figures in relief in the interior of the church representing scenes called the "Stations of the Cross."

Upon this last point there had been previous litigation in the year 1873. (See the case of Lee v. Fagg, 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 801; L. Rep. 4 A. & E. 135, and 6 P. C. 38).

The defendant (the present appellant), by his answer admitted the unlawfulness of the act charged in the sixth head of the representation, and discontinued the same. The case was heard upon the other heads before the Dean of Arches (Lord Penzance), sitting at Lambeth Palace, on Jan. 4th, 5th, and 6th, 1876, when the learned judge held that as to the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, 4th, 5th, 7th, 9th, and 10th charges he was bound by the former decisions of the Court of Arches in the cases of Martin v. Mackonochie (1) (L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 116; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 245), Elphinstone v. Purchas (L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 66; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 446), and Martin v. Mackonochie (2) (L. Rep. 4 A. & E. 279; 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 568) and of the Privy Council in the cases of Martin v. Mackonochie (1) (L. Rep. 2 P. C. 365; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 503) and Hibbert v. Purchas (L. Rep. 3 P. C. 605), and the argument was confined to the 8th, 11th, and 12th charges. The learned judge took time to consider his judgment, and on the 3rd Feb. decided against the defendant on all points.

From this judgment notice of an appeal to the Privy Council on the 2nd, 4th, 5th, and 11th charges, was given.

By the order of the court below the appellant was admonished to abstain from the practices, matters, acts, and things therein set forth, and on the 26th Feb. he moved the court to suspend the execution of the motion on the points appealed against, under the power conferred by sect. 9 of the Act, pending the determination of the appeal; but the motion was refused with costs. The judgment of the court (Lord Penzance) in so refusing the motion was as follows: I must say I think it would be a great misfortune if I were bound by any view of the justice of this case to concede this application. One of the evils that existed before the late Act was the grievance that, when the Court of Arches had decided the thing to be lawful or unlawful, appeal was had to the Queen in Council; and the immediate effect of that appeal was to stay the hand of the inferior court, so that the decisions of the court never could have any effect until a great length of time had elapsed, and until very great expense had been incurred. Reference has been had to what happens in other courts. It is now under the Judicature Act the universal practice in all the courts that the court appealed from should be able to hold its hand over the circumstances under which the appeal should go on, and that it should have the discretion to suspend the operation of its own judgment or decree in proper cases, but that where such circumstances do not exist as to render it a proper case for that suspension, the rule should be that the decree of the Inferior Court should go forward. That was the practice in the Probate Court under the Probate Act, it was the practice of the Courts of Equity, and in some cases it was the practice of the Courts of Law, but now by the Judicature Acts it is the practice of all the courts in Westminster Hall. To that extent the analogy of other courts is a thing to look to. But the circumstances under which other courts think it right to stay the execution of the decree of the inferior court will be of very little assistance to this court, owing to the very different nature of the matters involved. Therefore I do not hold with the proposition that because courts of equity lay down the rule—if they do lay it down—that irreparable injury must be done before they will stay the decree, this court should take the same principle as its guide. I think that the principle, and the only principle, if it can be called a principle, which is to be adopted is that the court in each case should consider the whole of the circumstances, the amount of actual injury, the amount of grievance to people's feelings, the circumstances under which the alleged offence has been committed, the state of the law in previous cases, and a variety of other circumstances, in fact every circumstance that could bear upon the matter, that the court should take all that into its consideration and then, if special grounds are shown to exist, that it should hold its hand until the Superior Court has had cognizance of the case. That I believe is the only principle which can be laid down for the exercise of the power confided to this court by the late Act of Parliament. Then the question is whether in this case any special grounds have been shown. The respondent in the present case has been in the habit of conducting the services of his church in direct contravention of the law as settled by the Supreme Tribunal in the last case that came before it. I do not know whether I may assume, from his appealing only in respect to certain points, that he is prepared to yield obedience to the law upon those points as to which he has not appealed. I hope I may; but in the cases in which he has appealed he now asks upon no special grounds,—except that he still maintains that these matters are not illegal, which is a proposition that everybody maintains in such cases,—upon no special grounds he asks that he should be allowed to continue the services in a way which the Supreme Court of Appeal has declared to be illegal, until he can have the opportunity, if the court permits him that opportunity, of questioning again in that court its own decision, and inducing it to revoke the conclusion at which it previously arrived. Now that seems to me a very unreasonable thing to ask. I think he should obey the law as it stands. I think he should perform his services as the Supreme Court of Appeal has declared they ought to be performed, and then he will come with clean hands at least to the Superior Court, saying, I have been obedient to the law up to the present time and I ask you to allow me to open the question again which you have previously decided, and to endeavour to persuade you if I can that you on a former occasion came to a wrong decision. That applies to three of the four points upon which alone an appeal is granted. The fourth point is as to a decision of this court of a novel character—the point has not been decided before. Now upon that matter I will say this, that I think this court, like all inferior courts, ought not by any means to assume that its own judgment will ultimately be affirmed, and therefore if any decision is given in this court upon which an order issued which may be very painful to the consciences of those against whom it is directed, I can conceive cases in which it would be very proper indeed that that order should be withheld, or its operation suspended until the Superior Court had had an opportunity of declaring whether it was justified or not; but in this case I can conceive no difficulty of that kind, because the order here is to take off from the crucifix the figure which, as the learned Counsel has very properly pointed out, was proved in the case not to be a part of the same structure as the cross, but to have been distinct from it, and screwed upon the cross; it, therefore, can be detached without the slightest difficulty, it also can be detached and removed without doing injury to the religious feelings, scruples, or consciences of anybody; because we must always recollect that the respondent maintains that this figure is a mere architectural decoration; and if it is only a decoration of the church, the loss of that decoration for the period during which this case is under appeal is not a matter that really could wound the most sensitive conscience. Viewing this figure, therefore, in the light in which the respondent views it, it seems to me that there is no pretence for applying to the court on any special ground as to the injury that would be done to people's feelings, or to the structure of the church, by the removal of the figure, until the Court of Appeal shall have determined, if it does determine, that it may lawfully be put up again. Therefore, going through the items of the respondent's appeal, looking at the circumstances in which they stand, looking particularly to the state of the law as it now is settled by the supreme tribunal in these matters, and not throwing aside or being unaware of the strong feeling that exists upon many of these subjects, I still think it plain that the respondent ought to obey the law as he now finds it, and that until he can succeed in reversing it he ought to be content to conduct the service of the church in accordance with the judgment that the Privy Council have already delivered. The power confided to this court under the section of the Act to which allusion has been made is one that ought to be sparingly applied—it is one that ought to be applied only where very special circumstances exist, and as in my opinion no such circumstances exist in this case I must reject the application, with costs.

From this judgment the present appeal was brought.

W. G. F. Phillimore appeared for the appellant. B. Shaw for the respondents.

Their Lordships' judgment was delivered by the LORD CHANCELLOR (Cairns).—In the case in which their Lordships have now to express their opinion an appeal has been instituted against the decision of Lord Penzance, as Judge of the Arches Court, dated 3rd Feb. 1876, and the matters complained of, with regard to that decision, are these: First, that it pronounces unlawful the wearing of certain vestments; secondly, that it pronounces as unlawful the use in the Holy Communion of wafer bread or wafers; thirdly, that it pronounces unlawful the standing by the minister while saying the Prayer of Consecration in the Communion Service at the middle of the west side of the Communion Table, in such wise that during the whole time of the saying of the Prayer he was between the people and the Communion Table, with his back to the people, so that people could not see him break the bread or take the cup into his hand; and, fourthly, that it pronounces as unlawful the setting up and placing on the top of the screen separating the chancel of the church from the body of the church, and still retaining thereon, a crucifix. The decree which is thus complained of and appealed against in its form admonishes the present appellant, the Rev. Charles Joseph Ridsdale, to abstain for the future from the practices and acts set forth in the decree, and from sanctioning and permitting the same; and it also further goes on to direct, affirmatively, the Rev. Charles Joseph Ridsdale to remove or cause to be removed from the top of the screen the figure on the cross fixed thereon. Now that decree having been made, and notice of appeal having been given, an application was made, as is usual in such cases, for the process which is called inhibition, and citation and monition for process—monition for documents; and against the issuing of that process a caveat has been lodged, which has made it necessary for the Rev. Mr. Ridsdale, the appellant, to come before their Lordships, and to ask that the process which he seeks should issue. If the process issues in the triplicate form to which I have referred, of inhibition, citation, and monition, the inhibition will restrain the execution of the decree, to which I have referred, pending the appeal; and therefore, in substance, the motion now before their Lordships raises the question whether proceedings in this case under the decree should or should not be stayed pending the appeal. Now it has been contended, on behalf of Mr. Ridsdale, here, in the very able argument which we have heard, that the issuing of an inhibition, in cases like the present, has always been a matter of course, and is still a matter of course, notwithstanding the provisions of the Public Worship Regulation Act of 1874, and that therefore the caveat against the issuing of the inhibition ought to be removed, and the inhibition ought to issue as a matter of course, as part of the process. That makes it necessary for their Lordships to consider what the nature and character of the part of the process termed the inhibition, upon the occasion of an appeal, was before the passing of the Act of Parliament to which I have referred. There is no doubt that in every appeal in ecclesiastical cases it was very much a matter of course to issue an inhibition. It was in fact so much a matter of course that it was permitted to the officer of the court to issue the inhibition as part of the process, whenever it was applied for. But their Lordships cannot arrive at the conclusion that because in every case where there was, or appeared to be, a probable cause for litigation, evidenced by the appeal being brought, the issue of this process was so common as to be left as a ministerial act to the officer of the court; they cannot from this arrive at the conclusion that the discretion of the court as to issuing an inhibition was taken away, or that this tribunal or the supreme tribunal for the time being in ecclesiastical cases, where a case was brought pointedly before its notice, would not have it in its power to exercise its discretion as to whether an inhibition staying proceedings should or should not issue. If their Lordships look to authority upon the subject they cannot but think that the expressions of Sir John Nichols, in the case of Herbert v. Herbert (2 Phil. 430), show very clearly that in his opinion in a proper case the discretion rested with the tribunal to issue, or not to issue, an inhibition; and the authorities which are referred to in the argument, in that case, go very strongly to the same point, especially the passage cited from Ayliffe's Parergon, which is printed at length in a note to the case at p. 441. Moreover, upon the reason of the thing, their Lordships also are of opinion that a court which has the right to entertain an appeal must of necessity have this discretion with regard to the issuing of a process, such as inhibition. The inhibition is only a collateral and incidental part of the process. The main process is that of citation, calling upon the party in possession of the decree to appear before this tribunal, and to defend the decree which he has obtained. It would be a strange thing indeed if that which is ancillary and incidental to the main jurisdiction of the appellate tribunal could not be moulded, issued, or refused to be issued, as the tribunal should think best under the circumstances of the particular case. I have only to add to this, with regard to the position of matters before the passing of the Public Worship Regulation Act, the circumstance that certain rules were issued by this board in pursuance of the stat. 6 & 7 Vict. c. 28, and that it is necessary to refer to an argument which has been urged with regard to these rules, that they in some way have made the issuing of an inhibition in this case absolutely necessary. Now the rules which are material upon this point are the fourth and fifth. The fourth is in this form: "When the registrar has ascertained that the petition of appeal has been referred to the Judicial Committee, he may, on the application of the solicitor, issue the usual inhibition and citation and monition for process." He may do this, on the application of the solicitor—issue the triplicate form of process, inhibition, and citation, and monition for process; but if their Lordships are right in considering, as they do consider, that the issue or non-issue of the inhibition was a matter of discretion, of course this reference in the rules to the usual inhibition, citation, and monition for process must mean triplicate process when it was to be in triplicate; and where, if ever, the court should hold that the inhibition should not issue, then the process is confined and limited to the citation and monition for process. This fifth rule is to this effect: "If within one month from the date of the petition of appeal being referred to the Judicial Committee the solicitor for an appellant shall not take out the inhibition and citation and monition for process, the appeal shall stand dismissed." Upon that it was argued, that, unless the threefold process were to issue, Mr. Ridsdale would be deprived of his appeal, and it would be absolutely dismissed in consequence of this Order. Their Lordships cannot adopt that construction of the rule. In their opinion, if it is in their discretion, as they think it is, to say, on a proper case being presented to them, whether the inhibition shall or shall not issue, the Order that it shall not issue will render the taking out the other two parts of the process, the citation and monition for process, sufficient to save the appeal under this Order. In point of fact, the description of the triplicate process is description only, and does not raise the necessity, as an absolute necessity, that the process should be in that triplicate form. Now, that being the state of the law, as their Lordships understand it, before the Act for the Regulation of Public Worship passed, their Lordships have to consider the effect of that statute. Their Lordships approach the consideration of the statute, bearing in mind therefore that before it passed the issue of an inhibition, although so common as to be almost matter of course, was still matter of discretion, if the discretion of this board were called upon to be exercised upon it. The statute of 1874 provides, by the ninth section, what shall be the form of proceedings before the judge under the Act, or the Judge of the Court of Arches, as the case may be, and it provides that the judge shall pronounce judgment on the matter of the representation, and shall deliver to the parties on application, and to the bishop, a copy of the special case, if any, and judgment. It provides further that the judge shall issue such monition, if any, and make such order as to costs as the judgment shall require. It provides then, further, that upon any judgment of the judge, or monition issued in accordance therewith, an appeal shall lie in the form prescribed by rules and orders to Her Majesty in Council; and then comes this final sentence in the clause, "The judge may, on application, in any case suspend the execution of such monition, pending an appeal, if he shall think fit." We find, therefore, in this Act of Parliament, that which certainly did not exist as a power in the ecclesiastical judge before the Act passed. Before this Act passed there was no power whatever in the ecclesiastical judge to suspend proceedings under his decree pending an appeal. There was, as has been pointed out at the bar, a power somewhat, perhaps, arbitrary in the judge to keep possession of his decree in the office of the court until an opportunity were given for the dissatisfied party to present a petition of appeal to Her Majesty in Council, and to obtain an inhibition, which, if obtained, would prevent the execution of the decree. But power in the judge himself to restrain proceedings under the decree during the whole of the appeal did not exist. That was given for the first time by this statute. Now their Lordships cannot look at this provision in the statute as otherwise than an indication that in the opinion of the Legislature it ought to be considered in each particular case whether the decree made in that case should be executed pending an appeal, or should be stayed pending an appeal. The intimation of the Legislature is distinct, that that is a matter which ought to be entertained as a question of discretion, and brought, at all events in the first instance, for the decision of the judge himself who has made the decree. That has been done in the present case, and the decision of the judge in the present case is, for reasons which he has stated, that the execution of no part of his decree should be suspended pending the appeal. Their Lordships are not sitting upon appeal from that order of the learned judge, because no appeal from that order appears to be given by the Act of Parliament; but they are sitting here considering the application which is now made to them, that in their discretion the inhibition in the present case should not issue restraining the execution of this decree, either in whole or in part, and they are unable to treat the Act of Parliament as doing otherwise than introducing a new element for them to consider in exercising their discretion as to whether the inhibition ought to issue. Now, therefore, applying those principles to the case which their Lordships have to decide, in their opinion, the mode in which they have to look at a case like the present is this: to consider the balance of convenience or inconvenience with regard to the execution of the decree; that is to say, looking at the facts of the particular case, looking at what is ordered by the court to be done, whether upon the whole it would be better that the decree of the judge should be allowed to take its course, or whether the things which it orders to be done are in their nature such as that the doing of them would produce so much injury that it would be more desirable that the decree should be stayed until the decision of the final tribunal is known. That is a practice which is well known in other courts. It is well known, for example, in the Court of Chancery, where, upon an application to stay the execution of a decree, it has always been considered to be the question for the court whether the balance of convenience was more in favour of restraining the execution of the decree in the particular case, or more in favour of letting the decree take its course. Now in the present case, their Lordships do not desire to express, and it would not be proper for them to express, any opinion whatever as to the merits of the appeal which ultimately will have to be heard from this decree. They give credit for the present purpose to the decree as the decree of the learned judge by whom it has been made. On the other hand, they give credit to the sincerity of those who have considered that there is ground for impeaching that decree, and who wish to have their case against the decree heard at the proper time. But, on the other hand, treating the decree as at present, until reversed, the order of the court, and on the other hand treating the appeal as evidence that in the opinion, at all events, of the appellant there is probabilis causa litigandi, they have to look at what are the things which the decree orders to be done or to be left undone. Now in that respect they find a very marked difference between different parts of the decree. With regard to the vestments pronounced unlawful, and which therefore are directed not to be worn; with regard to the use of the wafer bread, which is also pronounced to be unlawful, and which is therefore directed not to be used; with regard to the posture of standing during the Prayer of Consecration at the west side of the Communion Table, which is also pronounced unlawful, and where therefore the minister is directed not to stand at that time; with regard to all these things, their Lordships consider that no inconvenience and no injury which would be irremediable will arise from the decree being obeyed in those matters pending the appeal. The other point is different. I refer to the part of the decree which pronounces unlawful the setting up and placing on the top of the screen separating the chancel of the church and retaining there a crucifix; and as to this the decree directs the Rev. Charles Joseph Ridsdale to remove or cause to be removed this crucifix from the screen. Their Lordships do not desire to make any difference between this and the other parts of the decree as to what may be termed the merits; that is to say, they do not, by what they are going to order, wish to place that part of the decree in any different position from the other parts of the decree as regards the correctness of the decree itself. They give credit on that part of the decree as they do to the other parts of the decree, to that which is for the present the decision of the court below, but they see that different consequences may arise, as to this part of the decree, from executing it pending the decree. It is unnecessary to go into what those consequences are, beyond saying that it is, obviously from the nature of the case, at least possible that a subject which ought to be treated with the greatest reverence might be accompanied with feelings of a different kind if the decree were in this respect in the first instance to be executed, and afterwards upon a reversal of that decree the process had to be repeated of making another change. For those reasons, and for those only, their Lordships desire to make a difference between this last part of the decree and the parts which precede it. And as to this latter part of the decree, they desire that by the inhibition the execution of that part of the decree should be suspended pending the appeal. The inhibition therefore will go limited in the manner which has been indicated to the last part of the decree, but not so as to restrain the execution of any of the other parts of the decree. With regard to costs, their Lordships do not think it fit to give any costs of this appeal to either side.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. ST. JOHN'S HOSPITAL, BATH.

*Charity—Eleemosynary charity—Religious

St. John's Hospital, Bath, was founded in the year 1174 by the then Bishop of Bath and Wells, and consisted of a master and certain almspeople; a chapel was annexed to the hospital.

In 1853 an order was made, under the provisions of the Municipal Corporations Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76), appointing the then trustees of the municipal charities of the City of Bath to be the trustees of the right of presentation to the mastership of the hospital.

A scheme, recently framed by the Attorney-General for the management of the charity property, provided (1) that the trustees thereof should be such of the municipal trustees as were members of the Church of England; (2) that the municipal trustees should appoint the master, who must be a clergyman in priest's orders; (3) that the trustees should keep the chapel in repair out of the income of the charity; and (4) should elect the almspeople (who need not be members of the Church of England).

Held that, as the principal object of the charity was eleemosynary, the trustees of the charity property need not be exclusively members of the Church of England.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. ST. JOHN'S HOSPITAL, BATH.

[CHAN. DIV.]

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

The hospital was founded in the year 1174 by the then bishop of Bath and Wells (although the particular foundation did not appear), and consisted originally of a master, six brethren and sisters.

There was a chapel, called St. Michael's, which was annexed to the mastership of the hospital, and was a living presentable with cure of souls.

On the 21st Nov. 1573, Queen Elizabeth, by letters patent, granted "theadvowson, donation, free disposition, and right of presentation of the hospital of St. John Baptist, with the chapel of St. Michael, to the same annexed," to the mayor and citizens of Bath.

There having been great abuses in the management of the charity, in 1716 the matter came before Sir John Trevor, the then Master of the Rolls, and on the 13th Feb. 1716, he, acting as arbitrator for settling all disputes concerning the management of the hospital and its revenues, "and for the better and more orderly government of the said hospital, and for a better provision for the poor thereof, and for the rebuilding of the said chapel, and for the more due and decent daily service to Almighty God, to be performed daily in the chapel of the said hospital, and for repairing the said hospital, and for establishing rules and orders for the management of the same," made an award, which was afterwards confirmed by the court.

By clause 10 of the award it was declared that the right of presentation of the master belonged to the Corporation of Bath by the grant of the fifteenth of Elizabeth . . . and that the government of the hospital should be in the master for the time being, according to such rules and orders as were thereunto annexed, and that the brethren and sisters should be obedient to him, and that the master should take care that prayers were duly read in the chapel morning and evening every day, as well on Sundays as week days, according to the Liturgy of the Church of England.

By clause 11 of the award it was provided that brethren and sisters, as vacancies should happen, should be nominated and put in by the master of the hospital, but such brethren and sisters were to be such as had been settled inhabitants of the city of Bath for at least ten years before such admission into the hospital, and persons really poor and unmarried, and to be qualified according to the rules and orders annexed to the award. Rule 1 of the rules and orders established by the award provided that every person to be admitted into the said hospital should be such as had been known to be of a sober and civil conversation, and conformable to the established government in church and state, and should be most in want and best deserved; and rule 3 provided that every person admitted should duly resort, in his or her livery gown, to morning and evening prayers in the chapel belonging to the said hospital, unless detained by sickness, or some other urgent occasion.

From the date of the award the master of the hospital had been nominated by the Corporation of Bath, and the hospital had been governed, and the brethren and sisters appointed, in the manner directed by the award.

The Municipal Corporations Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 71) provides that where bodies corporate stand seised or possessed of any hereditaments or personal estate in trust in whole or in part for charitable trusts, all the estate and interest, and all the powers of such body corporate in respect of the said trusts, shall as from the 1st Aug. 1836, cease and determine; and the Lord Chancellor shall make such order as he shall see fit for the administration of such trust estates.

By an order dated the 3rd Nov. 1836, the Lord Chancellor appointed certain persons to be trustees of the municipal charities of the City of Bath. This order, however, did not affect the property belonging to the hospital.

In 1851 a petition was presented to determine the rights of the Corporation of Bath in the property in question; and in Feb. 1851 Lord Chancellor Truro decided that the right of presentation of the master was a right vested in the corporation as charitable trustees within the meaning of 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 71, and directed a reference to chambers to appoint new trustees (Re St. John's Hospital, 3 M. & G. 235); and by an order dated the 12th Nov. 1853, his Lordship appointed the several persons then being trustees of the municipal charities of the City of Bath to be trustees of the right of presentation to the mastership of the hospital.

In 1864, an information was filed by the Attorney-General against the Master, co-Brethren, and Sisters of the Hospital of St. John the Baptist, with the Chapel of St. Michael annexed, in the City of Bath, and William Thomas Blair, and others (the then survivors of the persons appointed, by the Order of the Court of the 12th Nov. 1853, to be trustees of the right of presentation to the mastership of the hospital), praying (inter alia) that a scheme might be settled for the administration of the charity.

By the decree made in Dec. 1865, the court directed a scheme to be settled. The scheme of the Attorney-General, made pursuant to the decree, was (so far as material), as follows:

Clause 1. The charity and the property thereof shall be under the management and control of trustees. The trustees of the charity shall consist of such of the trustees for the time being appointed, pursuant to the provisions of the Act of Parliament 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, to be trustees of the municipal charities formerly vested in the Corporation of the City of Bath, as shall be members of the Church of England, who shall be ex officio trustees of the charity. No trustee shall act in the administration of the charity until he shall have signed a memorandum to the effect that he is a member of the Church of England, and is willing to undertake the trust as regulated by this scheme.

Clause 18. The master of the hospital shall be a clergyman of the Church of England in priests' orders. The right of presentation of the master is vested in the trustees for the time being appointed in pursuance of the Act of Parliament 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, to exercise the power in that behalf formerly vested in the Corporation of the City of Bath.

Clause 22. The master shall read prayers every morning, and perform two full services every Sunday in the chapel of the hospital, according to the ritual of the Church of England.

Clause 24. The number of almspeople in the hospital shall be twelve, subject to be increased as hereinafter mentioned; and any vacancy in such number shall be filled up by the trustees in manner hereinafter mentioned.

Clause 25. The persons elected to be almspeople in the hospital shall be poor persons of either sex, who shall have been resident in or ratepayers of the municipal borough of Bath for at least three years preceding the date of election, and who shall have attained the age of fifty-five years at the least: Provided always, that no person shall be elected who shall have been in the receipt of parochial relief within twelve months next preceding the time of election.

Clause 26. On the occasion of any vacancy among the almspeople, the trustees shall elect a person duly qualified as aforesaid.

Clause 28. Accommodation for all the almspeople shall be provided in the chapel of the hospital; but it shall not be obligatory on the almspeople to attend the services performed therein.

Clause 35. The trustees shall provide and expend the moneys required for the necessary expenses connected with the chapel, and the performance of divine worship therein, out of the income of the charity.

Clause 37. The trustees shall keep all the hospital buildings and premises, including the chapel, in good and sufficient repair . . . and the expenses thereof shall be paid out of the income of the charity.

It appeared from the evidence that there were thirteen trustees of the municipal charities of the City of Bath, of whom ten were members of the Church of England, and three were dissenters.

The main question in argument was, whether the trustees of the charity property, appointed by the scheme, must be exclusively members of the Church of England.

Cotton, Q.C. and Vaughan Hawkins for the Attorney-General.—This is not an ordinary lay hospital, but an ecclesiastical hospital, with a cure of souls annexed:

Rolle's Abridgment, p. 811;

Phillimore's Ecclesiastical Law, p. 1982.

It was founded by a Bishop of Bath and Wells in the reign of Henry II. Clause 22 of the scheme provides that there shall be daily service in the chapel according to the ritual of the Church of England; and clause 37 provides that the trustees are to keep the chapel in repair out of the income of the charity. The trustees of the charity ought, therefore, to be exclusively members of the Church of England, as provided by clause 1 of the scheme:

Shore v. Wilson (Lady Hewley's case) 9 Cl. & Fin. 355;

Scarborough Charity Petitions, 1 Jur. 36.

The fact that this charity is partly eleemosynary, does not make it the less an ecclesiastical charity. They also referred to

Attorney-General v. Pearson, 3 Mer. 353; s. c. (at another stage) 7 Sim. 290;

Davey, Q.C. for certain inhabitants of the city of Bath, having liberty to attend.—With the exception of the right of presenting the master (which, by clause 18 of the scheme, is vested in the municipal trustees of the city of Bath, some of whom are Nonconformists), and the duty of repairing the chapel, the charity is purely eleemosynary. By clause 25 of the scheme, the objects of the charity need not be members of the Church of England, and they need not attend the chapel services (clause 28). There is, therefore, no reason why the trustees of the charity property should be exclusively members of the Church of England: Attorney-General v. Calvert (23 Beav. 248). That case shows the distinction between religious and eleemosynary charities. The cases cited on the other side, of Attorney-General v. Pearson, Shore v. Wilson, and Scarborough Charity Petitions, have no application to the present case, because they were, all of them, cases of purely religious charities. A charity is none the less eleemosynary because it has a chapel annexed in which service is to be performed at the expense of the charity funds. He also referred to Attorney-General v. Clifton, 32 Beav. 400; 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, s. 65.

Bristowe, Q.C. and Jolliffe, for W. T. Blair and others, the surviving trustees of the right of presentation to the mastership of the hospital under the order of 12th Nov. 1853.—The evidence shows that those of the trustees who are members of the Church of England do not wish to exclude their Nonconformist co-trustees from the management of the charity property. It will be very inconvenient to have two sets of trustees, one to appoint the master, and the other to manage the charity property. Where, as here, the charity is mainly eleemosynary, and not ecclesiastical, the court will appoint trustees without regard to their religious opinions: (Baker v. Lee, 8 H. L. 495, 513.) The almspeople, the objects of the charity, need not be members of the Church of England; and, therefore, there can be no good reason why they should be appointed solely by members of the Church of England. They also referred to 32 & 33 Vict. c. 56, s. 17.

Cotton, Q.C. in reply.—Under Sir John Trevor's scheme (clause 2) the master of the hospital, who must be a clergyman in priest's orders, had the power of nominating the almspeople; and the new trustees proposed by the scheme are now to perform that duty. The case of Attorney-General v. Calvert merely decides that the objects of the charity need not be exclusively members of the Church of England; it does not at all deal with the question who the trustees are to be. This is an ecclesiastical trust, with certain eleemosynary duties annexed to it, "and members of the Church of England are the best trustees for one trust, and equally good for both" (per Lord Wensleydale, Baker v. Lee, 8 H. L. 519).

THE VICE-CHANCELLOR [after stating the origin of the charity, and the award of Sir John Trevor, as set forth above, and reading clauses 25 and 28 of the Attorney-General's scheme, continued:] It is plain, therefore, from the scheme proposed by the Attorney-General, that Protestant dissenters, or even Roman Catholics (as far as I can see), are just as eligible to be objects of this charity as members of the Church of England. The objects of the charity need not attend the chapel in which the liturgy of the Church of England is to be read. I find that, according to the scheme, they may totally absent themselves from the services performed in the chapel, yet they would remain inmates of these almshouses. Clause 18 of the scheme is as follows: "The master of the hospital shall be a clergyman of the Church of England in priest's orders. The right of presentation of the master is vested in the trustees for the time being appointed in pursuance of the Act of Parliament 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, to exercise the power in that behalf formerly vested in the Corporation of the city of Bath." The proposal, as I read it, is that the right of presentation is to be in the trustees of the charity property of the city of Bath. That is a body which, as the evidence shows, at present consists of thirteen persons, ten of whom are members of the Church of England, and three are Nonconformists or Protestant dissenters. Now what are the duties that the trustees have to perform connected with any particular religious tenets? First, they are to select a master. He must be a clergyman of the

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. ST. JOHN'S HOSPITAL, BATH.

[CHAN. DIV.]

Church of England in priests' orders. He has, therefore, received the necessary qualification. There can be no miscarriage in that respect, because it is impossible for them to select any other person than a person who has the necessary qualification. The only other duty they have to perform, in any way connected with any particular religious tenets, is to keep the chapel in repair. Therefore they have one duty to perform, in which no dissenter can possibly miscarry, because he must select a member of the Church of England in priest's orders; and they have also to see that the chapel is kept in repair. Now, it appears that great abuses have been practised as regards the leasing of the charity property. The property is at present let on leases for lives, producing about 900*l.* a year. Under the new scheme these leases will not be renewable, as they have been (in practice) for the last century or two; and I am told that, when these leases expire, the charity property will ultimately produce about 10,000*l.* a year. Therefore, at some future time, it will be a very rich charity. Now the master is to have a stipend of 150*l.* a year; and the chapel is to be kept in repair. What are the objects of the charity beyond these two things? Purely eleemosynary. Now it is agreed on all hands that the property is to be under the control of trustees. The only question I have to consider is, who are these trustees to be? Clause 1 of the scheme provides that, "the trustees of the charity shall consist of such of the trustees for the time being appointed pursuant to the provisions of the Act of Parliament (5 & 6 Will. 4 c. 76), to be trustees of the municipal charities formerly vested in the Corporation of the city of Bath, as shall be members of the Church of England." So that the whole thing I have to consider is, whether those words, "as shall be members of the Church of England," shall be retained. Now the general principles applicable to cases of this kind are not in dispute. The principle established by Lord Eldon in Attorney-General v. Pearson, acted upon and settled in Shore v. Wilson (the great case with regard to Lady Hewley's Charities) is, that where there is a charity for the purposes of education in particular religious tenets, or where there is a charity the objects whereof must be persons holding particular religious tenets, it must be governed by trustees whose opinions are in conformity with those objects. If, therefore, a charity is founded, where the recipients must be members of the Church of England, or where no other tenets than those of the Church of England are to be inculcated, none but members of the Church of England will be permitted to be trustees of such a charity. In Lady Hewley's case it was decided that she was not a member of the Church of England, or a Unitarian. That at once excluded from the administration of the charity all members of the Church of England, and all Unitarians. That case decided that, as the charity was founded for the purpose of religious education, and the objects of the charity were to be persons who entertained the same opinions as the founder—that is to say, Protestant Nonconformists—no person could have any voice in the government of the charity who was not a Protestant Nonconformist. The real difficulty in the case was to decide of what religious body Lady Hewley was a member. If the Bishop of Bath and Wells, who in 1174 founded this charity, had founded it for purely religious objects, and had made it a condition that none but those who entertained the opinions of the Established Church—that is, the Established Church as it was in that day, reformed at the time of the Reformation, and now called the Church of England—should be recipients of the charity, it would have followed, as a matter of course, that the charity could only be governed by members of the Church of England. But he has not laid down any such rule. Beyond the objects to which I have already referred—namely, the appointment of the master, and the keeping the chapel in repair—this is a purely eleemosynary charity. The whole of the funds, after paying the master, and keeping the chapel in repair, are devoted to purely eleemosynary purposes, namely, to maintain poor brethren and sisters of the hospital. I think, therefore, that the cases, to which I have already adverted, of Attorney-General v. Pearson, and Shore v. Wilson (Lady Hewley's case), and also the case of the Scarborough Charity Petitions, are to be excluded from the consideration of this case, because this is a charity of a totally different character to what those were. The Scarborough Charity Petitions was a case in which the sole object of the trust was to keep the parish church in repair. That being the sole object, it appears to me to be perfectly right that none but members of the Church of England should be trustees. Rule 1 of Sir John Trevor's scheme provides that the objects of the charity must be "conformable to the established Government in Church and State." It might have been contended, on that rule alone, that none but members of the Church of England could be objects of the charity, because none others would come within the definition there given. But in this scheme it is deliberately proposed by the Attorney-General himself that the objects of the charity may be dissenters of any description whatsoever, provided they are persons of orderly lives, and in other respects qualified; and, as far as I can see, Roman Catholics may be objects of the charity. Baker v. Lee (the Ilminster School case) has been very much referred to. That was a charity where the object was to educate children in the tenets of the Church of England. Ultra that, there was a trust for repairing roads, so that it was a mixed object. Lord Romilly, the then Master of the Rolls, had decided that, as it was a mixed object, there was no necessity for the trustees being exclusively members of the Church of England. The case then went before the Lords Justices, who decided that as religious education in the school was the primary object of the charity, and the repairing of roads was entirely a subsidiary object, the primary object ought to govern, and therefore the trustees must be exclusively members of the Church of England. The case then went to the House of Lords; and, the four learned Lords being equally divided, the decision of the Lords Justices was affirmed. Lord Cranworth, in that case, lays down rules which, I think, are entirely applicable to this case. He there says: "Whenever the Court of Chancery is called on to appoint trustees of a charity, its duty obviously is to select those who are likely best to discharge the duties imposed on them by the trust; and where the trust is confined to the duty of selecting proper persons to teach or expound the doctrines of the Church of England, or to instruct children in any branches of learning of which the tenets and doctrines of the Church of England are necessarily to form part, and to apply funds for the promotion of that object, it can hardly be doubted that, in the exercise of a sound discretion, the court will take care that none but members of the Church of England shall be appointed trustees. They will, prima facie, be the persons best qualified to judge of the fitness of those who are to be called on to give the necessary instruction. At the same time I know of no law making such a selection imperative on the court; and I desire not to be taken to assent, without further argument, to the proposition stated at the bar, that in such a trust as I have suggested, where there has been no breach of trust, a trustee, otherwise unexceptionable, can be removed merely because he has ceased to be, or was not at the time of his appointment, a member of the Church of England. The principle which, in such a trust as I have referred to, would induce the court to appoint as trustees none but members of the Church of England, would in like manner guide it in the appointment of corresponding trusts, established for the benefit of any religious sect or denomination of dissenters from the Church of England. But where the trust embraces other objects"—this is the rule specially applicable to the present case—"besides those connected in the manner I have mentioned with the Church of England, or with any religious sect or class dissenting from the Church of England, then the principle on which the court proceeds in selecting as trustees none but members of the Church of England, or of the religious sect or denomination whose principle it is the object of the trust to enforce, is no longer applicable." [His Lordship referred to the case of Re St. John's Hospital (3 M. & G. 235), and to the appointment of the trustees of the municipal charities of the City of Bath to be trustees of the right of presentation to the mastership of the hospital, and continued]: I am bound to look to the objects of the charity to see how it is likely to be administered to the satisfaction of those for whose benefit it exists. It is a charity founded for the benefit of the inhabitants of the City of Bath, and its neighbourhood. The Ilminster School case must be taken as a decision that the qualification of trustees will depend upon what are the main objects of the charity. Here the principal and paramount object of the charity is merely eleemosynary. Bearing in mind that the principal object of the trust is to regulate who are to be the managers of it, I entirely agree with the decision of Lord Romilly in Attorney-General v. Calvert, and I intend to follow it. In that case the charity was altogether eleemosynary. There, as in the present case, the persons to be selected were not necessarily to be of any particular religious class. The Master of the Rolls there says: "In eleemosynary charities the religious opinions and tenets of the founder are wholly to be disregarded, and are to be treated as forming no indication of his intention on which this court can act. The presumption is that he included all, and the burden of proof lies on those who seek to exclude." In a later case of Attorney-General v. Clifton, he did not follow that decision, because he found (adhering to the general principle he there laid down), that, it being a Church of England charity, the trustees were necessarily persons holding particular religious tenets. Therefore, although he adhered to the rule which he had laid down in Attorney-General v. Calvert, it was inapplicable to the later case. Then what have I to decide? There are only two objects in this charity in any way connected with religious doctrines. First, the selection of a master, whose qualification is so defined that there can be no miscarriage. He must be a clergyman of the Church of England in priest's orders. That, therefore, does not, in my opinion, require that Protestant dissenters should be excluded from the governing body. The only other object is keeping the chapel in repair, and am I to come to the conclusion that a body of twelve or fifteen trustees, of whom a third or fourth (probably) are Protestant dissenters, will so disregard their duty as to allow the chapel to go into decay? Beyond these two objects, the trustees have the duty of distributing this charity, and beyond that there is no duty to be performed. Therefore the primary and paramount object of this charity is eleemosynary; and, it being so, I can see no reason whatever why Protestant dissenters, having the qualification which these trustees must have, should be excluded. I therefore come to the conclusion that there is no occasion whatever for introducing this restriction, which, I am satisfied, would be most unpalatable to the inhabitants of the district who are to have the benefits of the charity. I shall refer the scheme back to chambers, with the declaration that the trustees to be appointed by the scheme need not be exclusively members of the Church of England.

Re THE WEST HARTLEPOOL IRON COMPANY (LIMITED); Ex parte THE WEST HARTLEPOOL IMPROVEMENT COMMISSIONERS.

Company — Winding-up — Rate assessed before winding-up — Proof — The Companies Act 1862 (ss. 110, 144, 158) — The West Hartlepool Improvement Act (33 & 34 Vict. c. 113) 1870, ss. 368, 377, 380, 384, 386, 387.

On the 1st June 1875, the Improvement Commissioners for H. made a highway and improvement rate for their district for the six months ending the 31st Dec. 1875, and assessed the property in the occupation of a company at 375l. On the 8th July 1875, the company went into liquidation, and thereupon ceased to carry on business, and the liquidators of the company entered into possession of the property solely for the purposes of the winding-up. The commissioners having claimed payment in full of the rate from the liquidators, as the persons in the occupation of the property for the time being:

Held, that the liquidators were not bound to pay the rate in full, and that the commissioners must prove in the winding-up for such sum as they might be entitled to.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

On the 1st June 1875, the West Hartlepool Improvement Commissioners, pursuant to the West Hartlepool Extension and Improvement Act 1870, duly made an improvement and a highway rate for the period of the six months ending the 31st

CHAN. DIV.] Re WEST HARTLEPOOL IRON CO.; Ex parte IMPROVEMENT COMMISSIONERS. [CHAN. DIV.]

Dec. 1875. Under such rate the premises in the occupation of the West Hartlepool Iron Company were assessed at the sum of 375*l.* 2*s.* 11*d.*, and such assessment was duly served upon the company.

On the 8th July a resolution was passed for the voluntary winding-up of the company, and liquidators were appointed; but, inasmuch as an order was made on the 10th July for the compulsory winding-up of the company, which was in force until the 30th July, when an order was made for continuing the voluntary winding-up under supervision, the liquidators did not in any way interfere with or enter into possession of the works until after the 30th July.

The works of the company consisted of rolling mills and blast furnaces. At the rolling mills the company employed upwards of 1500 men. All these men were paid off on the 12th June 1875. At the blast furnaces the company employed about 300 men. The bulk of these men were paid off on the 5th June 1875, on which date the furnaces were damped down. After that time a sufficient number of men were kept on to blow out the furnaces. The blowing out of the furnaces commenced on the 7th July 1875, and was completed on the 24th July.

When the liquidators came into possession the works were completely idle, and no iron had been manufactured at the mills or produced at the blast furnaces since the 8th July 1875. The liquidators employed two watchmen on the works, and occasionally such labourers as had been required for the purpose of loading up iron, and old materials.

Nothing had been done by the liquidators at the works since they entered into possession, except to realise and despatch the iron and old material; and the machinery had been greased and turned once a fortnight, for the purpose of keeping it in order.

For the purpose of poor-rates, the rating had been reduced according to the principle adopted in the case of works lying idle. The liquidators refused to pay the rate in full, alleging that the commissioners ought to prove for the amount under the winding-up. On the other hand, the commissioners contended that the rate was a continuing liability, and that the liquidators, as the present occupiers of the works, were bound to pay the rate in full, and on the 3rd Dec. they took out a summons to enforce their claim. The summons was now adjourned into court.

It was admitted that such part of the rate as was payable for the period from the 1st to the 8th of July must be proved for in the winding-up.

Rigby, in support of the summons.—This rate accrues de die in diem. On the 8th of July a change of occupation occurred, and the liquidators as the persons in occupation of the premises from that date must, from the time of their taking possession, pay the rate in full. He referred to

H. Burton Buckley, for the liquidators.—This is a new point, but in principle is covered by authority. Although a winding-up order has been made the company still exists for all practical purposes until a dissolution order has been made. The company is still in possession by its officers, the liquidators, but simply for the purposes of the winding-up. There has, therefore, been no change of occupation, and the liquidators cannot be made responsible for a debt due from the company. Further, the rate is a debt due and demandable at the time it was made, and might have been levied by distress. It is, therefore, a debt provable in the winding-up. He referred to

(a) The material sections of the West Hartlepool Improvement Act 1870, were the following:

Sect. 368 empowered the commissioners to make, assess, and levy an improvement rate, such rate to be made, assessed, and levied "on the occupiers of all such kinds of property as by the laws in force for the time being are assessable to the rate for the relief of the poor, according to the rateable value of such property."

Sect. 377. If at the time of the making of any improvement or highway rate, any premises in respect of which the rate is made are unoccupied, such premises shall be included in the rate, but the rate shall not be charged on any person in respect of the same whilst they continued to be unoccupied, and if any such premises are afterwards occupied during any part of the period for which the rate was made and before the same has been fully paid, the name of the incoming tenant shall be inserted in the rate, and thereupon so much of the rate as at the commencement of his tenancy is in proportion to the remainder of the said period, shall be collected, recovered, and paid in the same manner in all respects as if the premises had been occupied at the time when the rate was made; and if any owner or occupier assessed or liable to any such rate, ceases to be owner or occupier of the premises in respect whereof which he is so assessed or liable before the end of the period for which the rate was made, and before the same is fully paid, he shall be liable to pay only such part of the rate as in proportion to the time during which he continues to be such owner or occupier, and in every such case, if any person afterwards becomes owner or occupier of the premises during part of the said period, he shall pay such part of the rate as is in proportion to the time during which he continues to be such owner or occupier, and the same shall be recovered from him in the same manner as if he had been originally assessed or liable.

Sect. 380. Every improvement, highway, or other rate made under the authority of this Act shall be fairly transcribed in a book and shall be sealed with the common seal of the commissioners; and no allowance, publication, or other formality whatever other than such as is expressly prescribed by this Act shall be requisite to the validity of any such rate.

Sect. 384. The commissioners may from time to time amend any rate by inserting therein the name of any person who ought to have been rated or who since the making thereof has become liable to be rated, or by striking out the name of any person who ought not to have been rated, or by increasing or reducing the sum at which any person is rated, or by making such other alterations therein as will make such rate conformable to this Act, and no such alteration shall be held to vitiate the rate or render it less operative; but any person shall have the same right to appeal from any such amendment as he would have had if the matter of amendment had appeared in the rate originally made, and with respect to him the amended rate shall be considered to have been made at the time when he received notice of the amendment; and in the case of any person, the amount of whose rate is increased by the amendment or whose name is newly inserted as aforesaid, the rate shall not be payable by him until seven days after notice of the amendment given to him.

Sect. 386. If any person fails to pay the amount due by him in respect of any rate, the commissioners may recover the amount with the costs by proceeding in any court of competent jurisdiction; or any justice may, on the application of the commissioners, summon each person to appear before him, or any other justice, at the time to be mentioned in the summons, to show cause why the rate due from him should not be paid, and in case sufficient cause for the non-payment of such rate is not

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—You say, Mr. Buckley, that this is a case of first impression. Winding-up cases have been very numerous, and claims for rates and taxes must have frequently occurred in them. I should like to know what has been the practice. I am a little struck by the observation that the liquidators should stay in the occupation of rateable property without paying the rates. There is a clause giving the commissioners a right to distrain for their rates. What the court has done with reference to the right of distress has been to exercise a sort of discretion upon it, always preserving the lawful right of a landlord to distrain. One cannot find it in the Act, or within the limits of common sense, that because the company is wound-up, therefore the liquidators can remain in occupation without payment of rates, perhaps without payment of rent. The question ought to be considered and settled. I wish that on both sides you would inquire a little about it, and let me know the result of your inquiries some other day.

March 30.—Buckley stated that they had been unable to find any authority on the point. He further contended that as the rate was a debt for which the commissioners could have distrained before the winding-up, and that as they had not then exercised that right, the court would not grant them leave to distrain after the winding-up order had been made: (Re Traders North Staffordshire Carrying Company, L. Rep. 19 Eq. 60). The summons for payment in full could not therefore succeed, and what amount the commissioners were entitled to would be decided when they came in to prove.

Rigby, contra.—The rate is not only made a debt recoverable by distress, but it is also made a charge on the property in the possession of the occupier. It is, therefore, a charge on the property of the company in the possession of the liquidators, and they, as the persons for the time being in the occupation of the property, must pay it in full. If they are relieved an additional charge will have to be made on their neighbours.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—Common sense and common honesty ought to help me to decide this question. I hope it will be taken elsewhere. It seems that the possession of the liquidators is merely possession and occupation, but not enjoyment, and that, I think, is not the occupation intended by the Act. All I can do is to dismiss this summons without costs, leaving it to the commissioners to carry in such proof in the winding-up as they may be entitled to.

shown, the same, with such costs as to the justice seems reasonable, may be levied by distress, and such justice may issue his judgment accordingly:

SECT. 387. When any rate is made for a particular period, and the owner or occupier rated ceases to be the owner or occupier of the property in respect whereof he is rated before the end of such period, he shall only be liable to pay the proportion of the rate for the time which he continued owner or occupier; and if any other person becomes the owner or occupier of the property during any part of such period, such person shall only be liable to pay the proportion of the rate for the time during which he holds or occupies the property, and the same may be recovered from him as if he had been originally rated.

PERCY (app.) v. ASHFORD UNION (resp.)

Poor rate—Market tolls—Occupation of soil.

The appellant was rated as the occupier of tolls, lands, and buildings situated in the Ashford cattle market; and among the gross receipts upon which the valuation was estimated, were items for the sheep, cattle, pigs, and horses admitted into the market during the year at a fixed sum per head.

In 1671 Charles II. granted by charter to Lord Strangford, his heirs and assigns, a market to be holden every alternate Tuesday within or near to the town of Ashford, together with the tolls and profits thereof. No evidence is to be found of the actual establishment of a market under this charter; but in 1784 a stockmarket was established, and for some time afterwards held upon every fourth Tuesday. From 1793 to 1856 a stock and cattle market was held on every alternate Tuesday in the main street of Ashford, the lord of the manor and the inhabitants receiving certain payments for the use of such pens as either of them supplied respectively, but no tolls appeared to have been levied upon animals sold at the market. After many meane assignments, in 1856 the appellant's lessors, incorporated as a limited company, obtained a conveyance in fee of a piece of land in the manor, and "all the tolls, stallages, dues, profits, or emoluments whatsoever arising from all markets and fairs held in the said town of Ashford," except the meat, fish, and vegetable market. In 1874 the appellant hired from the company, at a fixed annual rent, certain fixed tolls of the cattle market, the lands belonging thereto, and the fairs and other perquisites. The land occupied by the market is fenced in, and kept locked when not used for market or other purposes. Some pens in the market are appropriated to particular owners and salesmen, and others are free for any animals in the market. All animals, however, pay toll for admittance to the market.

Held, upon a case stated, that the tolls for admittance to the market were incident to the soil so as to be taken into consideration as increasing the value of the occupation, and were not mere market tolls which could not be rated.

THIS was a case stated for the opinion of the High Court of Justice under the provisions of the statute 12 & 13 Vic. c. 45, s. 11, by consent of the parties, and by order of Quain, J. after notice given of appeal to the court of quarter session for the Eastern division of the county of Kent against two several rates for the relief of the poor of the said parish, dated respectively the 10th March, and the 24th Aug. 1874, which were as far as is necessary for this case, as follows:—

Occupier, James Percy; owner, Cattle Market Company; description, tolls, land, and buildings; name or situation, Cattle Market; extent, $\frac{1}{2}$ a. 2r. 8p.; gross estimated rental, 440l.; net rateable value, 400l.

The rate of 24th Aug. 1874 was exactly the same except the word "tolls" in the description, which was left out.

1. The appellant is the lessee of the Ashford cattle market, and the respondents are the churchwardens and overseers of the parish of Ashford, and the assessment committee of the West Ashford Union in the county of Kent.

2. The valuation list on which the above rates are founded contains the same values as in the rates, and the question which arises in the case is whether the respondents have adopted the correct principle in calculating these values.

3. The appellant contends that the correct mode of ascertaining the values in the valuation list is by ascertaining the rent which a tenant from year to year might reasonably be expected to give upon the statutable terms, and that this rent in every year is to be calculated by reference to the last available statement of receipts and expenditure in the manner now well established and adopted in the case of railway, gas, and water works, and other undertakings of a similar description.

4. The following are the particulars of the receipts and expenditure of the year ending the 20th March 1875, which are sufficiently approximate to the receipts and expenditure of the previous year, and may in point of fact be used for the settlement of the list, if the appellant be right in his contention in point of law.

GROSS RECEIPTS FOR YEAR ENDING 25TH MARCH 1875.

1. 60,186 fat sheep, at 1s. 6d. per score	225	14	0
2. 51,765 store sheep, at 1s. per score	129	8	3
3. 6710 fat beasts, at 3d. each	83	17	6
4. 4106 store beasts and calves, at 2d. each	34	4	4
5. 135 bulls, 1s. each	6	15	0
6. Pigs in pens, carts, and waggons	26	7	6
7. Horses, asses, and mules	38	5	6
8. Monthly auction sales	41	3	9
9. Lairs, stables, &c.	42	6	0
10. Meadows, keep, lodging cattle, &c.	35	18	11
11. Circuses and other exhibitions	25	10	6
12. Machinery and casual goods	40	2	10
13. Manure	30	0	0
14. Sundries	14	15	11

5. It will be seen that the first seven of these items amount to 544l. 12s. 1d., and the last seven to 229l. 17s. 11d.; making together a total of 774l. 10s.

6. Against this total of receipts the expenditure for wages, rates, taxes, water, gas, and repairs was 193l. 12s. 4d., leaving a balance of 580l. 17s. 8d. to be divided between landlord and tenant, and since the tenant's capital required to work such a business would manifestly be very small, this result is sufficient in fact to support the valuation list.

7. But the appellant admitting that the last seven items would be correctly brought into the calculation, contends that, under the circumstances explained in the subsequent paragraphs of this case, the whole of the first seven items consist of tolls in gross which are not taken by reason of any occupation of lands or buildings, and that therefore they ought to be excluded from the estimate of rateable value upon the authority of the case Brg. v. Caswell (L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 328).

8. The following are the facts material to the determination of this contention:

9. Appended to this case was a copy marked A of the translation of an inquisition taken on the 4th Aug. (23 Car. II.) by virtue of a writ of ad quod damnum; and also a copy of a charter marked B dated 23rd Nov. in the same year, by which a market at Ashford was granted to Philip Viscount Strangford as by the said inquisition and charter more fully appeared.

10. In the year 1710, by indenture of lease and release bearing date the 28th and 29th July respectively, the manor of Ashford was conveyed to George Sayer together with all its appurtenances among which markets and fairs (but not tolls) are specially mentioned; and after several meane assignments the manor with its appurtenances was on the 21st Feb. 1803 conveyed to Thomas Dawes and William Whitfield in trust for George Elwick Jemmett, and included in the conveyance were all tolls or dues arising and to be collected at the market and fair to the said manor belonging and of right appendant.

11. George Elwick Jemmett died in 1831, and was succeeded in his estates by his son George Elwick Jemmett, jun., to whom in 1845 the representatives of Thomas Dawes, who was then dead, conveyed all their testator's title in the manor.

12. It is impossible in the present day to say whether any market was actually established by Philip Lord Strangford at or near the date of the original charter; but if any such market ever was established, it is clear that it must have fallen into disuse some years before the year 1784; but whether because the charter had become forfeited or had reverted to the Crown, or whether simply because there was no attendance of dealers, there is no evidence now obtainable to show.

13. On the 7th Jan. 1784 an advertisement appeared in the Kentish Gazette, a local paper having very considerable circulation in that part of the county as follows:

Ashford Monthly Stock Market,
The 4th Tuesday in every month.
For all sorts of fat and lean stock.

It having been for many years the general wish of the inhabitants of this part of the county that a stock market should be established at Ashford, a plan is now on foot for that purpose to commence on Tuesday the 27th Jan. next 1784, and to be continued on the fourth Tuesday in every month.

It is requested that all gentlemen, graziers, farmers, and others will give every encouragement to the undertaking by sending their stock to this market, there being proper pens provided at 6d. each, and careful drovers to forward such part of the stock as shall be unsold to Smithfield market for the following Monday. The market ends at half-past 12 o'clock.

By whose authority this advertisement was inserted, and whether the lord of the manor for the time being was a party to it, there is no evidence to show.

14. From and for sometime after the 27th Jan. 1784, a stock market was held at Ashford on the fourth Tuesday in every month. This day was afterwards altered to the first Tuesday in every month, and subsequently in June 1793, from the first Tuesday only to the first and third Tuesdays in every month. By whose authority these alterations were made, and whether the lord of the manor for the time being was a party to either of them, there is no evidence to show.

15. In modern times, as far back as living memory can go, and down to the year 1856, there has unquestionably been a stock and cattle market held on every alternate Tuesday throughout the year in the main street of the town of Ashford, in which pens were provided for sheep. In the year 1854 rails were put up on moveable posts to which beasts could be tied by halters. These pens and rails were provided by the lord of the manor in that part of the street where his own buildings,

Div. App.]

PERCY (app.) v. ASHFORD UNION (resps.).

[Div. App.]

the market and court house were situate, and in other parts of the street by the inhabitants who used to place such pens and rails, each one in front of his own house, and a toll of 9d. used to be paid for each lot of sheep penned, and 2d. for each beast tied up. These tolls were paid to the lord, if the pens or rails used were provided by him, otherwise to the particular inhabitant whose pens or rails were used.

16. Sometime before his death in 1831, but when precisely does not appear, George Elwick Jemmett, the then lord, caused to be printed and circulated a notice of certain tolls which would for the future be charged to persons frequenting the market. It does not, however, appear affirmatively that the tolls therein mentioned were actually levied, or that any further or different payments were made than those mentioned in the last paragraph, and nothing ever was paid for either horses or pigs.

17. In the year 1856, the market as held in the main street had become so great a nuisance that it was determined to remove it, and accordingly a company was incorporated on the 25th Sept. in that year under the provisions of the statute 19 & 20 Vict. c. 47, under the title of "The Ashford Cattle Market Company Limited," to whom George Elwick Jemmett, jun., the then lord of the manor, granted a lease of a piece of land within the manor for a term of ninety-nine years, together with "all the tolls and stallages, dues, profits, and emoluments whatsoever arising from all markets and fairs held in the said town of Ashford, now or hereafter payable to the said George Elwick Jemmett, his heirs and assigns, as lord or lords of the manor of Ashford, and which he and they can lawfully claim or demand, with their rights, members, and appurtenances, save and except the tolls which may arise from any such meat, fish, vegetable, or fruit market, which is now or may hereafter be established in the said town of Ashford."

18. There was also contained in this lease a provision for the subsequent purchase of the land by the said company, which purchase was carried out, and the land in fee, together with the tolls, &c., as described in the last paragraph, was conveyed to the company on the 13th Oct. 1868.

19. By an agreement dated 19th March 1874, the said directors agreed to let, and the appellant agreed to hire, for a term of three years from the 20th March 1874, at a rent of 571*l.* per annum, "All those the tolls, profits, and emoluments arising and to be received in and by reason of the cattle market established within the said town of Ashford, and set forth in the schedule at the foot of these presents, together with all the buildings and grazing lands belonging thereto and now used therewith. . . . And also the right of holding the fairs and other exhibitions heretofore held in such market, and the perquisites arising therefrom."

20. The land, the subject of the lease and conveyance mentioned in paragraphs 17 and 18, and of the lease mentioned in the last paragraph, was and is the land mentioned in the rate. The whole of it has been fenced in and is entered by one entrance only, which the company or their lessee keep locked whenever no market, or fair, or other exhibition is being held. The area within the fence is provided with pens for cattle and sheep, many of which pens are marked with the names of particular salesmen who attend the market, and each of whom, when instructed by any owner of cattle to sell for them, has the cattle or sheep to be sold driven into one of the pens so marked with his own name. There are other pens and rails marked "private," and these are reserved for owners of stock who manage their own sales without the intervention of salesmen.

21. At the entrance of the market tolls are taken upon all stock that is driven inside the gates, whether penned or tied up, or not, and whether sold or not; and these are the tolls mentioned above in paragraph 4, as included in the gross receipts; and when these payments are once made, the animals can be tied up or penned, and so kept during market hours without further payment. These payments, however, only entitle the owner to keep the stock in the market during the market hours. If the owner allows the stock to remain beyond the time for closing the market, the animals are then put into lairs, for the use of which extra charge is made. Sometimes animals are taken into a portion of the market known as the new buildings, and in this case also an extra charge is made. The items Nos. 9 and 10 respectively of the gross receipts in paragraph 4 are the receipts in the year ending 20th March 1875, in respect of such extra charges.

22. Upon these facts the appellant contends that the market originally granted to Philip, Viscount Strangford, continues to the present day, and is now vested in the Cattle Market Company; and that all such tolls as are paid and payable in respect of animals on their entrance into the market are levied only as the tolls in gross which the original grantee might have levied by virtue of the charter of 23 Charles II.; and that it makes no difference in this respect that the owner or salesman is afterwards allowed to have them penned or tied up without further payment.

23. The respondents contend—first, that the rent reserved of £571 is of itself sufficient to show that the gross estimated rental and net rateable values are not over estimated; secondly, that the charter to Lord Strangford was a grant of a market to him personally and not as lord of the manor, and that consequently the market never was appurtenant to the manor, and so never passed to the George Elwick Jemmett estate; thirdly, even if it did, they contend that from the long period during which the market fell into disuse prior to 1784 (the precise length of which is, however, quite unknown), the presumption arises that the charter had reverted to the Crown by forfeiture or otherwise; fourthly, they contend that the circumstances under which the market is now held differ so widely from the terms of the grant in the particulars hereinbefore mentioned, that it is impossible that the present market should be held in law to be a continuation of the old one; lastly, they contend that since the toll now paid at the entrance to the market gives the payer the right to have the animals tied up or penned without further payment, the tolls so paid cannot be said to be mere market tolls not incident to the soil.

24. The questions for the opinion of the court are—first, is the reserved rent conclusive evidence that the rateable values are not over estimated; secondly, whether or not the tolls mentioned in the first seven items of paragraph 4 are or are not incident to the soil, so as to be taken into consideration as increasing the value of the occupation. If either of these questions be answered in the affirmative, the rate is to be confirmed. If both in the negative, the rate is to be amended by inserting the sum of 150*l.* as the gross estimated rental, and 115*l.* as the net rateable value. The court is to have power to draw inferences of fact, and to give any direction as to the costs incident to preparing this case, and in this court, as the court may deem proper.

The charter marked B. in the appendix to the case, and referred to in paragraph 9, recited the inquisition marked A. and proceeded, "Now know ye that we for divers good causes and considerations as thereunto specially moving of our especial grace and of our certain knowledge and mere motion have given and granted and by these presents for us our heirs and successors do give and grant unto the said Philip Viscount Strangford, his heirs and assigns, that the same Philip, his heirs and assigns, shall have and hold and shall be entitled and empowered to have and hold a market upon every second Tuesday in the year, that is to say upon every Tuesday in every alternate week within or near to the town of Ashford, in our said county of Kent, for ever to be held for the buying and selling of all and all manner of cattle and sheep, goods and merchandises whatsoever. And further that he, the said Philip Viscount Strangford, his heirs and assigns, shall have hold and receive and to his own proper use shall be entitled and empowered to have hold and receive and enjoy all and singular the tolls, profits, advantages, and emoluments whatsoever to the same market in any manner belonging, or thereout arising, coming, or proceeding, or in or with the same usually held or enjoyed, to have hold and enjoy the said market tolls and profits and other the premises to the said Philip Viscount Strangford, his heirs and assigns, to the only proper use and behoof of the same, Philip, his heirs and assigns, for ever without any account or any other thing therefrom to us our heirs or successors rendering, paying, or making, we, willing and by these presents for us our heirs and successors firmly enjoining and commanding that the said Philip Viscount Strangford, his heirs and assigns by virtue and force of these presents well freely, lawfully, and quietly shall have hold and enjoy and shall be entitled and empowered to have hold and enjoy within or near to the town of Ashford aforesaid, twenty-six markets in every year for ever, that is to say upon every Tuesday in every alternate week together with the tolls and profits thereto belong, and therefrom from time to time arising or proceeding, according to the tenor and true intent of these our letters patent without any molestation, interruption, disturbance, or contradiction of us our heirs or successors, or of any of the sheriffs, escheators, bailiffs, officers, or ministers of us our heirs and successors or any other persons whomsoever, and this without any warrant, writ, or process from us our heirs and successors in that behalf, procuring or obtaining, notwithstanding non recital or bad or untrue recital of the said inquisition or of any writ of ad quod damnum for or concerning the premises in that behalf, issuing, and notwithstanding any other default, imperfection, or inconsistency in these presents contained, or any Law, Statute, Act, ordinance, provision, proclamation, or restriction, or any other thing cause, or matter whatsoever to the contrary thereof in any manner notwithstanding so far as express, mention, &c." This inquisition was witnessed in the name of the King by writ of Privy Seal on the 23rd Nov. 1671.

Manisty, Q.C. (with him Biron) argued for the appellant.—The first question cannot be supported by the respondents. [F. M. White, for respondents, admitted this.] The second question is whether these seven items come within the application of Reg. v. Casswell (L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 328) which decided that tolls authorised to be taken by an Act of Parliament in respect of cattle brought into a market for sale, which become due as soon as the cattle are brought into the market place and before the cattle are put into a pen or tied up, are mere market tolls, and not in the nature of stallage or tolls taken in respect of the use of the soil; and in assessing the lessee of the market and tolls to the poor rate in respect of his occupation of the market place, such tolls cannot be taken into account as enhancing the value of the occupation. Cockburn, C.J. distinguished in his judgment between market tolls and stallage, and said p. 331, "But we must abide by the distinction founded on this principle of ancient law, and take it as established that tolls payable merely as market tolls for the use of the market are not rateable, whereas the toll paid for the use of a stall which occupies the soil is rateable. The present toll is payable not for the use of any shed or other thing erected or maintained upon the soil, but independently of anything in the shape of stalls or sheds, simply for admission to the market place; and it is, therefore a market toll, and comes within the distinction, and is not rateable." The validity of the tolls in the present case is not questioned. [FIELD, J.—But you must show that a franchise exists.] It is found as a fact that a market was granted by Charles II.; and its existence is proved at various periods since. The market could not have existed as proved without grant, and this is the only grant to be found. A charter is not lost by disuse, at all events not by precarious user for an uncertain interval of time.

F. M. White (with him Kingsford) for the respondents.—These are not tolls in the sense of the Wolverhampton Market tolls, authorised by Act of Parliament, as treated of in Reg. v. Casswell. These are mere payments for the user of the land occupied by the appellant. They are not traced in any way to the charter granted by Charles II., and cannot be attributed to any authorised levy of market tolls. Where no tolls are fixed by the charter under which a market is held, the grantee can only recover such tolls as have been uniformly collected; (see Gunning on Tolls, p. 57, citing 2 Inst. 222; and Duke of Bedford v. Emmett, 3 B. & Ald. 366). There is nothing here to show that these tolls have been uniform since the charter; on the contrary, they do not appear to have been levied at all for a long period. [Stopped by the court.]

Manisty, Q.C. in reply.

CLEASBY, B.—We think that the rate is right. It is necessary to show that the tolls are payable for entering the market, and not for the use of the soil of the market. It is contended for the appellant that all such tolls are paid and payable in respect of animals on their entrance into the market are levied only as the tolls in gross which the original grantee might have levied by virtue of the charter of the 23rd Charles II. and that it makes no difference in this respect that the owner or salesman is afterwards allowed to have them penned or tied up without further payments. Now, that is out of the question, because there could not be, by virtue of the charter of Charles II., tolls of the description now levied in this market. Therefore there is an end at once of any claim to the tolls as tolls leviable under that charter. But it appears to me that the case wholly fails to show any right having existed by virtue of this franchise to take tolls for cattle upon their entering the market (not tolls for the use of the market, which is another affair altogether). Now, if there had been anything like a user shown after the granting of this charter, we might have assumed that such tolls had been payable. I am quite aware of the difficulty there is in proving what took place so long ago as the reign of Charles II., but here is a total failure of any evidence whatever to show that within a hundred years of the granting of this charter tolls of this description were taken under it. Now, when we refer to the charter itself, and to the writ which preceded it, it appears the tolls there mentioned have reference to the tolls usually taken in the like market. We have no evidence whatever as to what these tolls were that were usually taken in these markets. We have no evidence whatever as to whether they were payable by the buyer or the seller. And when you find that the market is to be not only for cattle and sheep, but for goods and merchandise, you would think it more probable that the toll that had been taken was taken upon the sale of things of this description than upon their entry into the market. This is not a charter in which the nature of the toll is specified, and which may therefore be construed as a charter with a right to take reasonable toll; the tolls are limited to the tolls in or with the same market usually held or enjoyed. There is nothing to show, in point of fact, that tolls ever were taken by the lord of the manor under his grant, or that such tolls were ever sought to be taken until we get the notice of some date before 1831. There is nothing, therefore, to show that the tolls in question are not incident to the soil, and ought not to be taken into consideration as increasing the value of the occupation.

GROVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. Upon looking at the question which is left to us to decide, it appears that the point really contended for on behalf of the appellant is this: that there is an ancient charter granting a market and granting tolls, and that the tolls now sought to be rated are the tolls which were granted to the lord of the manor under that charter, and that, although that charter has not been regularly acted upon, yet there is nothing to show that it has been forfeited, and that, therefore, these tolls are franchises or market tolls, and that they are incorporeal hereditaments, and cannot be rated. And so far I confess I was rather taken by the argument of Mr. Manisty, that although invariability of user may be necessary in prescription, yet where there is a grant a certain amount of variability of user may be taken to show that the grant has been acted upon. But then Mr. Manisty did not touch upon another point upon which Mr. White has founded his argument. Mr. White takes a point which seems to me to override the question of grant. He says that the grant is not a grant giving tolls at all but only giving tolls for tying up and penning the beasts and sheep. It is, he says, a grant which could give no right to take tolls beyond such tolls as were usually held and enjoyed with the market, whether you take the words of the charter or of the inquisition which preceded it, where this view is very strongly put; "the tolls and profits used in the like market." Therefore, either there were no tolls, and it was merely a grant giving leave to take reasonable tolls, or if there were any, it was granting only such as were used. Now there is nothing to show that the tolls now sought to be rated were the tolls so granted. If one were to draw an inference one would rather infer they were not. I think there is very strong evidence on the face of the case that if ever tolls had been paid they were not only very different in amount but very different in character. Even assuming that the charter is existent, and that it would give the right to take tolls, I think there is a total want of proof that these tolls are such tolls as were granted by the charter.

FIELD, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the appellant has failed to show that the tolls mentioned in the first seven items of paragraph 4 of the case are not incidental to the soil, so as not to be taken into consideration as increasing the value of the occupation. Now the facts are that the appellant is occupier of this land, and that the appellant being occupier of the land does levy from year to year upon an average a certain sum in respect of what are called tolls for the use of the land or the entry of the stock which the farmers are anxious to bring there. And he makes of that money so levied an account of which we have fourteen various items respectively specifying under different headings in paragraph 4 the way in which that sum is made up. With regard to the last seven of these items, it is admitted that they are incidental to the occupation of the soil and therefore rateable. With regard to the first seven items Mr. Manisty asserts that they are due to a franchise or incorporeal hereditament, and so not rateable. But I take it that it is for him to make out that they are due to a franchise. But under these circumstances it is established that they are an incorporeal hereditament, whichever way the onus may be? First of all what is there to show that these payments are to be referred to a franchise? As pointed out by my learned brothers the sums which the appellant says ought to be so regarded are in no wise shown to be sums leviable under the charter of Charles II. at all. There is no such toll as that now claimed that can be shown ever to have been received under the charter. And I go further than that, because it seems to me that there is no evidence to show that there is any right in any individual body or company to claim the tolls under the charter. We have nothing produced before us to show such right except the inquisition and the charter. From that moment the case is a dead blank until we get to the year 1784. There is no proof that any market was held under the charter or that any tolls were received under it. It is certain that for some period before 1784 the market, if it ever had been established, had become entirely disused; so much so that persons living in Ashford and its neighbourhood who were wanting a market did take steps and establish a market. Now from 1784 down to 1856 we have got the incidents of that market very clearly defined. It was held in the streets of Ashford, and so far from being a market vested in the lord, the inhabitants of the streets provided rails and received tolls for the beasts, and the lord only received toll where he himself found the rails. The days were altogether different from those specified in the charter, and it is not shown that the lord had any part in naming the days or in altering them. In 1856 a company was incorporated and the market was removed to another and more convenient spot. The appellant in 1874 became the lessee of this ground. Under these circumstances I draw the conclusion that these present tolls as now received, or what are called tolls by the charter, are not leviable under the franchise, and therefore I take it they must be incidental to the soil.

REG. v. JAMES BERRY.

[C. CAS. R.]

REG. v. JAMES BERRY.

Practice—Prisoner mute by visitation of God—Incapable of understanding the proceedings—Discharge of jury—Detainer of prisoner under 39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 94, s. 2.

After a prisoner had been found by a jury "mute by the visitation of God," a plea of not guilty was ordered to be entered for him, and the trial proceeded. A relative of the prisoner, who deposed that he could in some degree communicate with him by signs, was sworn as interpreter. In his summing up the judge left it to the jury to say whether the prisoner was guilty or not guilty on the indictment; and, secondly, whether the prisoner was capable of understanding, and had understood the nature of the proceedings. The jury found the prisoner guilty on the evidence, but that he was not capable of understanding, and as a fact, had not understood the nature of the proceedings:

Held, that the conviction could not be sustained, and this court ordered the prisoner to be detained under the 39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 94, s. 2, during Her Majesty's pleasure.

If at any stage of the trial it is found that the prisoner has not sufficient intellect to understand the nature of the proceedings the jury should be discharged, and the prisoner detained under 39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 94, s. 2.

CASE stated by the Chairman of the Worcester-shire Quarter Sessions.

At the Worcestershire adjourned Quarter Sessions, held on the 23rd Feb. 1876, the above named prisoner, James Berry, was arraigned before me for stealing a watch and certain other articles from the person of one Benjamin Smith.

On being called upon to plead to the indictment in the usual manner the prisoner made no reply, and gave no sign of consciousness that he heard or understood the question put to him.

The counsel for the prosecution asked that I should order a plea of not guilty to be entered, and should proceed to try the prisoner. I did not consider that I had any power to adopt this course, and I ordered, on the authority of Re v. Thomas Jones, and Re v. Elizabeth Steel, both reported in the first volume of Leach's Crown Law, that the jury who had been impanelled to try the case should be sworn to try whether the prisoner stood mute of malice, or by the visitation of God.

After hearing the evidence of one Robert Knight, who is the brother-in-law of the prisoner, and had known him well from infancy, and who deposed that the prisoner had been deaf and dumb since the age of four years, the jury returned a verdict "mute by the visitation of God."

I then ordered that the plea of not guilty should be entered, and that the trial should proceed.

As the said Robert Knight had deposed that he could in some degree communicate with the prisoner by means of signs, I ordered that Robert Knight should be sworn as interpreter in order to convey to the prisoner as far as possible the nature of the proceedings and the evidence against him.

Observing the opinion expressed by Mr. Justice Gould in Re v. Elizabeth Steel, "that great diligence and circumspection ought to be exercised in so critical a case," and that "it becomes the duty of the court to inquire touching all those points of which the prisoner might take advantage himself, to examine all the proceedings against her with a critical eye and to render her every possible service consistent with the rules of law," and conceiving that my duty in this respect would be best performed by giving the prisoner the assistance of counsel, I accordingly assigned him counsel at the expense of the court.

After summing up the evidence for the prosecution, which was very clear, I put two questions to the jury,

First, whether they found the prisoner guilty or not guilty on the indictment.

Secondly, whether in their opinion the prisoner was capable of understanding, and had understood, the nature of the proceedings.

The verdict of the jury was,

"We find the prisoner guilty on the evidence; and we also find that he is not capable of understanding, and, as a fact, has not understood the nature of the proceedings."

On this verdict, looking to the language used by the judges as reported in Steel's case, and the doubt expressed by Lord Hale, I thought it right to postpone judgment till a case had been submitted to this court.

I offered to take bail for the appearance of the prisoner, but it was not forthcoming and he has been since the trial, and is now, in Worcester prison.

I respectfully request the opinion of this court First, whether under the circumstances stated above the prisoner was properly convicted of felony.

Secondly, if so, whether the Court of Quarter Sessions ought to have passed sentence on the prisoner, or whether it should have ordered him to be detained until Her Majesty's pleasure had been known, or what other, if any, course it ought to have followed.

GEORGE WOODYATT HASTINGS,
Chairman of the above Court of Quarter Sessions.

Streeten, for the prisoner, was stopped by the court.

Jelf, for the prosecution.—The conviction was right. The case of Reg. v. Steel is conclusive. In that case the facts were these: the prisoner refused to plead, and the jury were sworn to inquire whether she stood mute by malice or by the visitation of God. The jury returned a verdict, "Mute by the visitation of God;" and it was referred to the consideration of the judges "whether, under these circumstances, she could be tried upon the indictment." The judges were of opinion "That a verdict finding the prisoner to be mute by the visitation of God was not an absolute bar to her being tried upon the indictment; for, although a person surdus et mutus a nativitate is in contemplation of law incapable of guilt, upon a presumption of idiotism, yet that presumption may be repelled by evidence of that capacity to understand by signs and tokens, which it is known that persons thus afflicted frequently possess to a very great extent. Great diligence and circumspection, however, ought to be exercised in so critical a case; but if all means to convey intelligence to the mind of such a prisoner respecting the nature of his arraignment should prove ineffectual, the clerk of the arraigns may enter the plea of not guilty; and then it is incumbent on the court to inquire touching all those points of which the prisoner might take advantage himself; to examine all the proceedings against him with a critical eye, and to render him every possible service consistent with the rules of law." [LUSH, J.—In this case the jury have found that the prisoner was incapable of understanding, and as a fact had not understood the nature of the proceedings. In 1 Hale's P.C. cap. 4, there is this passage, "If a man in his sound memory commits a capital offence, and before his arraignment he becomes absolutely mad, he ought not by law to be arraigned during such his phrenzy, but he remitted to prison until that incapacity be removed. The reason is because he cannot advisedly plead to the indictment; and this holds as well in cases of treason as felony, even though the delinquent in his sound mind were examined and confessed to the offence before his arraignment. . . . If a person of non-sane memory commit homicide during such his insanity, and continue so till the time of his arraignment, such person shall neither be arraigned nor tried, but remitted to gaol, there to remain in expectation of the king's grace to pardon him."] In this case the prisoner had counsel assigned to him, and there was no necessity to interpret the proceedings to him.

KELLY, C.B.—It appears to me, both upon authority and principle, that the conviction ought to be quashed. The case of Reg. v. Pritchard (7 Car. & P. 303) is an authority in point, and has never been overruled. There a person deaf and dumb was to be tried for a capital felony, and the judge ordered a jury to be impanelled to try whether he was mute by the visitation of God. The jury found that he was so; they were then sworn to try whether he was able to plead, which they found in the affirmative, and the prisoner by a sign pleaded "Not guilty." The jury was then sworn to try whether the prisoner was then sane or not, and on that question the judge (Alderson, B.) directed the jury to consider whether the prisoner had sufficient intellect to comprehend the course of the proceedings so as to make a proper defence, to challenge any jurors he might wish to object to, and to comprehend the evidence; and if they thought he had not they should find him not of sane mind. The jury found him not of sane mind, and the prisoner was ordered to be detained under the 39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 94, s. 2, until his Majesty's pleasure should be known. There is another case of Rea v. Dyson (7 Car. & P. 305) where Parke, J. cited the passage from Hale, P.C., Book 4, and told the jury that if they were satisfied that the prisoner had not then from the defect of her faculties intelligence enough to understand the nature of the proceedings against her, they ought to find her not sane; and the jury, having found her not sane, the judge ordered her to be detained under the 39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 94, s. 2, during Her Majesty's pleasure. That occurred a year after, and affirmed the doctrine laid down in Rea v. Pritchard. Here the jury have found that the prisoner was incapable of understanding the proceedings, and as a fact had not understood them. There were no means of making the prisoner acquainted with a single word that had been spoken or any act that had been done. And where that clearly appears in the course of the trial it is the duty of the judge to discharge the jury or to direct an acquittal. I am therefore of opinion that the conviction should be quashed, and that the prisoner should be detained, under the 39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 94, s. 2, until Her Majesty's pleasure is known.

LUSH, J.—I also think that the conviction should be quashed. If at any time during the trial it is found that the prisoner is of unsound mind and incapable of understanding the proceedings, the trial ought to be stopped. Understanding the finding of the jury in that sense in this case, I think the conviction cannot be sustained. The judge who tried this case reports that he left the question to the jury whether the prisoner stood mute by the visitation of God, and the jury found in the affirmative; and he then directed a plea of not guilty to be entered for the prisoner, and directed the trial to proceed; and on the intimation of the prisoner's brother-in-law that he could in some degree communicate with the prisoner by means of signs, the brother-in-law was sworn as interpreter and the trial proceeded. The judge summed up the case and asked the jury whether they found the prisoner guilty or not guilty on the indictment, and whether in their opinion the prisoner was capable of understanding and had understood the nature of the proceedings. The jury found the prisoner guilty on the evidence, but they also found that the prisoner was not capable of understanding, and as a fact had not understood, the nature of the proceedings. On the finding that the prisoner had not sufficient intellect to understand the nature of the proceedings I am of opinion that it was the duty of the judge to discharge the jury, and to order the prisoner to be detained, under the 39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 94, s. 2, during Her Majesty's pleasure.

The other Judges were of the same opinion.

Conviction quashed.

make an order directing the town clerk to produce and show for inspection the rejected ballot papers, the marked counterfoils of the ballot papers, and the counted ballot papers relating to the election, when required under summons or subpoena, as evidence in proof of an offence created by the Ballot Act.*CASE stated for the opinion of this court by Blackburn, J., at the Manchester Spring Assizes
1876.The prisoner was tried before me at Manchester on an indictment charging him in thirty-seven counts with having at a municipal election frau-dulently placed seventeen different papers purporting to be, but to his knowledge not being, ballot papers in the ballot box.Evidence was given that on the 1st Nov. 1875, there was an election for three councillors for the ward of Heaton Norris, in the borough of Stock-port, and that there were six candidates; three of the blue party, and three of the red party.The prisoner was appointed presiding officer at one of the booths, and acted as such, and had the custody of the ballot papers and box. A return from him showing that he had used 402 ballot papers was proved. At the close of the day he delivered over the ballot box and a sealed packet containing the marked copy of the register of voters and the counterfoils of the ballot papers.
After the votes were counted, the ballot papers were put in a packet and sealed.An order of the County Court of Cheshire, holden at Stockport was then proved. A copy of of it accompanies this case and forms part of it.

A sealed packet was produced before me, and evidence was given that in obedience to that order the original seals had been broken, and the counterfoils and marked register, and the back of the ballot papers, had been inspected, and had been again inspected by the magistrates before whom the charge was investigated, and before the grand jury. On each occasion the packets were sealed up again.

[C. CAS. B.]

It was then proposed to open the packet for the purpose of giving the contents in evidence before me.

The counsel for the prisoner objected to this, relying on rules 40, 41, and 64 in the first schedule to the 35 & 36 Vict. c. 36, as enacting that these documents should not be examined, except on a contested election, and by order of an election tribunal; and that the County Court was not acting as an election tribunal when making this order.

I doubted whether this objection was not well founded; but the mischief, if any, having been already done, I resolved to receive the evidence reserving the point. I requested the counsel for the prosecution to begin with any one case, and the counsel for the defence to raise their objections on it, after which the other cases could be dealt with subject to the rulings on the first. This was acceded to.

The counterfoil numbered 105 was then examined, and appeared on it to have in pencil the number 116. On reference to the register, 116 was found to be the number of James Bancroft, 95, Great Egerton-street, Heaton Norris.

It was then proved that James Bancroft died in September 1875, before this election, and that the deceased was the person on the register.

The voting paper bearing the number 105 printed on it, and marked with the official mark on each side, was then produced out of the heap. It was folded up, and the counsel for the prosecution requested that it might be opened so as to ascertain for what candidates the votes on this paper were given. To this the counsel for the prisoner objected, relying on the latter part of rule 41.

I thought that it being proved to my satisfaction that the voter 116 on the registry did not vote at all, and that the voting paper was a fabrication, the paper might be opened.

It was so, and it proved that the three votes were given for the three blue candidates. The prosecution then in similar manner proved that fifteen of the other papers were in respect of counterfoils, on three of which were the number in the registry 334, on two the number 102, and on ten different other numbers.

No one of the twelve persons registered voted at this booth, and the votes purporting to be given on these papers were in each case for the three blue candidates.

The marked register had the names of all these persons scored through as if each of the voters (or some one believed to be the man), had applied for and obtained the paper.

The prosecution were unable to prove that the person entitled to vote by the 17th paper in the indictment did not vote, so sixteen cases only were proved.

Evidence was then given by the red personating agent who produced his copy of the register on which he had marked the names as they were called over.

He had marked in all 382, instead of, as the prisoner's return showed, 402, and no one of the names of the fourteen names of the voters whose numbers were on the seventeen counterfoils, was on his list struck through; and no one had in his presence asked in the name of anyone of them for a voting paper.

He was absent for a few minutes once or twice, and it was admitted that the three persons who,

in addition to the seventeen, made the twenty whose names were marked on the defendant's register, and not on his, had in fact voted; but it was very improbable that as many as sixteen votes could have escaped his notice.

The blue personating agent was not called on either side.

Some evidence was given that the prisoner was a blue.

On this evidence the jury found that the prisoner had guilty knowledge that the papers were not asked for by the voters, and that he fraudulently issued them with the intent that they should be placed in the ballot-box as they were.

On this I entered the verdict of guilty on thirty-two of the thirty-five counts, but respited sentence and admitted the prisoner to bail.

The verdict was in my opinion right on the evidence admitted. But if the counterfoils had not been inspected there would not have been any evidence against the prisoner. And if the ballot papers had not been opened so as to show that all the false votes were on one side, the evidence would not have been so strong and the verdict might have been different.

The questions for the court are: First, Was it wrong, under the circumstances, to allow the counterfoils and marked register to be given in evidence? Secondly, Was it wrong, under the circumstances, to allow the face of the voting papers to be inspected, so as to show how the votes purported to be given? Thirdly, Ought the conviction to be quashed on both or either ground? COLIN BLACKBURN.

Ambrose, Q.C. for the prisoner.—The indictment was framed upon sect. 3 of the Ballot Act (35 & 36 Vict. c. 33), which makes it a misdemeanor if any person shall (inter alia) fraudulently put into any ballot box any paper other than the ballot paper which he is authorised by law to put in. The object of the Ballot Act was to insure secrecy, and by rule 39, in the first schedule to the Ballot Act, the returning officer is required, as soon as practicable after the close of the poll, among other things, to seal up in a packet the counterfoils of the ballot papers, and by rule 37, upon the completion of the counting of the votes, to seal up in separate packets the counted and rejected ballot papers; and by rule 38 he is to forward the sealed packets, in the case of a municipal election, to the town clerk of the borough. Then by rules 41 and 68 "No person shall, except by order of the House of Commons or any tribunal having cognizance of petitions complaining of undue returns or undue elections, or in the case of a municipal election of an order of a county court, open the sealed packet of counterfoils after the same has been once sealed up, or be allowed to inspect any counter ballot papers in the custody of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery." Under the above rules the sealed packets can only be opened and inspected in the case of inquiries respecting undue returns or undue elections. And the County Court Judge had no jurisdiction to make the order, a copy of which is set out in the case on an intended prosecution for an offence under sect. 3. Rule 41 expressly prohibits the opening thereof except by order of the House of Commons or any tribunal having cognizance of petitions complaining of undue returns or undue elections. [LUSH, J.—If the argument is correct, Parliament has created an offence, and at the same time has taken care to prevent the possibility of proving it. The offence, from its very nature, could only be proved by an examination of the sealed packets. KELLY, C.B.—Could not the House of Commons in the case of a Parliamentary election order the sealed packets to be opened for the purposes of a prosecution? The whole object of the Act is to secure secrecy, and its provisions and rules have only been framed for the purposes of election petitions. The ballot papers are to be kept sealed and secret. [LUSH, J.—These are not “ballot papers,” for no one had voted in respect of them.]

C. Russell, Q.C. (E. S. Wright with him) for the prosecution, were not called upon to argue.

KELLY, C.B.—I am clearly of opinion that the conviction was right. There is no doubt that the provisions in the Ballot Act as to secrecy were intended to secure the secrecy of votes really given, but not to protect fraud, or to prevent the proof of fictitious votes given by means of fraudulent ballot papers. Besides, in this case there was an order of the County Court legally made for the production and inspection of the ballot papers and counterfoils at any time or times, and in any court, as evidence for the purpose of a prosecution.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not assent to the argument that secrecy was the only object of the Ballot Act. Purity of election was also an important object of it, and various kinds of fraud were made criminal offences, which offences cannot be proved without the production and inspection of the sealed packets. There is express power given to the House of Commons or any tribunal having cognizance of election petitions, by rule 41, to order the opening and inspection of the sealed packet of counterfoils and counted ballot papers; and by rule 64 an order of the County Court is substituted in the case of municipal elections for an order of the House of Commons, or of one of Her Majesty's Superior Courts. I think the order was legally made.

ROBINSON (app.) v. CLIFF (resp.)

Bakers—Carrying out or delivering bread—Scales and weights—6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 37, s. 7.

The appellant, a baker, out of the London district, drove his cart to a customer's door, asked how much bread was wanted, and delivered the quantity required from his cart. The customer had given the appellant a general order to supply bread in the usual course of trading, but the daily quantity was determined only when the appellant called with his cart. He carried in his cart no beam, scales, nor weights, and justices convicted him under 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 37, s. 7.

Held, upon a case stated, that the appellant was carrying out or delivering bread within the terms of the section, and that the conviction was right.

THIS was a case stated by two justices of the peace for the town of Nottingham, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, on the application in writing of the appellant, who was dissatisfied with their determination upon the question of law which arose before them as hereinafter stated, on the 20th Nov. 1875, at Nottingham; the hearing of the case having been adjourned from the 23rd July 1875 until the 20th Nov. aforesaid, and the appellant having duly entered into a recognizance to prosecute the appeal.

Upon the hearing of a certain information, preferred by the respondent against the appellant under 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 37, s. 7, of which the following is a copy:—

Town of Nottingham and county of the same town to wit. The information of Wm. Henry Cliff, assistant inspector of weights and measures for the said town, taken upon his oath this 19th July 1875, before one of Her Majesty's justices of the peace for the said town of Nottingham and county of the same town, at the Guildhall in the said town of Nottingham, who saith that on the 16th July 1875, John Robinson, 16, Pelican-street, Radford, Notts, in the said town of Nottingham, being then a baker, and then and there conveying and carrying out and delivering bread for sale in a certain cart drawn by one horse, unlawfully did not carry or provide, and was not then provided, in such cart, with a beam and scales with proper weights, in order that the bread sold might be weighed by the purchaser thereof.

Sworn before me.

(Signed) DAVID NEW.

(Signed) HENRY CLIFF.

it was proved that the appellant, being a baker and seller of bread living at Pelican-street, Radford, Notts, did on the 16th July last take and deliver bread from a cart (not at the time being provided with proper weights and scales required by the 6th section of the said Act), outside the shop of a customer of appellant's in a certain street called Russell-street, in Nottingham. When appellant came out of such shop after delivering the bread, respondent said to appellant, “I shall want to weigh your bread, have you got your scales and weights with you? I want to weigh the bread.” Appellant said, “I haven't scales to weigh it with.” Respondent said, “I shall weigh it in my own scales, and I shall want you to see it weighed.” The bread in the shop was weighed in the presence of appellant. There were eleven loaves deficient in weight. Respondent told appellant he should lay the facts of the case before Mr. Radford, the inspector of weights and measures. Respondent applied the following (Saturday) morning for a summons. On cross-examination by the appellant's solicitor, it came out that the information was laid on the following Monday (the 19th July). Appellant is a wholesale baker, selling also at his shop by retail. The appellant called Mary Morris, the wife of Henry Morris, a provision dealer and bread seller (the customer above referred to), living in Russell-street aforesaid; and she stated that on the 16th July last the appellant came to her shop and asked her “How much bread?” She said “Two stones.” Appellant left the shop, and immediately after returned, bringing the bread into the shop from a cart standing in the street. Such bread was weighed by the respondent, and it was

Div. App.]

ROBINSON (app.) v. CLIFF (resp.).

[Div. App.]

deficient in weight. She also stated that the appellant allowed her half a quarter to every ten stones for any deficiency in weight. She further stated that she took about ten stones of bread weekly from appellant, with whom she had dealt two years. Appellant came to her at the commencement of her trading with him, and asked for her orders, and if he could supply her. She had a pass book. Appellant entered the bread in his book. When appellant came to the shop he said, "How much?" She never sent to appellant's shop to order the bread; he always came to her.

On the part of the appellant it was contended that the appellant went round to supply bread to her, having a general order given two years ago; and that it was not necessary that the appellant should be provided with weights and scales when he went to deliver the bread for which he had a general order. It was further contended on the part of the appellant that the information ought to have been laid within forty-eight hours after the offence in pursuance of sect. 31 of the said Act.

The said justices held that the information was laid within a reasonable time as required by the Act, Sunday the 18th July last having intervened, and convicted the appellant in the mitigated penalty of 1*l.*, including costs. They found as a fact that the delivery of the bread by the appellant to Mrs. Morris was in compliance with a general order, and in the usual course of trading; but the quantity of bread to be delivered at each time the appellant called was ascertained only at the time of his calling between the parties, believing the statement of the said Mary Morris.

If the court should be of opinion that the said conviction was legally and properly made, the said conviction to stand; but if the court should think otherwise the conviction to be quashed.

Horace Smith argued for the appellant.—It is enacted by 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 37, s. 7, "That every baker or seller of bread beyond the limits aforesaid (i.e., the metropolitan district), and every journeyman, servant, or other person employed by such baker or seller of bread, who shall convey or carry out bread for sale in and from any cart or other carriage, shall be provided with and shall constantly carry in such cart or other carriage, a correct beam and scales, with proper weights, or other sufficient balance, in order that all bread sold by every such baker or seller of bread, or by his or her journeyman, servant, or other person, may from time to time be weighed in the presence of the purchaser or purchasers thereof, except as aforesaid (i.e., French or fancy bread or rolls, as excepted in sect. 4); and in case any such baker or seller of bread, or his or her journeyman, servant, or other person, shall at any time carry out or deliver any bread without being provided with such beam and scales with proper weights, or other sufficient balance, or whose weights shall be deficient in their due weight, according to the standard in the Exchequer, or shall at any time refuse to weigh any bread purchased of him, her, or them, or delivered by his, her, or their journeyman, servant, or other person, in the presence of the person or persons purchasing or receiving the same, then and in every such case every such baker or seller of bread shall for every such offence forfeit and pay any sum, not exceeding five pounds, which the magistrate or magistrates, justice or justices, before whom such offender or offenders shall be convicted, shall order and direct." The effect of this section is only in respect of persons hawking bread in carts for sale. It does not appear that the question raised in this case has ever been judicially decided, but there is in favour of the appellant's contention a note to Stone's Justices' Manual (14th edit., p. 127, note e) citing the authority of Mr. Justice Field's opinion. The words of the note are: "The first part of this section requires every baker, &c., carrying out bread 'for sale' to have proper weights and scales in his cart or carriage; but in the penal part the words 'for sale' are omitted. If the bread carried out had been previously purchased or ordered at the shop of the baker, will an offence be committed? On this point the opinion of Mr. W. Field, Q.C., was taken in Sept. 1867, for the guidance of the Leicester magistrates; and he advised that it is not an offence to carry bread without scales when such bread has been previously purchased at the shop, or is delivered in pursuance of a previous order, whether general or particular, and is not sent out 'for sale'; that the 6th section protects all bread sold at the shop, under which category he considered that the bread in question falls, the 7th section applying to carts which hawk bread for sale. He also advised that the master, and not the servant, is the person liable to conviction for any offence under the 7th section. It may also be observed that the words 'in the presence of the person purchasing or receiving the same,' at the latter end of the 7th section, appear from the context to apply only to a refusal to weigh."

Kingsford appeared for the respondent, but was not heard.

BRAMWELL, B.—We need not trouble the counsel for the respondent. I think this conviction must be affirmed. The statute is peculiar, and it provides minute regulation on points concerning which I think persons might do better themselves for their own protection than this paternal kind of legislation is likely to do for them. I think Mr. Smith is right in contending that the earlier part of sect. 7 applies only to the hawkers of bread from carts, and does not allude to the bakers' boys who carry out to the customers the bread previously sold or ordered. Sect. 6 regulates the means for weighing bread in the shops, and protects all persons who there make their purchases; and I think the penal provisions at the end of sect. 7 must have been intended to apply equally to transgressions of the 6th and the 7th sections, and to bakers of both classes. Sect. 7 begins by enacting that every baker, "who shall convey or carry out bread for sale in and from any cart or other carriage shall be provided with and shall constantly carry in such cart or carriage" weighing facilities, in order that all bread sold by such baker may be weighed in the presence of the purchaser. Then the section proceeds to enact that in case any such baker or his servant, meaning I think to include both shop-keeper and hawker, "shall at any time carry out or deliver any bread without being provided with such" weighing facilities, he shall be liable to conviction. The contention for the appellant is that the customer in this case might have weighed her bread at the appellant's shop, where it is alleged the bread was sold. But even assuming that there was under the circumstances a previous sale of this bread, there is nothing in the section to exempt the person who delivered the bread from the duty to have a weighing machine with him. The consequence to my mind is that under this section no baker can safely deliver an individual loaf, even although that particular loaf has been bought and weighed in his shop, without carrying his scales to the house where he delivers it. The appellant here has carried out and delivered bread without being provided with beam and scales and proper weights, and, therefore, is liable to conviction under the words of the statute, and I also think in accordance with its intention. The magistrates were right, and the conviction must be affirmed.

LANGRIDGE v. LYNCH.

[Div. App.]

MELLOR, J.—I also think this conviction was right. It appears to me that the Act contemplated three kinds of opportunity by which a customer may obtain bread. In the first place, under the 6th section, he may buy bread at a baker's shop and take it away with him; in the second, he may buy it from a baker who hawks bread in a cart; this is dealt with by the early part of the 7th section; and thirdly, he may obtain bread as the customer in the case is stated to have done, by means of its being carried out and delivered by the baker or his servant, either upon a general order as this was, or upon a purchase at the shop. The object throughout is to compel bakers to afford their customers facilities for seeing that their bread is of proper weight, and I do not see why they should not be equally protected, whatever mode of purchase they may adopt. The result in some cases apparently may be ridiculous; but, as far as I know, it may be necessary, and at all events I think it was intended to be the law.

DENMAN, J.—I think this conviction was right, but the ground upon which I base my conclusion differs materially from that of the other members of the court. I think that under the circumstances this course of business comes within the first part of sect. 7, and the appellant here conveyed or carried out bread for sale in and from a cart or other carriage. The interpretation I put upon the words "for sale" includes this distribution of bread upon the previous general orders of customers. The application of the penal clause is I apprehend limited to the two cases previously mentioned—the shop-keeping baker, and the baker who sells from a cart or carriage. This interpretation does not necessarily carry the inconvenient construction put upon these provisions by my learned brethren. The object, no doubt, was that all breads should be sold for weight, and that all customers should have an opportunity of testing it. This, in my opinion, was bread for sale, and it was conveyed or carried out in a cart. If purchased in a shop and afterwards delivered by the baker or his boy from a basket, I think no weights or scales would be necessary. But as this was bread carried out in a cart for sale, the cart ought to have carried the beam and scales required.

Solicitor and client—Fees for entering appeal at sessions—Liability of solicitor.

The solicitor, and not the client, is liable to the clerk of the peace for fees connected with the entering, &c. of an appeal at the sessions.

THIS was an action brought by the Clerk of the Peace for Sussex to recover the sum of 5*l.* 19*s.* 5*d.*, alleged to be due for fees, and was tried before the deputy County Court judge without a jury, when the judge gave a verdict for the amount claimed.

The fees are regulated by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, and, it was admitted, were properly payable by somebody. Evidence of a custom for the solicitor and not the client to pay was given at the trial. Three letters, also written by the defendant, were tendered, in one of which he acknowledged the receipt of the above memorandum of charges, and in another asked for the copy of a conviction, adding, "I shall be happy to pay your charges."

A rule nisi was afterwards granted, on the ground that there was no evidence of liability on the part of the defendant to pay these charges.

A. L. Smith showed cause.—The solicitor is the person who is liable to pay these fees. In Newton v. Chambers (1 Dowl. & L. Rep. 869; 13 L. J. 141, Q.B.) it was held that a sheriff's officer might maintain an action against the attorney of the plaintiff in the original suit for caption fees and conduct money. So, too, an attorney and not his client is liable to a bailiff for his fees in issuing execution against a defendant: (Maile v. Mann 2 Ex. 608; 6 D. & L. 42; 17 L. J. 336, Ex.; Brewer v. Jones, 10 Ex. 655; and Wallbank v. Quartermann, 3 O. B. 94.) In the latter case Maule, J. observed that "the inconvenience would be prodigious if it were held that the officer must look to the client for his fees." He also referred to Batt v. Price (33 L. T. Rep. N.S. 808; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 264).

Harmsworth in support of the rule.—Prima facie the solicitor is not the party liable: (Hart v. White, Holt N. P. C. 376.) The solicitor is known to be an agent only, and to act for others, and by a personal undertaking he makes himself liable or derives some benefit, he cannot be sued. There is here neither a personal undertaking, nor does

WREN (app.) v. POCKOCK (resp.).

[DIV. APP.]

the solicitor derive any benefit. Brewer v. Jones (ubi sup.), and the others cited by the other side, are distinguishable, inasmuch as there was a service to the attorney issuing the writ. In Merriman v. Newman (20 W. R. 369) it was held that an attorney who issues a writ of fi. fa. is not bound to pay the costs incurred by a sheriff's officer who makes an unsuccessful levy under the writ, on the ground that the latter had not done anything which proved beneficial to the attorney. He also cited:

Maybery v. Mansfield, 9 Q. B. 754.

CLEASBY, B.—It appears to me that the decision arrived at by the County Court judge in this case is correct; and, therefore, this rule must be discharged. This is a case of fees payable to a particular officer, and which he is entitled to exact at the time they become due. There is both reason and authority for holding here that the plaintiff may recover these fees from the defendant, for he could not bind the client. In the case of Maile v. Mann (ubi sup.), which has been referred to, Alderson, B., distinctly stated during the argument that the question was, "whether the attorney had any authority to pledge his clients credit in a matter where it is the custom for the attorney to pay the fees out of his pocket, when, in fact, it is a ready money transaction." In Robins v. Bridge (3 M. & W. 114; 6 Dowl. 140; M. & H. 357), the question arose as to the liability of an attorney to pay the expenses of attendance of a witness whom he had subpoenaed on behalf of his client to give evidence at a trial; and Lord Abinger, in the course of a considered judgment, says, "If, therefore, an attorney employs a stationer to do anything for which he makes a charge, he is liable, as he is for the fees of the officers of the court; for these are ready money transactions, for which the person engaged in the business of the court is liable; for it cannot be presumed that the client would authorise him to pledge his credit when no credit is given." That is the very case here, and this being a transaction in which the respondent had a right to be paid at the time, it is clear the solicitor is responsible. We have here evidence as to the usage, and admission of facts in the correspondence in which the debt is recognised by the defendant. In Batt v. Price (ubi sup.), it was recently decided by the Court of Queen's Bench that the solicitor is the party liable. This rule must, therefore, be discharged.

GROVE, J.—I agree with what has fallen from my brother Cleasby. There is ample evidence to fix the solicitor here independently of there being a prima facie liability. There is distinct evidence of the custom of the office, and knowledge of such custom by the defendant. The decision of the County Court judge was quite correct.

Rule discharged.

Dogs Act 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 56), s. 3—Dog "under control"—Evidence of ownership.

An order was made in pursuance of 34 & 35 Vict. c. 56, s. 3, on owners to keep their dogs under the control of some person for a fixed period. A dog was seen in the road with the appellant's governess and children, rushing backwards and forwards to them, sometimes being as much as twenty yards away. A constable swore the dog belonged to the appellant, and that he had seen it in the appellant's yard within the previous fortnight. The appellant, however, called evidence to contradict this. The justices convicted, but stated a case for the opinion of the court as to whether there was sufficient evidence of ownership, and whether the dog was under control.

Held, that there was reasonable evidence that the dog belonged to the appellant, and was not under control, to support the conclusion arrived at by the justices.

Per Bramwell, B.—The question whether or not a dog is under control within sect. 3 is one of fact and not of law.

CASE stated under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

The following is a copy of an order made by the justices under 34 & 35 Vict. c. 56, s. 3:

To Adam Blandy, Chief Constable of the County of Berks.

Berks, } Whereas, you the said Adam Blandy, as such to wit, } chief constable as aforesaid, have complained to us, the undersigned, two of her Majesty's justices of the peace of the said county, acting for the petty sessional division of Reading, in petty sessions this day assembled, that a mad dog has been found within our jurisdiction.

We do therefore in pursuance of sect. 3 of 34 & 35 Vict. c. 56, order that all dogs throughout the whole of the jurisdiction be confined and kept under the control of such person or persons for the space of three calendar months now next ensuing.

Given under our hands and seals this 15th day of April, 1876.

J. B. MONCK.

A. W. COBHAM.

The following is a copy of a notice published by the said Adam Blandy, in pursuance of the same Act:

Mad Dogs.—Notice.

Berks, } Whereas a mad dog has been roaming about in to wit, } and about certain parishes in the petty sessional division of Reading, and has bitten several dogs, I hereby give notice that, by virtue of an order made and signed this 15th day of April, 1876, by two of her Majesty's justices of the peace of the said county, acting for the petty sessional division of Reading, all dogs within their jurisdiction are to be confined and kept under the control of some person or persons, and not to be allowed to be at large for the space of three calendar months from this date.

Anybody who disobeys the above mentioned order is liable to a fine of 20s.

Dated this 15th day of April, 1876.

A. BLANDY, Chief Constable.

Police constables have power, by virtue of this order to take and detain any dog not under the control of some person, and after five days, if not previously claimed, the chief of the police may order such dog to be destroyed.

The information was preferred under 34 & 35 Vict. c. 56, s. 3 (a), charging the appellant with unlawfully suffering a dog to be at large.

It was proved at the hearing, by Hedges, police-constable, that at about one in the afternoon of Monday, 1st May 1876, he saw the appellant's

(a) By the Dogs Act 1871, s. 3, "the local authority may, if a mad dog, or a dog suspected to be mad, is found within their jurisdiction, make, and when made vary or revoke, an order placing such restrictions as they think expedient on all dogs not being under the control of any person, during such period as may be prescribed in such order, throughout the whole of their jurisdiction, or such part thereof as may be printed in their order. Any person who acts in contravention of any order made in pursuance of this section shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding 20s.

governess and children in the road, and a dog with them. The dog was running backwards and forwards to them, and was at times 20yds. away from them. The constable knew the dog to be the appellant's, and he had seen the same dog in the appellant's yard within the previous fourteen days.

The appellant called his servant to prove that he had not seen the dog about the place from the 15th April last to the 1st May instant, and that he knew the dog had gone away, and that the appellant had not taken any trouble about it, and that the appellant had exercised no right of ownership over the dog since the 1st Jan. last. It was stated by the appellant that he was paralytic and unable to walk about, and had not seen a copy of the above notice, and that the only occasions on which he went out were to drive direct from his house to the railway, and he contended—

(1.) That the dog was not his dog, but a stray dog. (2.) That due notice had not been given of the order. (3.) That if the magistrates were against the appellant on the first two points, then that the dog was under control.

The magistrates, however, thought the case proved, and convicted the appellant.

The questions for the opinion of the court are—First, whether on the above evidence the dog belonged to the appellant; secondly, whether due notice was given of the order; thirdly, whether the dog was under control.

If the court should be of opinion that the said conviction was legally and properly made, and the appellant is liable as aforesaid, then the said conviction is to stand, otherwise the said information is to be dismissed.

Henry, for the appellant.—There was here no sufficient evidence of ownership. At all events the dog was under control, within the meaning of the section. When a dog is out with a person it is under the control of that person. He cited Ex parte Markham (21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 748).

H. D. Greene, for the respondents, was not called upon to argue.

BRAMWELL, B.—This conviction must be affirmed. The order of the magistrates is good, and within the Act. I doubt whether the notice is good. The notice differs from the order. The notice says that "all dogs are to be confined and kept under the control of some person." However, this point was not taken before the magistrates. I am inclined also to think that there was a defect in the information, which was for "unlawfully suffering" a dog to be at large, which was not strictly in accordance with the terms of the notice; but with that we cannot deal now. The question is, did this dog belong to the appellant? I think there was some evidence of it, and that the finding of the justices was reasonable. Lastly, was the dog under control? I rather doubt whether the magistrates have not been labouring under a mistake in thinking that the sole question was whether the dog was at large, and if I was certain that this was so, the conviction would not be proper. However, they have put the right question to us, namely, whether the dog was under control. Now it may or may not have been; either view is consistent with the evidence; and as the question is, in my judgment, one of fact and not of law, and has been decided against the appellant, we shall not interfere.

GROVE, J.—The only part I feel doubt about is as to the meaning of the words "under control." However, I think there was evidence here to show that this dog was not under control.

OVENDEN (app.) v. RAYMOND (resp.).

Gaming—Public billiard room belonging to licensed victualler—Lodgers playing after closing hours—Statutes 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, and 37 & 38 Vict. c. 49, s. 10

By 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, s. 13, the holder of a victualler's licence who keeps a public billiard table, and allows persons to play thereon when the premises are not allowed to be open for the sale of wine, &c., is liable to a certain penalty. By 37 & 38 Vict. c. 49, s. 10, a person licensed to sell any intoxicating liquor, to be consumed on the premises, may sell such liquor at any time to persons lodging in his house. The appellant held a victualler's licence for a certain house at H. The closing hour at H. on week days is 11 p.m., and after that time two gentlemen, lodgers in the house, were found playing billiards. The justices thought that 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, s. 13 absolutely prohibited all persons without exception from playing at a public billiard table during closing hours, and that such prohibition was not affected by 37 & 38 Vict. c. 49, s. 10. Accordingly the appellant was convicted, but the justices stated a case.

Held, that the conviction was right.

CASE stated by justices under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

At a petty sessions holden at the Town Hall, Hythe, on the 23rd March last, an information was preferred by George Raymond, superintendent of police for the said borough (hereinafter called the respondent), against George Henry Ovenden, licensed victualler (hereinafter called the appellant), under sect. 13 of the Act 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, charging him for "that he on the 1st March last, at the parish of St. Leonard, Hythe, then holding a victualler's licence for a certain house and premises there situate, called The Swan, in which he then kept a public billiard table, unlawfully did allow certain persons to play at the said table on the said premises at a certain time when the said premises were not by law allowed to be open for the sale of wine, spirits, or beer, or other fermented or distilled liquor, to wit, at ten minutes past 12 a.m.," was heard and determined by us, the said parties respectively being then present, and upon such hearing the appellant was duly convicted before us of the said offence, and we adjudged him to pay the sum of 1s., and also to pay to the respondent the sum of 9s. for his costs in that behalf. Upon the hearing of the information it was proved on the part of the respondent, and found as a fact, that the hour of closing victualling houses in the borough of Hythe was eleven o'clock on week days. At ten minutes past 12 a.m. on the 1st March last respondent went to the appellant's house, the Swan Hotel, which was closed. Respondent knocked, and appellant opened the door, and on respondent going into the house he said to the appellant, "You have billiard playing." He said, "Yes; they have not finished their game." Respondent then went into the billiard room and there found two gentlemen, who were lodging in the house, playing billiards. It was contended on the part of the appellant that the gentlemen referred to were lodgers within the meaning of sect. 10 of the Licensing Act 1874, and as that Act permitted a licensed person to sell intoxicating liquor to lodgers after the prohibited hours of closing, the appellant was justified in allowing them to play at billiards after such hours. We, the said justices, were of opinion that sect 13 of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, absolutely prohibited all persons without exemption from playing at a public billiard table in a house of a person holding a victualler's licence, when the premises are not allowed to be open for the sale of intoxicating liquors; and that the exception in sect. 10 of the Licensing Act 1874, allowing liquors to be supplied to bona fide lodgers, does not affect such prohibition. We, therefore, convicted the appellant, as above stated, and granted a case for the opinion of this court. The question for the opinion of this court is whether the appellant, under the above circumstances, was rightly convicted. If the court should be of opinion that the appellant was rightly convicted, and the appellant is liable as aforesaid, then the conviction is to stand; but if the court should be of opinion otherwise, then the said information is to be dismissed, or such order to be made as the court shall think fit.

The 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, s. 13, enacts as follows: "Every person keeping any public billiard table, or bagatelle board, or instrument used in any game of the like kind, whether he be the holder of a victualler's licence, or licensed under this Act, who shall allow any person to play at such table, board or instrument, after one and before eight o'clock of the morning in any day, or at any time on Sunday, Christmas Day, or Good Friday, or any day appointed to be kept as a public fast or thanksgiving, and every person holding a victualler's licence, who shall allow any person to play at such table, board, or instrument, kept on the premises specified in such victualler's licence, at any time when such premises are not by law allowed to be open for the sale of wine, spirits, or beer, or other fermented or distilled liquor, shall be liable to the penalties herein provided in the case of persons keeping such public billiard table, bagatelle board, or instrument as aforesaid, for public use without licence; and during those times when play at such table, board, or instrument is not allowed by this Act, any house licensed under this Act, and any billiard room in any house specified in any victualler's licence, shall be closed, and the keeping of the same open, or allowing any person to play therein or thereat, at any of the times, or on any of the days during which such play is not allowed by this Act, shall be deemed in each case an offence against the tenor of the licence of the person so offending."

By the Licensing Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 49), s. 10: "Nothing in this Act, or in the principal Act contained shall preclude a person licensed to sell any intoxicating liquor to be consumed on the premises, from selling such liquor at any time to bona fide travellers, and to persons lodging in his house, provided that no person holding a six day licence shall sell any intoxicating liquor or Sunday to any person whatever not lodging in his house."

Dering, for the appellant.—This conviction is wrong. The prohibition contained in 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, s. 13, only applies when the premises are not allowed to be open for the sale of wine, &c. But by the Licensing Act 1874, intoxicating liquors may be sold at any time to lodgers, so that the prohibition does not attach at all.

The respondent did not appear.

Per CURIAM.—The appellant is clearly wrong. It is manifestly absurd that lodgers in the house may be supplied with drink after closing hours, and yet that they are not allowed to play an innocent game of billiards. The words of the section are, however, too plain to admit of any other interpretation. This was evidently a casus omisus on the part of the Legislature.

Conviction affirmed.

DOVER v. CHILD.

Res judicata—Trover of goods—Previous refusal of magistrate to order delivery of the goods under 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71, s. 40—Estoppel—Title to the goods.

To a declaration in trover for the recovery of some harness, the defendant pleaded that the plaintiff had previously applied to a police magistrate within the metropolitan district under 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71, s. 40, to order the delivery up to him by the defendant of the harness alleged to be unlawfully detained. That the magistrate, after due inquiry made into the title to such harness, refused to make such order, and that thereupon the plaintiff brought this action to recover the harness.

Held, upon demurrer, that the proceedings before the magistrate did not estop the plaintiff from bringing the present action and that the plea was bad.

THE declaration was in trover for that the defendant converted to his own use, and wrongfully deprived the plaintiff of the use and possession of his goods, to wit, a set of patent joiner's cramps, a set of harness, and a goat.

To this the defendant pleaded, amongst others, the following plea:

As to so much of the declaration as relates to the set of harness therein mentioned, that the plaintiff ought not to be permitted to say that the defendant converted the same to his own use, or that the same was the plaintiff's, because the defendant says that the alleged conversion took place after the 25th Aug. 1839 (the date of the commencement of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71, s. 40), and consisted of the detention by the defendant within the limits of the metropolitan police district of the said goods, the value of which was not then greater than 15*l*., whereupon, afterwards, and before this suit, the plaintiff duly made his complaint before George Chance, Esq., one of the magistrates of the police courts of the metropolis, sitting at the Lambeth police court, in the county of Surrey, for that the defendant unlawfully and without just cause detained within the said district the said goods which the plaintiff then alleged to be his property, and to the property and possession of which goods the plaintiff then claimed to be entitled, whereupon the said George Chance duly summoned the defendant to appear at a certain day and hour at the police court before him, or such other magistrate of the said police court as might then be there, to answer the said complaint, and to show cause why an order should not then and there be made upon him to deliver the said goods to the plaintiff. And the defendant, in obedience to the said summons, duly appeared at the time and place therein mentioned, before the said George Chance, and the said George Chance then and there heard the said case and the subject matter of the said complaint, and then and there inquired into the title to the said goods and the defendant's possession thereof. And it then appeared to the said George Chance, and he then decided and adjudged that the defendant then had title to the said goods, and to the possession thereof, and the plaintiff had then no title thereto, or to the possession thereof, and he then dismissed the said summons, and thereby adjudicated the subject matter of the said complaint in favour of the defendant, and the defendant has ever since held possession of the said goods on the said title, and the plaintiff has never since acquired any title or right to the possession of the said goods other than he had at the time of the said decision, and this the defendant is ready to verify, whereupon he prays judgment if the plaintiff ought to be permitted against the decision of the said magistrate to say that the said goods at the time of the alleged conversion were his goods.

DOVER v. CHILD.

To this the plaintiff demurred.

Prentice, Q.C., for the plaintiff, in support of the demurrer.—The dismissal of a summons is no bar to an action; it may be looked on in the nature of a nonsuit. These proceedings before the magistrate were taken under 2 & 3 Vict. c. 71, s. 40, which says: "Upon complaint made to any of the said magistrates by any person claiming to be entitled to the property or possession of any goods which are detained by any person within the limits of the metropolitan police districts, the value of which shall not be greater than 15*l.*, and not being deeds, muniments, or papers relating to any property of greater value than 15*l.*, it shall be lawful for such magistrate to summon the person complained of, and to inquire into the title thereto or to the possession thereof, and if it shall appear to the magistrate that such goods have been detained without just cause after due notice of the claim made by the person complaining, or that the person detaining such goods has a lien or right to detain the same by way of security for the payment of money, or the performance of any act by the owner thereof, it shall be lawful for such magistrate to order the goods to be delivered to the owner thereof, either absolutely or upon tender of the amount appearing to be due by such owner (which amount the magistrate is hereby authorised to determine), or upon performance, or upon tender and refusal of the performance of the act for the performance whereof such goods are detained as security; or if such act cannot be performed, then upon tender of amends for non-performance thereof (the nature and amount of which amends the magistrate is hereby authorised to determine); and any person who shall neglect or refuse to deliver up the goods according to such order, shall forfeit to the party aggrieved the full value of such goods not greater than the sum of 15*l.*, such value to be determined by the magistrate. Provided always, that no such order shall bar any person from recovering possession of the goods or money so delivered or forfeited by suit or action at law from the person to whose possession such goods or money shall come by virtue of such order, so that such action shall be commenced within six calendar months after such order shall be made."

[CLEASBY, B.—The proceedings before the magistrate were merely auxiliary, and not in substitution of any proceedings the plaintiff might take in a Superior Court to recover his property; it is like the common case of a person going before a magistrate to get possession of tenements, and whether the magistrate does or does not order it to be given up, he may still bring an action of trespass.] The proviso of sect. 40 expressly declares that no order such as may be made under the section shall bar any person from recovering possession of the goods, and here the magistrate made no order. The decision of the magistrate refusing the order no more bars the plaintiff than a refusal by justices to grant an order in bastardy proceedings bars the mother from taking subsequent proceedings; it is not a final order of discharge:

Rea v. Jenkin, Ca. Temp. Hard 301;

Reg. v. Machen, 14 Q. B. 74; 18 L. J. 213, M. C.

[He was then stopped.]

A. B. Kempe, for the defendant, in support of the plea.—The question in this action is res judicata, for it is the same as that which was entertained and decided by the magistrate, though the form of proceeding is different, and the defendant ought not to be put to defend his title twice. There is nothing to take the case out of the general rule laid down in the Duchess of Kingston's Case (2 Smith's Lead. Cas. 7th edit. 761), "that the judgment of a court of concurrent jurisdiction directly upon the point is, as a plea, a bar, or as evidence conclusive between the same parties upon the same matter directly in question in another court." Here the magistrate, by the Act, has express jurisdiction to inquire into the question of title, and the plea states that he did so inquire. His decision that he would make no order is in effect an adjudication that the plaintiff had, as against the defendant, no title to the goods, and that point was the point directly in issue between the parties there, and is so now. That the form of proceeding is not the same in both cases is quite immaterial. In Routledge v. Hislop (2 E. & E. 549; 2 L. T. Rep. 53; 29 L. J. 90, M. C.) a servant sued her master in the County Court for discharging her, and the verdict was in favour of the defendant. She afterwards took out a summons before the magistrates against the defendant to recover her wages, and the Court of Queen's Bench held that the question to be decided was essentially the same, viz., whether the discharge was wrongful, and that the decision in the County Court was conclusive as between the parties. No distinction can be drawn between the case where the magistrate refuses to make an order and where he makes one. The plaintiff has no right to try an experiment in one court and when he has failed to repeat it in another. He has chosen his tribunal, and must abide by its decision. In Flitters v. Allfrey (31 L. T. Rep. 878; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 29), Grove, J. said, "It would be against principle and authority if a party, having tried an experiment in one tribunal, could, if judgment was against him, proceed again in another court, not by way of appeal, but by merely varying the form of procedure, or by forcing the opposite party to proceed for redress in respect of the same question as had been previously litigated, again harass his antagonist for the same cause and take his chance of success in another court, where he has previously failed in a court of competent jurisdiction." The proviso at the end of sect. 40 shows that the plaintiff is bound by the decision of the magistrate, while the defendant has six months in which to question such decision, and there is no inequality in this, as the former can if he chooses commence with an action, while the latter, if it were not for the proviso, would have no opportunity of having the question tried in a superior court, and even by the proviso he must take proceedings within six months:

Cummings v. Heard, 20 L. T. Rep. 975; L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 689;

KELLY, C.B.—The object of this Act (2 & 3 Vict. c. 71) was to give to a magistrate power to order the delivery up of goods of small value, but I do not think that sect. 40 gives him power to determine the title to the goods. If we look at the section we see that it gives power to the magistrate, upon complaint made of the detention of goods, to summon the person complained of, and inquire into the title to the goods or to the possession thereof. He has power to inquire into the title undoubtedly; but there his power ceases. He may order the goods to be delivered up to the owner thereof, either absolutely or upon certain terms; but here no one of these orders has been made by him; he has not exercised the powers he possessed of making those orders, but has simply dismissed the summons. If he had made any of those orders wrongfully, the defendant, or anyone claiming under him, would not be without remedy, if he could prove that he was lawfully entitled to the goods; for the proviso gives him six months in which to question the magistrate's decision, by bringing an action in a superior court for the recovery of the goods. With regard to the plaintiff, there is no limitation of any common law or statutory right which he might be possessed of to try and recover his goods by other proceedings. Supposing the goods to be the plaintiff's, and the magistrate's decision erroneous, the plaintiff would, if the contention on behalf of the defendant were right, be deprived of his goods without any power whatever of appealing. I therefore think that the magistrate has power to inquire into the title to the goods to such an extent as may enable him to make any of the orders under sect. 40 of the Act, but that where he does not make any order the plaintiff is not precluded from seeking his remedy elsewhere.

CLEASBY, B.—There is no doubt that the authorities that have been cited on the part of the defendant were properly decided, but I do not see that they have any bearing on the case now before us. If the jurisdiction of the magistrate were to give judgment upon the question of title, that judgment could afterwards be questioned, but in this case the power given is to make orders on the conclusion he may form as to the title to the goods. He must therefore inquire into the title, but his decision is not like a judgment, which can only be questioned in a court of appeal, because it appears from the proviso to sect. 40 that although the magistrate may have inquired and made an order with regard to the goods, yet the defendant may afterwards bring an action. That seems to show conclusively that the magistrate has no power to determine absolutely the title to the property, and it would be monstrous that if he were to form his conclusion one way, the one party might bring his action, and yet that the plaintiff, merely because he has taken advantage of a convenient mode of proceeding should be precluded from appealing. It has been said that by the proviso there is the limitation of six months within which the defendant must proceed, and yet the plaintiff would be at liberty to sue in any case, but the reason for the limitation in the case of the defendant is that it would be most undesirable, after the goods have been handed over by the command of a magistrate, and that state of things had continued for six months, that it should be altered; the six months is a reasonable time within which the defendant may test the correctness of the order. This is not altogether an anomalous proceeding, for it is very like the process before justices to obtain possession of small tenements. An order is made, but the person against whom the order is made is not conclusively bound by it, but may bring his action of trespass at once. I do not think the Act of Parliament gives the magistrate power to determine the title; I think he has only to form a conclusion so as to found an order, which is a convenient mode of putting an end to disputes, and therefore the plaintiff is not precluded by the magistrate's decision from bringing this action.

HUDDLESTON, B.—I am of the same opinion. Looking at the words of the statute, we see that they are limited both as to the area of jurisdiction, namely, the metropolitan district, and as to the value of the goods, namely, 15*l*. No doubt the magistrate has power to inquire into the title thereto, but such inquiry is only for the ultimate purpose of making an order either absolute or conditional. This, however, is not a final order, for, by the proviso, the person against whom the order is made may within six months bring an action. If he can do this, surely the order is not final. In Flitters v. Alfrey (sup.) the court did not decide the question of estoppel, but said that the parties having chosen a tribunal in which the matter could have been finally decided, and having gone before such tribunal, and its decision having been given, we will not allow the parties to dispute it again. I think the plea is bad, and that our judgment must be for the plaintiff.

SHAW v. THOMPSON.

Advowson—Right of election vested in parishioners and ratepayers—Mode of election—Voting—Right of parishioners to vary method of—Ballot—Illegal election not set aside—Costs.

The advowson of a living was vested in trustees for the ratepayers and parishioners of the parish who had the right of electing to a vacancy and of determining the mode in which the election should be conducted. For nearly 200 years the mode of election had been by a three or four days' poll and open voting. In 1875 a vacancy occurred, and thereupon the churchwardens convened a meeting of the inhabitants to consider the necessary steps to be taken in the election, and to adopt such course as might be deemed most desirable. One of the churchwardens took the chair at this meeting, and resolutions were passed that the 30th Aug. following should be fixed for the nomination meeting, that there should be a three days' poll, and that all necessary arrangements for carrying out the election should be left to the churchwardens. Subsequently the churchwardens, pursuant to a numerously signed requisition, convened a meeting of the inhabitants for the 25th Aug. Neither of the churchwardens took part in this meeting, but resolutions were duly passed that in the event of a poll being demanded it should be taken by ballot, that the hours of polling should be from 9 a.m. to 9 p.m., and that the poll should take place on one day only. A copy of these resolutions was immediately forwarded to the churchwardens: At the nomination meeting of the 30th Aug. both churchwardens were present, one of them being in the chair, and a poll was demanded on behalf of one of the candidates. The chairman then announced that there would be a three days' poll, and that the poll would be open from 8 a.m. to 8 p.m. A ratepayer then came forward to move an amendment in accordance with the resolutions of the 25th Aug., whereupon the chairman immediately left the chair declaring the meeting at an end. Another person was then voted into the chair, and the amendment was carried by a large majority. The churchwardens disregarded the resolutions of the 25th Aug., and carried out the election in accordance with the former custom. An action having been brought to set aside the election

Held, that the conduct of the churchwardens in disregarding the wishes of the inhabitants was wholly illegal and irregular; but that, inasmuch as the evidence failed to show that any one person was prevented from voting, or that, if the election had been in accordance with the wishes of the parishioners, the result would have been different, the plaintiffs were not entitled to the relief they sought.

Held, also, that as the right of determining the method in which the election should be carried out was vested in the inhabitants they were entitled, if they thought fit, to adopt the ballot.

By a deed dated the 2nd June 1656, and made between Edward Drake of the one part, and Josiah Berners, James Berners, Richard Powell, Richard Powell the younger, and Benjamin Powell, of the other part, it was witnessed that for the pecuniary considerations therein mentioned the said Edward Drake granted to the parties of the other part and their heirs all the church of Clerkenwell, rectory, and parsonage, churchyard soil and buildings, and the advowson, donation, free disposition, right of patronage, and vicarage, to hold unto and to the use of them and their heirs upon trust for the only use, benefit, and behoof of the parishioners and inhabitants of the parish of St. James, Clerkenwell, and their successors for ever.

From the date of the said deed the church and rectory of Clerkenwell have been vested in trustees upon the trusts declared by the deed, and the parishioners and inhabitants in vestry assembled or the churchwardens and inhabitants have from time to time chosen an incumbent of the said living.

In the month of July 1681, differences arose as to the right to elect the incumbent, and the vestry professed to make rules as to voting in such election.

In 1768 a suit of The Attorney-General v. Rutter (2 Russ. 101 [n]) was instituted to determine the right of election, and a decree was made in February 1769, which declared that the right of election was only in the parishioners and inhabitants paying tithes, rates, and assessments to the church and poor.

In June 1875 the benefice became vacant, and thereupon posters signed by the churchwardens were issued headed "Election of Vicar for Clerkenwell," and giving notice that a public meeting of the parishioners and inhabitants assessed to the poor rate would be held in the vestry room of the parish church on July 28th, 1875, at 7 o'clock in the evening to take into consideration the necessary steps to be taken in the election of a vicar to the living then vacant, and to adopt such course as might be deemed most desirable.

A meeting was accordingly held on the 28th July, Edward Culver, one of the churchwardens, acting as chairman. At this meeting the chairman stated that there were twenty-one candidates for the living (including the Rev. J. H. Rose and the Rev. W. Holderness), and suggested that Monday the 30th Aug. should be fixed for the election at the vestry hall with a preliminary meeting for the purposes of nomination. In answer to a question as to the system of voting to be adopted the chairman stated that the election would be conducted by open voting; that he did not consider it necessary to have a polling place in each ward of the parish, inasmuch as that was not the case on the occasion of the last election. One of the parishioners then moved that in the opinion of the meeting it was desirable that the churchwardens should convene a meeting of the inhabitants for Monday the 30th Aug. at 6 o'clock in the evening to proceed to the election of a vicar. This motion was seconded by Alfred Goad, the other churchwarden, but after some discussion it was determined that the meeting should take place at 7 o'clock instead of 6 o'clock in the evening to give a better chance to the working men of the parish to attend. Mr. Samuel Brighty, one of the parishioners, then moved that in the event of a poll being required there should be only one day's poll, which should be kept open from 8 a.m. to 8 p.m. The chairman promised to be guided by precedent, and to take a legal opinion on the subject, whereupon the motion was negatived.

Subsequently a requisition signed by thirty-four parishioners and ratepayers was prepared and forwarded to the churchwardens, stating that it had been resolved at a meeting held on the 17th Aug. that "having regard to the organic changes made in electoral law since the election of the late vicar in 1857," they desired a meeting "to decide as to the mode in which the votes should be taken at the ensuing election, and also as to the duration and hours of polling." Pursuant to this requisition the churchwardens duly convened a meeting of parishioners and ratepayers for Wednesday, the 25th Aug., at 7 o'clock in the evening "to consider the questions referred to in the said resolution and requisition."

A meeting was accordingly held on the 25th Aug. Edward Culver did not attend this meeting, but Alfred Goad was present, but refused to take the chair. Thereupon William Osborne, a ratepayer and parishioner, was voted into the chair, and acted as chairman throughout the meeting. At this meeting the six following resolutions were duly moved, discussed, and carried—the first four unanimously, and the remaining two by large majorities. (1.) That the churchwardens should be appointed returning officers. (2.) That in the event of a poll being demanded for the election of the vicar, it should be taken by ballot. (3.) An amendment (on a motion that the hours of polling should be from 8 a.m. to 8 p.m.) that as many of the working hands of the parish only left off work at 8 p.m., the hours of polling should be from 9 a.m. to 9 p.m. (4.) That there should be a polling place in each ward of the parish to make it as easy as possible for every parishioner and ratepayer to record his vote. (5.) That the poll should take place on one day only, and that the following Monday, the 30th Aug., should be the day of nomination. (6.) That the resolutions as passed should be forwarded to the churchwardens, and that they be requested to carry them out. On the following day these resolutions were duly forwarded to the churchwardens.

On the 30th Aug., but prior to the nomination meeting, two of the parishioners and ratepayers, in anticipation of some such announcement as was later in the day made by Edward Culver, as chairman of the nomination meeting, duly served a formal protest in writing upon the churchwardens protesting against any infraction by them of the said resolutions of the 25th Aug., and stating their intention of contesting the validity of a poll taken in any other way than in accordance with the terms of such resolutions.

The nomination meeting was held at 7 p.m. the same evening, Edward Culver presiding. The Rev. J. H. Rose and the Rev. W. Holderness were respectively duly nominated, and the show of hands was in favour of the Rev. W. Holderness. On a poll being demanded on behalf of the Rev. J. H. Rose, Edward Culver, as chairman, announced that such poll would be opened on the following day, 31st Aug., at 8 a.m. and closed at 8 p.m., that such poll would continue for three consecutive days, and that the mode of voting would be open and oral. Great dissatisfaction at this announcement was expressed by the meeting, and the said Samuel Brighty then came forward to move an amendment in accordance with the resolutions passed on the 25th Aug., but Edward Culver, the chairman, declined to put it to the meeting, and left the chair, declaring the meeting at an end. The said William Osborne was then voted into the chair, and the meeting continued, and then a resolution was carried by a large majority endorsing the resolutions passed at the meeting of the 25th Aug., and protesting against the arrangements announced by the recent chairman, Edward Culver.

The same day the churchwardens advertised that the announcement which had been made at the nomination meeting by Edward Culver as to the time and manner of the poll, had been made under the advice of counsel. The same day Samuel Brighty delivered to the churchwardens a formal protest in writing against their decision as to the mode of voting, and stating that he (although the friends of the Rev. W. Holderness would go to the poll) thereby held himself free to take any course that he might be advised to render the election nugatory, and that, therefore, he would hold the churchwardens responsible for its irregularity and illegality.

The next day, 31st Aug., the voting commenced, and the poll was kept open also on the 1st and 2nd Sept. The mode of voting was open and oral, and only one polling place (the vestry hall) was appointed, and the polling was closed each day at 8 p.m.

At such poll, the Rev. J. H. Rose was elected by a large majority, and thereupon a protest was immediately served upon the churchwardens by certain parishioners and ratepayers, and subsequently a caveat was entered against the presentation and induction of the Rev. J. H. Rose.

On the 29th Nov. George Shaw (on behalf of himself and all other the parishioners and ratepayers of St. James, Clerkenwell) commenced an action against the churchwardens, the trustees of the deed, the Bishop of London, and the Rev. J. H. Rose. By his statement of claim, the plaintiff charged that the meeting of the 25th Aug. was a duly and properly convened meeting of the parishioners and ratepayers; that the sense of the said meeting was duly and properly expressed in the resolutions passed thereat; that such resolutions were accordingly valid and binding on the churchwardens and the parishioners and ratepayers of the parish generally; and that, in consequence of such resolutions having been disregarded at the election, such election was null and void. And the plaintiff asked for a declaration that the election was null and void, and for an injunction to restrain the churchwardens and trustees from presenting, and the Bishop of London from inducting, the Rev. J. H. Rose to the living or benefice of St. James, Clerkenwell.

The churchwardens, the trustee, and the Rev. J. H. Rose in their statements of defence contended that the meeting of the 28th July distinctly understood and assented to the election being conducted in accordance with the ancient usage and custom, and that the mode in which the election was to be conducted was then finally and duly settled; that the parishioners and inhabitants were bound by such ancient usage and custom, and that the same could not properly or legally be departed from without the unanimous consent of all the parishioners and inhabitants entitled to vote at the election; that the meeting of the 25th Aug., and the resolutions passed thereat were illegal and irregular; that the election had been conducted in strict accordance with the ancient custom and usage, and that the Rev. J. H. Rose had, in fact, been duly elected; and they submitted that in the absence of any special usage, custom, or Act of Parliament authorising or requiring the voting at an election of any kind to be taken by ballot the only legal and valid mode of voting was open and oral voting.

The Bishop of London did not appear. The other material facts and the arguments are sufficiently noticed in the judgment.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—Having for several days listened to the evidence and the arguments I have had sufficient time to deliberate upon the case and to form the judgment which I now pronounce. The rights of the parishioners have been established long ago by judicial decision. The judgment of Lord Hardwicke pronounced in 1776 has in my opinion exhausted the subject; and a more clear, and I need not say impartial, judgment it is impossible to conceive. The rights of the parishioners are there established, to use Lord Hardwicke's words, "upon the foot of the deed." The deed creates them the owners of the advowson. The trustees are appointed only by way of machinery with no interest, beneficial or otherwise, but with the duty only of carrying into effect the resolutions founded upon the wishes of the inhabitants and parishioners. Before Lord Hardwicke there were several questions raised, but the material questions which he did consider were "in whom the right of election is, and what are the qualifications of the electors; and this tends to the general point of establishing the right by a decree of this court and also to the question in regard to Mr. Doughty." Then he proceeds with a definition and description of the two words "parishioner" and "inhabitant," upon which I need not now dwell, and concludes that the right is universal in the parishioners and inhabitants. As to the election of Mr. Doughty he says "If according to the right, there is no doubt of it; but suppose it was not according to the right of election, Mr. Doughty on the poll had a majority of 286, and on the scrutiny they have gone into no proof as to the merits of the election or how the majority stood upon the right of the election; and therefore, if it had been in the housekeepers paying church and poor, I could not set aside the election as they have not gone into the proof upon the merits, nor turn Mr. Doughty out as he is in possession." Then he declines to direct an issue for the reasons which he gives. What I have to consider in this case in the first instance is whether the proceedings at the last election are such as the law requires, and I do not hesitate to say that the conduct of the churchwardens, however well intended, or however impartial it may have been according to their notions of impartiality, has been at least erroneous. The right of the parishioners after the judgment I have referred to is not to be questioned, and the only way in which that right can be asserted, and the only way in which those wishes can be expressed, is by calling public meetings. The churchwardens are the officers upon whom the duty of calling those public meetings rests. They have endeavoured to discharge that duty, they have exercised that authority which the law vests in them, and they have called the several meetings which have been mentioned. Now the first meeting is stated in the statement of claim, admitted by the statement of defence, and proved by the evidence, for, although great difference of opinion prevails among the witnesses who have been called, there is no substantial question of fact at issue. The question is one of law only. A meeting took place on the 28th July, when one of the churchwardens, as was right, was in the chair, and it was attended by a very considerable number of the ratepayers of the parish. Then, the churchwardens having called that meeting, the minute book containing the proceedings at that meeting is put in evidence, and it certainly presents to me a somewhat strange appearance. The notice convening the meeting is read, and then is entered a letter and opinion which had been laid before the churchwardens, but which it is admitted and proved was not communicated to the meeting. To what end that should be entered upon the minutes, unless for the purpose of communication to the persons assembled at the meeting, I have not heard a suggestion. These documents being entered upon the minutes of the meeting, any body, without explanation, would conclude that they were read to the meeting, or that the meeting was apprised of the effect and tenor of them, and it would be the churchwarden's reason, if not his justification, for expressing any opinion that he did express. But it is admitted that they were not communicated. It is then moved and seconded that Monday, the 30th Aug., be fixed for the nomination of the candidates, and it was then moved as an amendment, that Monday, the 30th Aug. at 7 o'clock, should be fixed (the difference being between the hours of six and seven o'clock) for the nomination of candidates, which amendment was put and carried. It is next moved by Mr. Brighty that there should be a one day's poll only from 8 a.m. to 8 p.m., which motion was put and lost. The chairman then intimated that there would be three days' poll, as usual, which was unanimously agreed to. It was next moved by Mr. Thompson that it be left to the churchwardens to make all necessary arrangements for carrying out the election, and then there was a vote of thanks and the meeting adjourned. Now, I say again, I can conceive no reason, and certainly none has been suggested to me either in the evidence or during the course of the argument, why that advice which the churchwardens had very properly taken from their legal assistant, Mr. Boulton, was not communicated to the meeting. Possibly if it had been communicated to the meeting, some of the other proceedings would not have been taken. Persons would have been either satisfied or dissatisfied with the suggestions contained in Mr. Boulton's letters. They had no opportunity given to them by the churchwardens—who claim for themselves, and who to a certain extent are justified in claiming, the exercise of perfect impartiality, and a sincere desire to meet the wishes of the parishioners—of dissenting from it. No mention whatever is made of it, but, it being resolved that it should be left to the churchwardens to make all necessary arrangements for carrying out the election, by the course of the argument, and still more by what is said by the churchwardens themselves in their examination and by some of their witnesses, it seems now to have been concluded that when the meeting once resolved that all the necessary arrangements for carrying out the election should be left to the churchwardens, it was intended they should have supreme authority to do whatever they thought fit in the matter; but that is not the construction I should put upon it. Even if the letters of Mr. Boulton had been communicated, that is not the construction I should have put upon it. The words do not mean that. They mean that the churchwardens are to regulate the manner of carrying out the election. That is all that they have to do—they are to carry it out still at the wish and will of the parishioners and inhabitants. That is put beyond all doubt and question, and it is not in the power of the churchwardens now to say that inasmuch as that resolution which I have last read may have been come to, the power of the parishioners and inhabitants to control and regulate the election was exhausted and gone, and that they could not, to use a phrase which some of the gentlemen used, upset that resolution. That, as I have said, was an afterthought, because the churchwardens did not then take that view of the subject. I pass over the meeting of the 11th Aug. On the 25th Aug. a meeting was held of which there is no entry in this book. The meeting of the 28th July was the first meeting, and then the meeting of the 30th Aug. was fixed by the minute which I just now read. Upon that occasion Mr. Brighty moved that motion, and it was lost upon a division. The statement in the claim is, "that the chairman promised to be guided by precedent and to take a legal opinion upon the subject, whereupon the motion was negatived," and the evidence establishes that fact. In considering the impartiality of the churchwardens, I ask what was the meaning of that? The chairman knew of the nature of Mr. Brighty's proposition that there should be only one day's polling from 8 to 8, and he declined to adopt it, but promised to be guided by precedent and to take a legal opinion upon the subject, and thereupon the motion was negatived, and it was negatived for that reason. That is the meeting of the 28th July. Then the parishioners, not satisfied with what had taken place, and not thinking that they had exhausted their powers, presented a requisition to the churchwardens, urging them to call a meeting of the 11th Aug., which was accordingly done. Then a second requisition is signed and is addressed to the churchwardens, and is accepted and acted upon by them, and they in pursuance of that requisition, and in discharge of their duty, call a meeting for the 25th Aug. The requisition is this:—"The ratepayers request the churchwardens to call a public meeting to consider in the interests of the public, the best mode of conducting the forthcoming election for the vicar." It then states certain private resolutions which had been carried at the house of a Mr. Von Joel. Then the churchwardens, in the exercise of their functions, do this: They publish an advertisement in these terms—"Pursuant to the above requisition we hereby convene a public meeting of the parishioners and inhabitants to be held in the Parochial School Rooms on Wednesday, the 25th Aug. at 7 o'clock precisely, to consider the questions referred to in such requisition." Can the churchwardens who have so acted be heard now to say that, the resolution of the 28th July having reposed in them the authority or power to regulate the forthcoming election, there was an end of the matter, and that that resolution could never be altered, when they themselves call a public meeting to consider the questions referred to in such requisition? The meeting takes place on the 25th Aug. Mr. Goad was present, but Mr. Culver was absent. Mr. Goad, however, declined to take the chair, and another person was appointed to the chair by a perfectly regular and proper proceeding, and then resolutions are passed. Now those resolutions are of the utmost importance to the case as stated by the plaintiffs. The original meeting stood fixed under the resolution of the 25th July, for the 30th Aug., and in the meantime this meeting takes place, at which these resolutions are moved and carried. [His Lordship read the resolutions.] Now this was a meeting convened by the churchwardens themselves. Their non-attendance at that meeting did not destroy the validity of the meeting. There was no appearance by them to protest against the resolutions which should then be carried, and no intimation to the parishioners that they did not feel themselves bound, as by issuing that placard they had confessed they were bound, to consider the wishes of the parishioners expressed at that meeting with respect to the election. The resolutions were immediately afterwards transmitted to the churchwardens. Then comes the 30th Aug., the day to which by the vote of the 28th July the meeting had been adjourned, but in the meantime this duly convened meeting had been called, and resolutions as to the legality or propriety of which I have heard no suggestion, excepting the one urged by Sir H. Jackson respecting the ballot, as to which I will say a word by-and-by, had been passed. [His Lordship then considered the resolution as to the hours of polling, and held that it was consistent with the evidence and reasonable in itself, that 9 o'clock was a convenient hour up to which the voting places should be kept open; and continued.] With these resolutions in their hands the churchwardens take the opinion of a learned counsel. Upon what statement that opinion was procured I have no sort of evidence. The case has been called for and has not been produced, but the opinion has been produced and it recommends the churchwardens to ignore the resolutions of the 25th Aug. It is no part of my business or intention to throw any doubt upon the value of that opinion, but I can conceive no reason drawn from the facts as they are in evidence why the churchwardens who had convened that meeting should ignore what was done at that meeting, which was of their own creation. Nevertheless they did, and having on the 27th Aug. procured the opinion upon which they say they acted, then comes the 30th Aug., to which day the meeting of the 28th July had been adjourned, and then this takes place: The candidates having been heard and a show of hands being taken, a poll was demanded by the friends of Mr. Rose, and then it was resolved that the poll should be open until 8 o'clock at the vestry hall, and that such poll should continue for three days as previously arranged. The churchwardens who had promised to take a legal opinion, and who had prevented the meeting on the 28th July going further than it had gone in consequence of that promise made by them, having taken that opinion, do not upon this occasion communicate that opinion to the meeting, do not give any information whatever to the meeting, but simply come to the resolution that the poll shall be for three days as previously arranged, and that is all that takes place at that meeting except only this that the persons whom the present plaintiff represents were very desirous of having the subject in which they were interested brought before that meeting, and Mr. Culver himself in his evidence says that he prevented that. He did it because, having been furnished with a copy of the intended resolutions, he said he knew its object was to upset what had been done on the 28th July. He says "I rose from the chair when Mr. Brighty was moving the resolutions because I thought he was out of order." Why was he out of order? It was a meeting of the parishioners and inhabitants, and every parishioner and inhabitant had a right to move for anything he liked and if it was seconded it ought to have been put to the vote. But the churchwarden's words are these "I rose from the chair when Mr. Brighty was moving, because I thought he was out of order. The meeting being for nomination I left the chair when that was done." But the churchwarden made a mistake if he thought it was not his duty while he was in the chair to listen to any motion that was made and put it when it was seconded. What right had the chairman by leaving the chair to put an end to a meeting duly convened? Leaving the chair did not put an end to the meeting. It is said that there was a vote of thanks then moved and seconded, but whether anybody in the uproar that took place heard the gentlemen who moved and seconded it is a matter which is left in considerable doubt. That nothing else was done by the chairman is quite clear. The minute in the vestry book announces that "a vote of thanks having been passed to Mr. Culver for his services in the chair, the meeting adjourned." How could the meeting adjourn except upon a resolution? Whoever moved that the meeting should be adjourned, the meeting did not adjourn, and the entry in the minute book is wholly erroneous. It is not the fact that there was any resolution to adjourn the meeting. On the contrary the facts proved are that Mr. Culver having left the chair when Mr. Brighty was moving, thought he had put an end to the meeting, and therefore the vestry clerk (Mr. Paget) takes down not a word of what takes place after that. Although he knew that other resolutions were being put and that other proceedings were being carried on, he thinks that it was not his duty to pay any attention to them because he was not authorised or required by the chairman to do so. But he had been authorised by the chairman to convene that meeting and he did it, and to attend and he did attend, and to record the proceedings and he did, until, either of his own will or by the direction of Mr. Culver, he concluded that the meeting was at an end, which he did as soon as the nomination was effected. Anything more utterly irregular than that cannot be conceived. Can anybody say that the parishioners and inhabitants who had come there for the purpose of having discussed, at least, the subject of the resolutions which they had transmitted to the churchwardens, avowing and announcing their intention, had a fair mode of expressing their wishes, they being the only persons whose wishes are to be attended to, because the chairman of that meeting being a churchwarden chooses to get up from his chair, as he says, because he saw that Mr. Brighty was moving and because he thought he was out of order, and so put an end to the meeting? Is that a regular proceeding? If the court were to say that what was done was justifiable the court would constitute the churchwardens owners of the advowson which is in the hands of the parishioners and inhabitants. I will not go into the question with regard to what extent the churchwardens were partisans or friends of Mr. Rose, but they cannot deny and nobody has denied that the conduct they pursued at that meeting did prevent the parishioners and inhabitants, from whom alone they lawfully could take their directions, from expressing their wishes; and that in my opinion is clear beyond all possibility of doubt. So that as far as the regularity or legality of the proceedings go, I am convinced that they were wholly illegal and irregular. But that by no means disposes of the question. There remains the election itself to be considered. Apprised of this illegality and irregularity as these persons who are interested in this present suit were, what course did they pursue? It was open to them to attend at the election to vote and to see that nobody voted who was not entitled to vote—in short to exercise every right which the parishioners and inhabitants have in an election. The election goes on, it is proved, in a peaceable, orderly, and quiet manner and the poll is open for three days without objection, without check, and without any proceedings being taken, which might well have been taken then just as readily as at a later period, and terminates in the election of Mr. Rose by a very considerable majority. Well, what is the law that I have to apply to that state of circumstances? Having discharged what I conceive to be my duty by saying that the conduct of the churchwardens on the 30th Aug. was entirely erroneous, and therefore illegal, is it for that reason that I am to set aside the election which has been come to by a very considerable number of the inhabitants, and in which it has not been shown or pretended that any man was prevented from voting, or that any obstacle or difficulty was presented to his voting? In my opinion that is not the law as Lord Hardwicke laid it down in Attorney-General v. Rutter. That is not the law as has been most distinctly decided in the two cases which were mentioned by Mr. Everitt in the course of his argument. The first of those two cases was the case of Reg. v. The Parishioners of St. Mary, Lambeth (sup.) where the right of the electors was established that every rated inhabitant whether present at the vestry or not "has a right to come in and vote, and the closing of the vestry doors during the poll so as to exclude voters is illegal." I have already said that in my opinion the conduct of the churchwardens is illegal. The facts of that case were [His Lordship read them], and the judgment of the court was this: "Although there is no doubt whatever as to the law of the case, it does not appear on the affidavit that any single elector was prevented from voting. If the effect of closing the doors had been to exclude any one who had a right to vote, and an intention of exercising that right, the case would have assumed a different aspect, but it does not at all appear that if the whole parish had been present, the result of the election would have been different." And the judgment of Littledale, J., is to the same effect. The other case was Ex parte Mawby (sup.) "where, upon the election of a churchwarden, the chairman of the vestry meeting had rejected votes which were alleged to be admissible, but it did not appear that the rejection had caused any difference in the result, the court refused to grant a mandamus ordering a fresh election, though the persons whose votes had been rejected were parties to the application." The judgment there is in very short and explicit terms. Lord Campbell says, "I do not undertake to say what can be done in this case, but clearly we cannot issue a mandamus." Then it speaks as to this case having gone on a technical ground; but Coleridge, J., says, "I agree that this is a safe ground of decision in this case. The election is not shown to be void, and it does not appear that the result would have been altered by the admission of the votes." And Crompton, J., says (Erle, J., concurring), "It is clear that the mere rejection of votes furnishes no ground for interfering by mandamus when it does not appear that the election has not been vitiated." That is a case upon mandamus, but the principle of law is exactly the same in that case as in this. If upon the evidence there had been any such proof as seems to have been required in the two cases at common law, and which would be required in any case to establish a grievance in order to justify the complaint, and more than that to justify the administering of the relief which this statement of claim calls for, it must be shown that there has been some wrong done to the persons in whose behalf the present plaintiff moves, and there has not been a particle of evidence upon that subject. On the authority of those two cases to which I have referred, and still more on the authority of Attorney-General v. Parker, before Lord Hardwicke, I am of opinion that I can grant no relief upon this action. If the ratepayers and parishioners have been prevented from exercising what was their right, and which they might have exercised I do not doubt, but they were prevented by their own conduct, because, although they were prevented by the churchwardens from holding a meeting by ballot, and from polling at various places, that is all they were prevented from doing, and the right of voting at the election of the clergyman they were not prevented from exercising at all. But some of them have declined to vote. I do not know what motives may have induced them not to vote, or what proceedings they may have contemplated at that time, but still there is certainly no particle of evidence that would justify me in coming to the conclusion that if every man who is interested with the plaintiff in this suit had declined to vote, and was not prevented by what was done, that, therefore, he would be entitled to the relief he asks by this action; because, although he could not have it modo et formâ, according to his own wishes, he had it abundantly, plentifully, and might have exercised it peaceably without any kind of interruption. Well now I have a few words to say upon what formed the subject of Sir H. Jackson's argument in this case, when he said that if the plaintiff and the persons who concur in his views had had their own way and had established an election by ballot, that would have been wholly illegal. I cannot follow that at all, and having attended to the authorities which were referred to I cannot conceive anything to justify that assertion. The case of Faulkner v. Elger only decides that an election by ballot is not legal because it does not afford the opportunity of a scrutiny, and Lord Eldon echoes the same opinion, though he seems to have hesitated very much about it. But he refers to the fact that there are societies and institutions in this country in which for centuries past the mode of election by ballot had been practised, so that it was common enough. Acts of Parliament regulating Municipal and Parliamentary election which have introduced voting by ballot have at the same time introduced regulations which have freed voting by ballot from the objections which were taken in Faulkner v. Elger. Now you can trace with perfect accuracy by the machinery which is adopted the persons who vote and everything that is necessary to insure the validity of the vote. Is there anything by which the parishioners of Clerkenwell, not intending to adopt those statutes as statutes, not requiring or insisting that the statutes gave them this right—but being the persons in whom the right and duty of electing is vested by law—are prevented from adopting these improvements which have taken place in our generation? They find a more useful and efficacious mode of voting than that which their forefathers practised, and therefore they say, "We choose to adopt the ballot." In my opinion there is nothing invalid in the resolution that this election should be carried out by ballot. When it is said that the ancient custom and usage of this parish has been to have open polling, I do not find any foundation for that argument. There is no ancient custom which imposes, or which amounts to a binding authority, upon the parishioners at this day. They are as free as their ancestors to prescribe the regulations, provided they are lawful. They are free to say that one or two hundred years ago a certain custom or habit prevailed of electing in a particular way, but they are satisfied that that is not now a judicious mode of exercising their unquestionable rights, and therefore they will resolve to exercise it in a different way. That, in my opinion, they are perfectly entitled to do. Being therefore of opinion that the resolutions which had been proposed on 30th Aug., and which were intercepted by the mere wrongful act of the churchwarden, who ran from his chair when the motion was being put, were perfectly valid, and being of opinion that the conduct of the churchwarden was wholly erroneous, I think that the election which afterwards took place was open to objection on that score. But the election having taken place, and there being no evidence whatever that it was improperly conducted, or that any voter was prevented from recording his vote in his own way, I think it right that this action should be dismissed. I cannot however dismiss it with costs. I cannot give the churchwardens costs because in my opinion they have not discharged their plain duty properly. I cannot give the trustees costs because they have taken part with the churchwardens, and have thrown in their lot with them, and as far as I can judge and see do not add one shilling to the costs of the action. Nor can I give costs to Mr. Rose. If he had relied on the validity of his election well and good. He might have done so, but he has made himself a partisan in the discussion of this matter, the legality of which I have been considering, and against the legality of which I have decided. Therefore, I can make no order as to costs. The decree, therefore, will be, and the judgment is, to dismiss this action without costs.

SHAW v. THOMPSON.

DIVISIONAL COURT FOR APPEALS FROM INFERIOR COURTS.

Reported by M. W. McKELLAR, J. M. LELY, and R. H. AMPELLETT, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Thursday, April 27, 1876.

VAN MINING COMPANY LIMITED (apps.) v. CHURCHWARDENS OF LLANIDLOES (resps.).

Rating of lead mine—Different leases—Reservation in kind—37 & 38 Vict. c. 54, s. 13.

The appellants occupied and worked a lead mine under three leases: by one a royalty of one fourteenth of the minerals obtained under it, when ready for smelting and merchantable on the banks of the works, was reserved to the lessor, or at his option in lieu thereof the full value in money; by the second and third the lessor, who was a different person from the lessor of the first lease, had a reservation for the time being only in money. The appellants were rated for the machinery and buildings occupied for the purposes of the mine, and the lessor of the first lease for the mine and the royalty or dues wholly reserved in kind.

Held, upon appeal, that this was a case within the exemption of the Rating Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 54), s. 13; that the previous rating clauses as to mines did not apply to it; and that the rate was properly made.

THIS was a special case stated for the opinion of this court under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 11.

The appellants are the Van Mining Company (Limited), and the Most Honourable the Marquis of Londonderry.

The respondents are the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of the parish of Llanidloes and their assistant overseer, and the assessment committee of the Newtown and Llanidloes Union, in the county of Montgomery.

The assessment committee of the Newtown and Llanidloes Union in June 1875 made an assessment, upon which the overseers of the poor of the parish of Llanidloes on the 3rd July 1875 made the following poor rate:—

PARISH OF LLANIDLOES—RATE MADE IN THE MONTH OF JULY, 1875.

No.	Name of Occupier.	Name of Owner.	Description of Property Rated.	Name or Situation of Property Rated.	Estimated Extent.	Gross Estimated Rental.	Rateable Value.	Rate at 1s. in the Pound.

The present appeal is from the said assessment and rate.

The Van Mining Company (Limited) are the lessees of certain lead mines known as the Van Mines, situate in the parish of Llanidloes, and in the above mentioned union and county.

These mines are occupied and worked by the Van Mining Company (Limited), under the three following leases, copies of which were in the appendix marked respectively A, B, and C.

The first lease dated 11th April 1864 is from Earl and Countess Vane to Messrs. Edward Morris and Joseph Howell, which by subsequent assignments has become and is now the property of the appellants, the Van Mining Company (Limited), and is the one marked A in the appendix.

The reddendum in this lease is the royalty of one full fourteenth part or share of the minerals had or obtained under the said lease when ready for smelting and merchantable on the banks of the said works, or at the option of the lessors in lieu thereof the full value thereof in money.

The second lease, dated 25th March 1870, is from Sir Watkin Williams Wynn, Bart. to the Van Mining Company (Limited), and is the one marked B in the appendix.

MAG. CAM.—VOL X

The reddendum in this lease is wholly in money.

The third lease, dated 29th Sept. 1871, is from Sir Watkins Williams Wynn, Bart., to the Van Mining Company (Limited), and is the one marked C in the appendix.

The reddendum in this lease is a minimum dead rent of 100l. in money, and also one-tenth of the ores and minerals which should be got and raised out of the premises—or, at the option of the lessor, the value thereof in money—after the same should have been washed, dressed, and made merchantable.

The appellants have not raised any ores or minerals out of the premises contained in this lease, but have and are working under the same. They also work a quarry, and have erected a magazine for dynamite thereon, and the same intersects and forms the only means of passage from one part to another of the premises held under lease A.

The above-mentioned leases, and the facts mentioned in the recitals, form part of this case.

The watercourse and reservoir mentioned in the lease marked B are occupied with and in connection with and for the purposes of the Van Mine only, but are not comprised within the boundaries of lease A.

The rents reserved by these leases have always been paid in money.

The mines are and always have been worked by means of a shaft or shafts, and the ore is obtained wholly from underground workings. The shafts are sunk on part of the land comprised within the boundaries of lease A, and on the said lands the engine houses and other buildings and works connected with the Van Mines are constructed.

On the land comprised within the boundaries of lease B some buildings have been erected, and a reservoir constructed, from which reservoir the water is conveyed by watercourses to the mine.

The appellants have never before been assessed or rated in respect of this mine, nor the royalty or dues thereof, nor for the machinery or works in connection with it.

The respondents contend that the appellant, the Marquis of Londonderry, is liable to be assessed and rated under 43 Eliz. c. 2, as for royalty or dues wholly reserved in kind, and not under the Rating Act of 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 54); and they further contend that the appellants, the Van Mining Company, are liable to be assessed under the statute 43 Eliz. c. 2 for the surface lands comprised in the lease B, and for the shafts, buildings, machinery, reservoir, and watercourses connected with the Van Mine; and they have so assessed and rated them accordingly.

The appellants contend that the Van Mine should be assessed and rated under the estimate of value, and in the manner prescribed by the Rating Act of 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 54), and not under 43 Eliz. c. 2; and the Marquis of Londonderry, one of the appellants, contends that he is not liable to be assessed or rated as occupier of the Van Mine or the royalty or dues thereof.

The question for the opinion of the court is: Whether under the facts and documents above set forth the premises mentioned in the said leases or any and which of them respectively should be assessed and rated under 43 Eliz. c. 2, or the Rating Act of 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 54), or on what principle the same should be assessed and rated.

If the court should be of opinion that the above assessment and rate are wrong in law, the decision of this court is to be in favour of the appellants, and judgment of allowance of the said appeal and for such costs as the court shall adjudge, and for the amendment of the said assessment and rate, and that the said amendment shall be entered at the sessions accordingly; but if the court should be of the contrary opinion, its decision is to be in favour of the respondents, and judgment for dismissing the appeal and for such costs as the court shall adjudge is to be entered at the sessions accordingly.

The material part of lease A was that by which the lessors demised to the lessees the premises as follows:

To have and to hold, use, exercise, work, and enjoy the said mines and minerals, and all and singular the liberties, powers, privileges, authorities, and premises, hereinbefore expressed to be hereby demised and granted unto the said lessees, their executors, administrators, and assigns from the 29th Sept. 1863 for the full end and term of twenty-one years from thence next ensuing and fully to be complete and ended, yielding and rendering therefore yearly and every year at the times and in the manner hereinafter mentioned during the continuance of this demise unto the said lessors and to the person or persons for the time being entitled to the reversion or remainder of the premises hereby demised immediately expectant on the determination of the said term hereby granted the royalty of one full fourteenth part or share, the whole into fourteen equal parts or shares to be divided or considered as divided, of all and singular the ores, mines, and minerals which shall be had or obtained out of or from the said premises hereby demised or any part thereof, the same to be rendered on the banks of the said works when ready for smelting and merchantable at such time or times as hereinafter covenanted in that behalf, or otherwise at the option of the said lessors and the person or persons entitled as aforesaid, yielding and paying at the times and in the manner hereinafter mentioned in lieu of the said last mentioned rent or royalty unto the said lessors and to the person or persons entitled to the immediate reversions or remainder as aforesaid, the full value in money of such one fourteenth part or share on the bank of the said works of all such ores, mines, and minerals, and other matters as shall be raised and gotten out of the said premises, and rendered ready for smelting and merchantable as aforesaid at such time or times as hereinafter covenanted in that behalf, such rendering and delivering and payments to be respectively clear of all costs, and expenses, or losses of and attending the raising, getting, making ready for smelting, rendering, selling, and disposing of the said ores, mines, and minerals, and other matters and produce, and of all taxes, charges, and assessments whatsoever, save and except the landlord's tax.

Manisty, Q.C. (with him Crompton) argued for the appellants.—By sect. 3 of the Rating Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 54), the Poor Rate Acts are extended to certain "hereditaments in like manner as if they were mentioned in the recited Act," viz., 43 Eliz. c. 2. Amongst other hereditaments, "(3) To mines of every kind not mentioned in the recited Act." And by section 7, "Where a tin, lead, or copper mine is occupied under a lease or leases granted without fine, on a reservation wholly or partly of dues or rent, the gross value of the mine shall be taken to be the annual amount of the whole of the dues payable in respect thereof during the year ending on the 31st December preceding the date at which the valuation list is made, in addition to the annual amount of any fixed rent reserved for the same which may not be paid or satisfied by such dues. The rateable annual value of such mine shall be the same as the gross value thereof, except that where the person receiving the dues or rent is liable for repairs, insurance, or other expenses necessary to maintain the mine in a state to command the annual amount of dues or rent, the average annual cost of the repairs, insurance, and other expenses for which he is so liable shall be deducted from the gross value for the purpose of calculating the rateable value. In the following cases, namely, First, where any such mine is occupied under a lease granted wholly or partly on a fine; secondly, where any such mine is occupied and worked by the owner; and thirdly, in the case of any other such mine which is not excepted from the provisions of this Act, and to which the foregoing provisions of this section do not apply, the gross and rateable annual value of the mine shall be taken to be the annual amount of the dues, or dues and rent, at which the mine might be reasonably expected to let without fine on a lease of the ordinary duration, according to the usage of the country, if the tenant undertook to pay all tenants' rates and taxes and tithe rentcharge, and also the repairs, insurance, and other expenses necessary to maintain the mine in a state to command such annual amount of dues, or dues and rent. the time being of any tin, lead, or copper mine, or any of them, may, if the overseers or other rating authority think fit, be rated as the occupier thereof. In this section, the term 'mine' when a mine is occupied under a lease, includes the underground workings, and the engines, machinery, workshops, tramways, and other plant, buildings (not being dwelling houses), and works and surface of land occupied in connexion with and for the purposes of the mine, and situate within the boundaries of the land comprised in the lease or leases under which the dues or dues and rent are payable or reserved: the term 'dues' means dues, royalty, or toll, either in money or partly in money and partly in kind; and the amount of dues which are reserved in kind means the value of such dues: the term 'lease' means lease or sett, or licence to work, or agreement for a lease or sett, or licence to work: the term 'fine' means fine, premium, or foregift, or other payment or consideration in the nature thereof." By sect. 8, "Where any poor or other local rate which at the commencement of this Act any lessee, licensee, or grantee of a mine is exempt from being rated to in respect of such mine becomes payable by him in respect of such mine during the continuance of his lease, grant, or licence, or before the arrival of the period at which the amount of the rent, royalty, or dues is liable to revision or readjustment, he may (unless he has specifically contracted to pay such rate in the event of the abolition of the said exemption) deduct from any rent, royalty, or dues payable by him, one half of any such rate paid by him: provided that he shall not deduct any sum exceeding what one half of the rate in the pound of such poor or other local rate would amount to, if calculated upon the rent, royalty, or dues so payable by him." By sect. 13, "Nothing in this Act shall apply to a mine of which the royalty or dues are for the time being wholly reserved in kind, or to the owner or occupier thereof." The sole question in this case is whether sect. 13 applies to it or not. [BRAMWELL, B.—If it were not for leases B and C, sect. 13 would, I presume, admittedly apply.] Subject to a further question whether the reservation in lease A is in kind. But this is a mine held under leases, and sect. 13 does not apply to it for that reason; there are express provisions in the Rating Act applicable to mines held under several leases, e.g., sect. 7. As to the reservation, it is either in kind or money, at the option of the landlord. [BRAMWELL, B.—Could they before this Act have caught the landlord upon this reservation? Mellor, Q.C.—Yes; upon the authority of Rez v. St. Austell (5 B. & Ald. 693).] The old law has been much questioned recently: (see Guest v. East Dean, L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 331; Kittow v. Liskeard Union, 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 601.) By affirming this rate the court would be carrying the old principle further than it has been carried hitherto, although there is now a new system for rating mines.

Mellor, Q.C. (with him Channell) appeared for the respondents.

BRAMWELL, B.—We need not trouble you, Mr. Mellor. It seems to me that sect. 13 of the Rating Act 1874 is applicable to this case, and excludes these premises from being rated under the new system established by that Act. I think, too, it is reasonable that the old system should here apply.

It was a curious device by which the rating authorities got over the exemption of mines, which was maintained on the ground of their not being mentioned in the Act of Elizabeth; but it was established law, and Lord Londonderry was liable to be rated before this recent statute. Although he might to some extent be reached by sect. 8, yet I think he clearly comes within sect. 13, which is a reasonable provision to prevent the existing obligations of parties from being altered. The first question which arises under that section is whether this is "a mine" to which the reservation applies. I think it is, for of all the premises rated the only taking of ore is from that part which is leased from Lord Londonderry and liable to the reservation. Further, I think, if this be not so, the part held under lease A must be taken as a separate holding, which would come to the same thing. But another objection has been taken by Mr. Manisty, that this case does not come within the other words of the section; it is necessary that "the royalty or dues are for the time being wholly reserved in kind." Now, in the first place, it is said that the royalty cannot be in kind when the material has first to be made ready for smelting and merchantable; and in the next, that the alternative option of the lessor to take the value in money is enough to put the appellants out of the reach of the 13th section. That section, however, was clearly intended to cover all cases in which rateability previously existed; and the device by which such rateability was established, although it was so stretched as to become occasionally difficult to comprehend, applied to such a case as this. The case of Rez v. St. Austell (5 B. & Ald. 693) was open to both these objections; and, although they are not specifically alluded to in the judgments, they must have been considered. That judgment, therefore, shows that under such circumstances the landlord could be got at for rating purposes, and it must govern our conclusion in this case. I think Lord Londonderry comes properly within the application of sect. 13, and the appellants were rightly rated. Our judgment will be for the respondents.

MELLOR, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. As to sect. 13, whether Rez v. St. Austell was right or not, that principle of rating has been established a long time, and it was the intention of the new Act to reserve all previously rated mines from its application. The rate must be affirmed.

DENMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion.

BLAKE v. BEECH.

Gaming house—Statutes 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, s. 3 and 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119, s. 3—Conviction of justices without information or summons.

By 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, s. 3, a justice of the peace, on complaint made before him on oath that there is reason to suspect any house, room, or place of being kept or used as a gaming house, may give authority by special warrant under his hand, to any constables to enter such house, room, or place, and, if necessary, to use force for making such entry, and to arrest all persons found therein. By 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119, s. 3, any owner, or occupier, or persons having the management of any house, &c., and who use it for the purpose of betting, are liable on summary conviction before two justices to a penalty not exceeding one hundred pounds, and on the non-payment thereof, or in the first instance may be committed to prison with or without hard labour for any period not exceeding six months. And by sect. 11 power is conferred upon justices to issue a warrant authorising constables to enter any house, office, room, or place kept and used as a betting house or office, and to arrest persons found therein.

The respondent, who was the chief constable for the borough of Bolton, laid a complaint upon oath before a justice of the peace acting for the borough that a house was kept or used as a common gaming house within the meaning of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 110. The justice thereupon issued his warrant, and authorised the constables to enter into the house and to arrest all persons found therein. By virtue of this warrant the appellant, who was found in the house, was arrested, brought before two justices, and charged under 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119, as a person who had the management of a room used for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto. No information was laid, nor was any summons issued to the appellant embodying the substance of such information. The appellant's solicitors objected to the hearing and determination of the charge by the justices on the ground that in the absence of such information and summons the proceedings were void. The justices, however, overruled the objection, and after hearing the evidence convicted the appellant.

Held by Cleasby, B. and Grove, J. (Field, J. dissentiente), that the information and summons were necessary, and that the conviction was therefore bad.

This was a case stated under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

1. At a petty sessions holden at the borough of Bolton, on the 23rd Oct. 1875, Robert Blake, the above-named appellant was brought before us with other persons by virtue of a warrant granted by William Henry Wright, Esq., one of Her Majesty's justices of the peace acting in and for the said borough under the authority of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119, an Act for the suppression of betting houses, the appellant and the other persons being found in a certain house within the said borough, alleged to be used for the purpose of betting upon horse races which warrant was in the words following:

Borough of Bolton, in the county of Lancashire to wit. —To the constables of the borough of Bolton, in the said county and to other peace officers in the county aforesaid, Whereas it appears to me, William Henry Wright, Esq., one of the justices of our Lady the Queen, assigned to keep the peace in the said borough, by the information on oath of Thomas Beech, of the said borough, chief constable, that the house known as the "Angel" situate in Churchgate, in Great Bolton, in the said borough, is kept or used as a common gaming house within the meaning of an Act passed in the 8th & 9th years of the reign of the Her present Majesty, intituled "An Act to amend the law concerning games and wagers," this is, therefore, in the name of our Lady the Queen to require you, with such assistants you may find necessary, to enter into the said house, and if necessary to use force for making such entry whether by breaking doors or otherwise and to arrest, search, and bring before me or other of the justices of our Lady the Queen assigned to keep the peace within the borough, all such persons found therein and to seize all lists, cards, or other documents relating to racing or betting found in such house or premises, to be dealt with according to law, and for so doing this shall be your warrant. Given under my hand and seal at Great Bolton, in the said borough this 15th Oct. 1875.

W. H. WRIGHT, J.P.

2. The appellant was charged under the 3rd section of the Act 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119, "For that he, the said appellant, on the 17th Oct. 1875, at the borough aforesaid, being the person having the management of a room in a certain house called the 'Angel' situate at Churchgate, Great Bolton, in the said borough, did use such room for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto upon certain events and contingencies, to wit certain horseraces, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided."

3. The evidence given before us was as follows, in regard to the appellant: On Sunday the 17th Oct. 1875, at about 7 o'clock in the evening, a number of police officers of the said borough, under the guidance of Thomas Beech, chief constable of the said borough, in pursuance of the warrant before mentioned, went to the public-house called the Angel, in Churchgate aforesaid, kept by James Putney Weston. In a room behind the vaults, which is not open to the street, they found the appellant and sixteen other persons. There are cushioned seats all round the room. At the time the police entered the appellant was on his feet at one end of the room. At the point where the appellant stood there is a seat with arms to it. Upon the officers entering the appellant put his hands behind him. His hands were seized, and he then dropped on the floor a book and a piece of paper. The book was picked up and was found to contain memorandums relating to betting. The house was searched, and the following were found therein: Three telegrams relating to horseraces, which were directed to the appellant, Weekly Turf Record, an ivory tablet, upon which the appellant stated would be found a few bets. In the pocket of a coat belonging to the appellant were found a betting list and four telegrams addressed to the appellant. Upon the appellant was found 17l. 17s. 10d. in money and a cheque for 5l. 2s.

4. The licensee of the house or usual landlord, Mr. J. P. Weston, was away from home at the time, but the appellant stated that he was the manager of the place.

5. Two of the persons, who were respectively named Simpson and Cullen, found in the room, also gave evidence. They had been arrested along with appellant, but, upon the application of the police, were discharged to enable them to become competent witnesses for the prosecution. One of them, Cullen, stated that on Sunday, the 17th Oct. 1875, he paid the appellant 3l. for money that he owed him in respect of a bet made on the Cæsarwitch race, which had then taken place some weeks previously; but there was no evidence that such bet had been made at the Angel. The other of them, Simpson, stated that on the same night he was in the said house and rooms and asked the appellant what he would lay against a horse called Sutton, and the appellant said he would lay 8 to 1. Witness said he would take 16 to 2, and the appellant said, "All right, I'll lay it you." The horse Sutton was to run in the

BLAKE v. BEECH.

[DIV. APP.]

Cambridgeshire race, which was to come off that week or next.

6. The appellant's attorney contended that under sect. 17 of the before-mentioned Act (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119) one calendar month's notice of action should have been given before taking the proceedings. That after the issuing of the aforesaid warrant an information ought to have been laid, and that a summons embodying the substance of such information ought to have been delivered to the appellant.

7. We, however, considered that the notice required by the 17th section had no application to the present proceedings. We also thought it was due to the defendants to have the information, but we did not think it was sufficient groundwork for discharge.

8. We found the charge proved against the appellant, and convicted him in the penalty of 100*l*.

9. The attorney for the appellant expressed himself dissatisfied with our determination, as being erroneous in point of law, and pursuant to the 2nd section of the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, duly applied to us in writing to state and sign a case setting forth the facts, and the ground of our determination as aforesaid for the opinion of this court, and the appellant duly entered into a recognizance as required by the said statute in that behalf.

The questions for the opinion of the court are: First, Whether under the said 17th section of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119, one calendar month's notice in writing of the proceedings should have been given to the appellant before prosecuting the same? Secondly, Whether after the issuing of the warrant as aforesaid, and apprehension of the parties, it was necessary to lay an information, and issue a summons to the appellant embodying the substance of such information? Thirdly, Whether the fact of the bet made by the appellant with Simpson upon the horse Sutton, as stated in the case, and the payment of 3*l*. by Cullen upon a past event was evidence sufficient to justify such conviction under the statute? Fourthly, Whether upon the facts stated we were justified in law in convicting the appellant?

If it is the opinion of the court that we were wrong in our decision then judgment to be given in favour of the appellant.

Baylis, Q.C. and Wheeler, for the appellant.

Arbuthnot for the respondents.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 11.—The judgment of Cleasby B. and Grove J. was delivered by CLEASBY, B.—We are not considering the liability of persons found in a gaming-house to give sureties under the statute 33 Hen. 8, but their liability to a penalty under the statute 16 & 17 Vict. The question which has been argued before us is that raised by the second question put to the court. It was admitted before us that the objection of the want of a proper information was taken before the case was proceeded with, and that there was nothing in the nature of waiver. The charge made against the appellant was an offence under the 16th and 17th Vict. for using a room of which he had the management for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto. By the 3rd section, owners or occupiers or persons having the management of a house or room who use it for the purpose of betting are liable to a penalty not exceeding 100*l*., and to be sent to prison for six calendar months in case of non-payment. And by the 4th section persons being owners or occupiers, or having the management of any house, rooms, &c., who receive money or other property as a deposit to be returned on the happening of a certain event, are liable to a penalty not exceeding 50*l*., and to three months imprisonment on nonpayment. It is quite clear that the regular way of recovering those penalties would be by information and summons in the ordinary way, with a warrant if summons should be ineffectual, and this appears from other parts of the Act. Now it is a rule that an information is essential as the foundation of such proceedings (Paley on Convictions, p. 34). And it is well settled by decided cases that where the information is for one offence, and, where the defendant appears, the charge against him is for another offence, the proceedings are irregular and a conviction cannot be upheld: (Marten v. Pridgeon, ubi sup.; Bey v. Brickhall, ubi sup.). Such an irregularity may be waived as appears by several cases, particularly Turner v. Postmaster-General (ubi sup.), but in that case the Lord Chief Justice says, "In strictness the appellant was entitled to insist that there should be an information and complaint in pursuance of sect. 62, but they waived that," &c. And in Reg. v. Shant (ubi sup.) which was an indictment for perjury, it appeared that in the proceedings in which the perjury was said to have been committed there was no proper information, but a regular summons issued purporting to be founded on a proper information, and the defendants appeared and the case was tried without any objection; the court thought the irregularity, if any, was waived, and the jurisdiction sufficiently appeared by the summons. The irregularity in the present case was not waived, but on the contrary, the objection taken, and the question is, whether there was a proper information. The only information was that on which the warrant was issued under the 8th & 9th Vict. c. 109, s. 4, viz., for keeping a common gaming-house. But the charge made when the defendant was brought up, was a charge which could not be made under the 8 & 9 Vict., and it was made under the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 11*½*. It appears to us that this made the proceeding irregular. It would be extremely inconvenient to enter in each case into the consideration of the similarity or dissimilarity of different charges. It is better, especially in cases involving an imprisonment for six months, to abide by the rule established by the authorities that the charge must be comprised within the information and not different from it. I not only accede to those authorities, as I feel bound to do, but I think they rest upon a foundation which cannot be questioned. If this court has any control over summary jurisdictions, it cannot be better exercised than by insisting that there shall not be such a departure from the first principles of criminal justice, as that a man shall be heard in his defence before he is convicted, as would be the result of allowing a man who happened to be in custody to be at once put upon his trial for any offence of which he could have had no notice before. If there is a regular information and summons, and the man is afterwards brought up on a warrant, the argument would not apply, because it was his own fault that he had not notice of the charge. And I do not think it any answer to this objection that the accused might, if he required it, apply for delay in order to obtain advice and prepare his defence. If he waives the want of information and summons, it would be the proper course to apply for delay, and it would be in the discretion of the justices to grant it or not, or to say to what extent they would grant it. And this court would not interfere with the exercise of that discretion in a proceeding which, by the assent of the man charged, was properly before the magistrates. But it is not a matter within the discretion of the magistrates whether a man shall be put on his trial without any proper preliminary proceedings, and when such a question is brought before this court I conceive one answer only can be given. A proper exercise of the magistrate's discretion in granting delay if applied for, would no doubt correct the erroneous conclusion of the magistrates in entertaining the case; but no one would contend that a man should be at the mercy of the magistrates in granting delay where he has a right not to be put upon his trial or that this court would not allow it. In the present case the question is very properly put to the court by the magistrates themselves. These observations apply with equal force to the other ground principally argued before us, viz., whether the warrant and arrest under the 11th section dispensed altogether with the necessity of a regular information and summons giving the defendant notice of the charge made against him; in other words, whether the 11th section is auxiliary to the regular proceedings by information and summons or a substitution for them. It is plain from several sections that the proceedings by information and summons are contemplated; for example, sect. 8 begins, "If any person convicted under this Act on information before justices, &c." But sect. 10 is more express on the subject; it provides that "If any person who has laid an information does not appear at the time when the defendant has been summoned to appear he shall be liable to pay costs," &c. This and other parts of the Act and general considerations of importance such as have been already referred to, seem to show that sect. 11 was not intended to introduce an exceptional procedure of having a man put on his trial without any previous notice. It is an important section, because, as the purpose for which the house, &c. was used would be difficult of proof, and the person managing the house not known, it enables the magistrates to have the person found on them brought up, so as to know who ought to be charged. The view above taken is of a strict and somewhat technical nature, but the question which we have considered has reference not to the proper conclusion of law upon a case properly tried, but to the mode of administering justice, and in administering justice summarily strict regularity must be observed. As regards the first question put to the court it is clear that no notice was necessary and the question was founded upon an obvious mistake, and it is sufficient answer to the other question to say—we think, for the above reasons, that appellant ought not to have been convicted.

DIV. AFF.]

BLAKE v. BEECH.

[DIV. AFF.]

FIELD, J.—This is a case stated by two justices of the peace for the borough of Bolton for the opinion of this court upon certain questions of law. The facts are that on the 15th Oct. 1875, the respondent, who is the chief constable for the borough, intending to act, and acting under the 11th section of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119 laid a complaint upon oath before a justice of the peace acting for the borough, that a house known as the Angel was "kept or used as a common gaming house within the meaning of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109," and thereupon the magistrate, intending to exercise the power conferred upon him by the same section, issued his warrant to the constables of the borough by which after hearing the complaint in the terms above stated he required the constable in the terms of the 11th section: "to enter into the house, &c., and to arrest, search, and bring before him or some other of the justices having jurisdiction, all such persons found therein and to seize all lists, cards, or other documents relating to racing or betting found in such house or premises to be dealt with according to law." On the execution of and by virtue of this warrant the appellant who was one of the persons found in the house was brought before the two justices who have stated the present case. When so brought the appellant was charged under the 3rd section of the first mentioned Act (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119) as "the person who" having the management of a room "in the Angel used it for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto." Upon this charge being so made, the appellant's solicitors objected to the hearing and determination of it on the ground (amongst others) that after the issuing of the warrant an information ought to have been laid, and that a summons embodying the substance of such information ought to have been delivered to the appellant, but the justices considering that the appellant was sufficiently informed of the charge intended to be made against him, declined to discharge him; and, no application having been made for any adjournment, they proceeded with the hearing and determination of the charge. Witnesses were thereupon called and examined and cross-examined, and at the close of the evidence the appellant's solicitors contended that he should be discharged upon the ground above stated; but the justices upon the evidence found the charge proved, convicted the appellant in the penalty of 100*l.*, and upon the appellant's application stated the present case for the opinion of this court upon (amongst other questions) the question whether such information and summons were necessary. I answer that question in the negative. The answer to it must depend upon the construction of the statute which creates the offence, and gives the justices authority to convict, controlled it may be by the provisions of the general law, and the statute regulating the procedure in such cases, the

BLAKE v. BEECH.

11 & 12 Vict. c. 43. Now in order to understand the provisions of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119, it is necessary first to observe that by the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, s. 8, a power was given to a justice of the peace upon complaint upon oath, that a house was suspected of being used as a common gaming house to issue a warrant (in the form given by that act) empowering a constable to enter the house and bring before a justice or justices the persons found therein, to be dealt with according to law. And by the 2nd section of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119 a house used for the purposes mentioned in that Act was declared to be a "common gaming house" within the meaning of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109. Further by sect. 11 the justices were empowered upon such complaint on oath as was made in this case to issue a warrant (which by the express terms of the section may be in the Form A. in the schedule to the 8 & 9 Vict.) to bring before the justices, not only the persons to be found therein to be dealt with according to law, but also in the terms of the warrant in this case all "lists, cards, or other documents relating to racing or betting found in such house or premises." The next thing to consider is what is the offence and what are the powers of the justices to deal with it. The offence in the present case is created by the 3rd section of the Act, and the jurisdiction of the justices to convict summarily is given by the same section. Now, no doubt in all cases of summary conviction by justices, an information or complaint is necessary as well as to the jurisdiction of the justices as also in order that the person charged may be informed of the charge intended to be made against him. But it is equally clear that such information or complaint may be instantaneous in point of time (Reg. v. Fuller, 1 Ld. Ray. 509) and need not be in writing or upon oath unless the statute requires it (Reg. v. Millard, 1 Dearsley 166). The statute in question in this case does, in fact, require that the warrant to search the premises and apprehend the persons found therein which is to be granted upon an ex parte application, shall be preceded by a complaint upon oath as is almost if not quite invariably the case where a magistrate is required upon an ex parte application to issue a warrant of apprehension. But in the present instance, inasmuch as the offence to be dealt with is one like gaming usually committed in secret, and under circumstances rendering it ordinarily difficult to say beforehand what the precise offence is and who are the persons who may be found committing it, the statute seems to me to substitute for the ordinarily requisite statement in an information or complaint of the specific person and offence, the general allegation of a suspicion that particular premises are used for the purpose of committing the offence in order that by means of the entry and seizure of cards and lists it may be discovered whether any and what offence has been committed, and who are the persons, if any, committing it. It must be observed that by the very terms of the warrant the person found in the suspected house (as the appellant was) is, upon being brought before the justices, to be dealt with according to law—i.e., as I read it, a complaint or charge is then to be made against him of some specific offence in order that he may know what he has to answer, and in order that the magistrates' jurisdiction to hear and determine it may thus be founded. Now in the present case it appears that the charge against the appellant was fully stated in his presence, and I have no doubt but that a minute of it was made in writing, although the statute does not require any writing at all. The appellant therefore might, if not prepared to answer the charge, have applied for an adjournment, and if he had done so, and the justices had refused it when it ought to have been granted, they would have done wrong. But I cannot think that any further information or complaint was required to give the justices jurisdiction to hear and power summarily to convict under the 3rd section. Then if such an information as is supposed was not required by the statute of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119, was it rendered necessary by the provisions of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43? I think not. No doubt under that statute where a summons is applied for, or a warrant is required to be issued either without or after a summons an information or complaint is necessary, but it seems to me that the special information provided for by the 17 & 18 Vict. fulfils the offices which such an information would fill and supersedes its necessity. The absence of a summons seems to me in like manner to form no valid objection to the conviction. The office of a summons is to inform the party to be charged of the offence which he has to meet, and when he is to meet it, and to require his attendance, and the current of modern authority is to show that if parties are before a magistrate, who has jurisdiction as to time and place, no summons or information is necessary: Reg. v. Millard (ubi sup.), Turner v. Postmaster-General (ubi sup.), Reg. v. Shaw (Leigh & Cave 579). In the present case the appellant was rightfully brought before the magistrates under the warrant of search and apprehension, and might, I think, be dealt with according to the charge preferred at that time, and of which the magistrates have found that he was sufficiently informed. We were pressed by the counsel for the appellant with the argument that the effect of supporting the present conviction would be that the appellant would have been brought before a magistrate upon one charge and convicted of another, and in support of this objection the case of Marten v. Pridgeon (ubi sup.) was quoted, and this argument has great weight with one of my learned brethren. But I cannot yield to it. The present conviction does not proceed upon any charge in the information; it proceeds upon the charge made at the hearing. It is to be observed that by express provision of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, ss. 1 and 9, no objection can now be made to any variance between an information and the evidence, it being left to the justice to adjourn the hearing of the case to a future day, if he is of opinion that by such variance the party charged has been deceived or misled (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, ss. 1 and 9). It is also to be observed that the particular statute of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119, which gives an appeal by sect. 10, also provides that upon such appeal no objection shall be taken to the information or (amongst other things) any insufficiency of statement if it shall appear to the justices in quarter sessions that the defendant was sufficiently informed of the charge intended to be made against him. It appears to me, therefore, that as the charge upon which he has been convicted was actually made, and he was sufficiently informed of it, it was unnecessary as it certainly would have been useless to have gone through the process of laying another formal information or issuing a summons. I think that the objection to the conviction ought not to prevail, but as my two learned brethren have come to a different conclusion the result is that the conviction must be quashed.

MAYOR, &C., OF SCARBOROUGH (apps.) v. THE RURAL SANITARY AUTHORITY OF THE SCARBOROUGH POOR LAW UNION (resps.).

Public Health—Sale and deposit of manure in a field—Nuisance—Order of abatement and prohibition—Statute 38 & 39 Vict. c. 55, s. 91.

The appellants contracted to sell their ashes and manure to some farmers, and to deliver the same at a certain field in the occupation of W. The manure was taken in carts and deposited in the field, and it was proved by the medical officer of health appointed by the respondents that the deposit became a nuisance, and injurious to health, from the time it was tipped from the carts of the appellants. The deposit was near to a fence adjoining the road, along which there was a large daily traffic; and complaints had been made to the inspector by travellers using the road. The nearest house was some 400yds. from the field, and the occupants were not affected in any way by the deposit. The appellants were indicted under the 91st section of the Public Health Act 1875, for a nuisance. The justices convicted, and under the provisions of the 96th section, made an order requiring abatement, and also prohibiting the recurrence of the nuisance.

Held, that the justices were wrong in ordering the abatement of the nuisance by the corporation, inasmuch as they had no power to remove it from the field, but that the order of prohibition was rightly made.

CASE stated by justices under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

At a petty sessions held at Scarborough in and for the division of Pickering-by-the-East, in the north riding of the county of York, on the 23rd March 1876, a complaint, preferred by G. W. O. Woodall, clerk to the rural sanitary authority of the Scarborough Poor Law Union (which said union extends into the said division and riding) hereinafter called the respondents, against the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses acting by the Council of the borough of Scarborough, being the urban sanitary authority of the said borough (hereinafter called the appellants) under sect. 91 of the Public Health Act 1875, charging that on the 19th Feb. last there existed on or upon premises situate at Stone Hagg, in the township of Seamer, in the said division and riding, the following nuisance, to wit, a deposit of foul manure, which deposit, on the date aforesaid, and on several other days in the month of February aforesaid, before and after the said 19th Feb., was a nuisance and that the said nuisance was caused by the act of the appellants, contrary to the form of the statute in that case made and provided, was heard and determined, the said parties respectively being then present, and upon such hearing we adjudged the charge to be proved, and we ordered the appellant, within one calendar month from the date of an order, or a true copy thereof according to the said Act, to abate the said nuisance by covering over, or otherwise disinfecting, the said deposit, or so much thereof as then remained in the said field, so that the same should no longer remain a nuisance, or injurious to health as aforesaid. And we, being satisfied that, notwithstanding the said nuisance might be abated, the same was likely to remain on the same premises, did therefore by the same order prohibit the appellants from causing or permitting any foul manure or other matter to be deposited upon the said premises in such manner as to cause the recurrence of the said nuisance; and also to pay to the respondents on demand their costs, charges, and expenses attendant on the prosecution of the said complaint, and the costs of the court in respect thereof; and if the said order should not be complied with, we authorised and required the respondents from time to time to enter upon the said premises, and to do all such works, matters, and things as might be necessary for carrying the said order into effect.

The appellants were dissatisfied with our determination as being erroneous in point of law, and duly applied to us in writing to state a case setting forth the facts and the grounds of our determination; and in compliance with such application, we state the following case.

Upon the hearing of the complaint, it was proved, on the part of the respondents, and not disputed by the appellants, that a deposit of foul manure, to wit Scarborough ashes, was made and existed in a field situate at Stone Hagg, in the township of Seamer, between the 27th Dec. 1875, and the 19th Feb. 1876; that the said field is in the occupation of Mrs. Ann Woodall, of Seamer, and adjoins the high road; that the heap of deposit was near to the fence adjoining the said road, and about 150yds. from the line of railway from Scarborough to York; that the appellants or their servants, carts, and horses, led the manure, and deposited it in the field in question; that notice of the above-mentioned deposit was given by the respondents to the appellants some time prior to the commencement of these proceedings; and that the nuisance complained of was not abated within the time specified for that purpose in the notice.

There is a large daily traffic on the road adjoining the field containing the deposit, and complaints had been made to the inspector of nuisances by persons using the road in question. It was also proved by the medical officer of health appointed by the respondents, that the deposit was, and is, a nuisance, and injurious to health, and was so from the time it was tipped from the carts of the appellants into the field, and that it would be injurious to parties passing along the road, but not to the occupiers of the nearest dwelling house, which is situate about 400yds. from the field referred to. It was also proved that the occupants of the said dwelling-house might, in some winds, experience a nuisance from the foul smell, but that they had made no complaint; and that no injurious effects could be experienced at the village of Seamer, which is about a mile and a half from the field in question.

On the part of the appellants, it was proved and not denied by the respondents, that by the authority of the appellants, their foreman of the scavenging department had contracted for the sale of Scarborough ashes, manure, and refuse, to six farmers in Seamer and the neighbourhood, and for delivery thereof to them in the field in question; that the appellants have no interest either as owners or tenants of such field, but that the purchasers of such ashes pay the tenant for the use of the field for the purpose, and that the purchasers agreed to take the ashes away to their respective farms as soon as possible after delivery thereof by the appellants as aforesaid, or otherwise cover up such ashes so as to prevent a nuisance; that such purchasers contracted to pay the appellants an agreed sum for every load of ashes delivered in the said field, and that after delivery thereof the said ashes remained subject to the exclusive order of the respective purchasers.

The deposit referred to in the said complaint was made by authority of the appellants under or by virtue of the contract above referred to, and by order of the purchasers.

On the part of the respondents it was urged, that the appellants having themselves by their servants and vehicles led and deposited the manure in the field in question are liable, and that under sect. 255 of the Public Health Act 1875, which provides that where any nuisance appears to be wholly or partially caused by the acts or defaults of two or more persons, proceedings may be taken against any one of such persons, they (the appellants), notwithstanding any default or negligence on the part of the farmers sending to contribute towards, or to increase, the said nuisance, may be called on to abate the same, and to prohibit the recurrence thereof, and to pay the costs of the proceedings.

On the part of the appellants it was contended that they deposited such ashes in the field in question under the contract referred to and by order of the purchasers, and that the appellants were lawfully authorised so to do; that on such deposit the delivery was complete to such purchasers, and that after such delivery the appellants ceased to have any control or responsibility in respect of such deposit: that the appellants were neither owners nor occupiers of the said field; and that under these circumstances the appellants had themselves no power to remove the said deposit or to comply with any order which might be made for the abatement of the nuisance complained of.

We, however, being of opinion that the deposit in question is, and was a nuisance, and injurious to health at and from the time of the deposit, and that the evidence given before us brought the case within sects. 91 and 255 respectively of the Public Health Act of 1875, gave our determination against the appellants in the manner before stated.

The question submitted for this honourable court is:—Whether on the facts above stated the appellants are liable to be called upon to abate the nuisance complained of, in manner and form as directed in the said order, and hereinafter to discontinue the delivery of such ashes on the field in question, and to pay the costs of the proceedings.

If the court should be of opinion that the said order was legally and properly made, and the appellants are liable as aforesaid, then the said order is to stand, but if it should be of opinion otherwise, then the said complaint is to be dismissed.

The following are the material sections of the Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), relating to the case:

Sect. 91. For the purposes of this Act any premises in such a state as to be a nuisance or injurious to health. . . Any accumulation or deposit which is a nuisance or injurious to health . . . shall be deemed to be nuisances liable to be dealt with summarily in manner provided by this Act: provided that a penalty shall not be imposed on any person in respect of any accumulation or deposit necessary for the effectual carrying on any business or manufacture, if it be proved to the satisfaction of the court that the accumulation or deposit has not been kept longer than is necessary for the purposes of the business or manufacture, and that the best available means have been taken for preventing injury thereby to the public health.

Sect. 94. On the receipt of any information respecting the existence of a nuisance, the local authority shall, if satisfied of the existence of a nuisance, serve a notice on the person by whose act, default, or sufferance, the nuisance arises or continues, or, if such person cannot be found, on the owner or occupier of the premises on which the nuisance arises, requiring him to abate the same within a time to be specified in the notice, and to execute such works, and do such things as may be necessary for that purpose.

95. If the person on whom a notice to abate a nuisance has been served makes default in complying with any of the requisitions thereof with the time specified, or if the nuisance, although abated since the service of the notice is, in the opinion of the local authority, likely to recur on the same premises, the local authority shall cause a complaint relating to such nuisance to be made before a justice, and such justice shall thereupon issue a summons requiring the person on whom notice was served to appear before a court of summary jurisdiction.

96. If the court is satisfied that the alleged nuisance exists, or that although abated it is likely to recur on the same premises, the court shall make order on such person requiring him to comply with all or any of the requisitions of the notice, or otherwise to abate the nuisance within a time specified in the order, and to do any works necessary for that purpose; or an order prohibiting the recurrence of the nuisance, and directing the execution of any works necessary to prevent the recurrence, or an order requiring abatement and prohibiting the recurrence of the nuisance.

Simpson for the appellants contended that the corporation had neither created nor contributed towards this nuisance in such a way as to bring them within the provisions of the Public Health Act, and cited

CLEASBY, B.—It seems to me pretty clear what our decision in this case should be. The order made by the justices consists of two parts; the appellants were first of all ordered to abate the nuisance complained of within one calendar month; and, secondly, are prohibited from permitting the recurrence of the nuisance. As regards the abatement of this nuisance, it appears to me that from the time this manure got on the land of the tenant it became a nuisance, which he (the tenant) had in the first instance caused; the manure was there for his purpose, and he is responsible. The appellants are, therefore, not the proper parties to call upon to abate this continuing nuisance. The second part of the order relates to the discontinuance of the nuisance for the future. It has been argued that the act of the corporation does not create a nuisance such as they can be called upon to discontinue. I do not, however, agree to this; what is done by the corporation might be a nuisance to all passing along the highway, though it is not necessary to decide that now. It seems to me that the justices had power to issue this prohibitory order. The case stated that the field where this manure is deposited adjoins the land along which there is a large daily traffic, and that complaints had been made by travellers to the inspector of nuisances. By that act in stopping this nuisance where they do, they do that which in itself is a nuisance, and which necessarily involves a nuisance. So far, therefore, as regards that part of the order which relates to the discontinuance of this nuisance, I think the justices rightly exercised their power; but for the reasons I have given, I think the order for the abatement of it is bad.

GROVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. As regards part of this order, there was only one ground on which the case was arguable for the appellants, viz., that this was a necessary act; for that the manure must be taken somewhere and deposited in some place. But then the question is, were the best available means taken for preventing injury to the public health, for in that case the 91st section of the Public Health Act 1875 specially provides that no penalty shall be imposed. It is not proved here that the corporation did take the best available means to prevent the public health from being injured; indeed it is not disputed that this manure might have been taken to some other place where no nuisance could have been created by its deposit. The corporation have by their own act created this nuisance, and if they choose to contract to sell their ashes, manure, and refuse, they must take care not to infringe the provisions of the law. As regards the other point, viz., that which relates to the abatement of the nuisance, I think the justices acted wrongly, because when the manure was once there the corporation had no power to remove it.

Order of abatement to be quashed; order of prohibition to be affirmed. No costs.

SMITH (app.) v. BARNHAM (resp.).

Navigation Acts—River—Watercourses thereto belonging—Wilfully throwing in rubbish—Claim of right.

The appellant was charged and convicted upon an information laid under the statute 14 Geo. 3, c. 96, which was one of several Acts passed to improve the navigation of the rivers Aire and Calder. By the 97th section of that Act any person who wilfully throws any ballast, &c. into any part of these rivers, or of any watercourses thereto belonging, is liable to a penalty. The appellant carried on the business of a tanner, and it was proved that on a certain day a quantity of rubbish was discharged by him into a beck, adjoining the premises, at a point about four miles from the river Aire, into which it flows at a place where that river is navigable.

Held, that the conviction was wrong, inasmuch as the words "watercourses thereto belonging did not include tributary streams," unless they formed part of the navigation.

Semble (per Bramwell, B.) the section points to a knowingly wilful act on the part of the doer, and, as the appellant merely exercised a supposed right there was no wilful throwing in of rubbish at all within the meaning of the section.

CASE stated under 20 and 21 Vict. c. 43, s. 2.

At a petty sessions holden at Leeds, in and for the borough of Leeds, in the county of York, on the 3rd March 1876, before me, the undersigned William Bruce, Esq., one of Her Majesty's justices of the peace of and for the said borough, being the stipendiary police magistrate, an information preferred by Richard Barnham (hereinafter called the respondent) against Samuel Smith (hereinafter called the appellant) under 14 Geo. 3, c. 96, s. 97, charging for that "he, the said appellant on the 8th day of Jan. in the year aforesaid, in the borough aforesaid, wilfully and unlawfully did throw a quantity of soil, earth, and rubbish into a beck there situate called Sheepscar Beck, the said beck being a watercourse belonging to the river Aire in the borough" was heard and determined by me, and upon such hearing the appellant was duly convicted.

At the hearing of the information it was proved that the real complainants were undertakers of the Aire and Calder navigation upon whom statutory powers are conferred by 10 & 11 Will. 3, c. 19; 14 Geo. 3, c. 96, 1 Geo. 4, c. 39, and 9 Geo. 4, c. 98. The information was laid under 14 Geo. 3, c. 96, s. 97, which enacts "that if any person or persons shall wilfully throw any soil, earth, ballast, gravel, stones, roots, bushes, or other rubbish into any part of the said rivers, cuts, or canal, or any drains, trenches, or watercourses thereto belonging, every such person shall, for every offence forfeit any sum not exceeding five pounds nor less than forty shillings, at the discretion of the justice or justices of the peace before whom the offender shall be convicted."

The appellant is a farmer having premises on the Sheepscar Beck (a beck averging in its course about 5ft. in width and 18in. in depth at the middle of the stream) at a point about four miles from the river Aire, into which it flows at a place where that river is navigable, and forms part of the navigation first referred to. The beck is now and has for many years been used by the occupiers of several tanneries and manufactories on its banks. The appellant carries on the business of a tanner. The beck was under the appellant's premises in a large culvert, through the wall of which thirty-three pipes of about 5in. diameter project over the stream, and there are also two drains about two feet square from the appellant's premises into the beck. On the day in question the business was being carried on, and it was proved that out of a 5in. pipe water charged with lime and earthy matter was discharged into the beck, that a sieve was put under the mouth of the said pipe, and allowed to remain for about three-quarters of an hour, during which time it received and retained about ½lb. of lime and earthy matter which would otherwise have been passed into the beck; and that out of a drain 2ft. square, water was discharged with earthy and

SMITH (app.) v. BARNHAM (resp.).

fleshy matter, which during the same time left a residue in a basket of about half a peck in measure of such earthy and fleshy matter which would otherwise have passed into the beck.

The appellant had carried on the same business of a tanner in the same manner on the same premises for less than twenty years. On the part of the appellant it was contended that the statute did not apply to the case of a manufacturer who, in the course of his business, turned mere refuse matter from his works held in suspension in water into the beck. It was also contended that the beck was not such a watercourse as is mentioned in sect. 97, and further that the lime and earthy and fleshy matter discharged into the beck were neither soil, earth, or rubbish within the meaning of that section; and lastly, that they were not wilfully thrown in within the meaning of that section. It appeared to me that the object of sect. 97 was to keep the rivers mentioned in the Act, and their tributaries free from obstruction which might be caused by the throwing of soil, earth, or rubbish into them, and that it could make no difference whether such soil, &c., was thrown into them by using the hand or machinery or water as the motive power, or whether it was so thrown out of mere wantonness or for the purpose of getting rid of soil, &c., which having served the purpose of a manufacturer was no longer useful to him. It further appeared to me that the lime and earthy and fleshy matter discharged into the beck by the appellant were soil, earth, or rubbish. Whether Sheepscar Beck was a watercourse belonging to the Aire within the meaning of sect. 97 was a question upon which I entertained some doubt, but I was of opinion that it was such a watercourse. I therefore convicted the appellant, and ordered him to pay a penalty of 60s. and the costs.

The questions of law arising on the above statement, therefore, are whether I was right in convicting the appellant on the aforesaid grounds.

Manisty, Q.C. and Forbes, for the appellants.—First, this is a navigation Act, and is entitled "An Act for the Making and Keeping Navigable the Rivers of Aire and Calder in the County of York," and is not an Act to prevent the pollution of streams. Secondly, there has been no wilful throwing in of rubbish within the meaning of the 97th section.

Hugh Shield (A. Wills, Q.C. with him), for the respondents.—This case comes within the 97th section. The Legislature intended to extend the powers of the courts both of law and equity, and have enacted that for the purpose of summary jurisdiction actual damage is not necessary. If this is not a watercourse thereunto belonging these words have no meaning at all. [BRAMWELL, B.—Do the words "thereunto belonging" refer to the rivers, or the cuts, or the canals?] To the rivers. [BRAMWELL, B.—Do all tributaries belong to a river? Supposing that is so then if A belongs to B, and B to C, then A belongs to C. GROVE, J.—At what point does it cease to belong?] No doubt the question is a difficult one, and depends in some degree on how far matter can float. [GROVE, J.—That depends on the matter and its specific gravity.] It is contended that a watercourse distant only four miles from a navigable river is within the section.

BRAMWELL, B. — I am of opinion that this information should have been dismissed. There is no doubt a difficulty in construing this clause, which has evidently been put in by some draughtsman who was anxious to use as comprehensive words as possible. My opinion is that the meaning of the section is shown by the marginal note, which is "penalty on throwing ballast into the navigation." It is made penal by the statute to throw certain things into rivers, cuts, or canals, or any trenches or watercourses "thereunto belonging." Now it is urged on behalf of the respondent that this section includes tributary streams. I think, however, that that is really not so, and that the meaning of the words "watercourses thereunto belonging" (and it is an intelligible use of the words) applies to something belonging to the navigation. Not only do I think this the reasonable construction of the words, but sect. 103, in my opinion, shows it to be the right meaning. Under the last mentioned section half of the penalty is to go to the party injured; therefore an injury of some kind is supposed, and though it is possible that the throwing in of large quantities of soil, &c., four miles above the navigable part of this river might be injurious, yet the words of the 96th section are not "injuriously thrown in." It is necessarily injurious if such soil, &c., is thrown in where the navigation is going on, and I think sect. 97 applies to acts that are done to the navigation. Unless some limit of this kind be placed on the operation of the statute, then throwing rubbish into any part of the river would be penal, which would include up to the source. The words would, no doubt, admit of such a construction; but I cannot help having a strong feeling that they should be limited so as to include only those parts of a river where navigation is carried on. In answer to this it may, perhaps, be said, "Well, but if this is the right construction, rubbish may be thrown in just above the point where the river becomes navigable." That is possibly a case not provided for by the Legislature, and in that event the commissioners would be obliged to have recourse to the ordinary remedies provided by the law independently of their statutory powers. It may be that what the Legislature intended to prevent was the throwing of rubbish, &c., in any place where it must necessarily be injurious. But at all events I am satisfied that tributary streams are not included in the Act, unless they are part of the navigation. I doubt in any case whether the length of time that a manufactory has been carried on has any bearing, because the words here are not "injuriously," but "wilfully;" and therefore if we give a literal interpretation to those words, the effect would be that although the act done was done in a way which could do no harm, and done for centuries, still if wilfully done, the doer is liable to a penalty. I cannot think that the Legislature ever so intended, and that the section does not apply to a stream like this, forming no part of the navigation. Again, there is no statement of any damage here, and I greatly doubt whether this is a wilful throwing in of rubbish at all within this statute. What was done here, was done in the exercise of a supposed right, and the Act seems to me to point to a knowingly wrongful act on the part of the doer.

GROVE, J.—I also think the appellants are entitled to succeed. I shall confine my observations entirely to the scope of the 97th section, by which it is made an offence to throw "soil, earth, or other rubbish into any part of the said rivers, cuts, or canals, or of any drains, trenches, or watercourses thereunto belonging." It is argued that the use of the word "watercourses" in conjunction with the words "thereto belonging," includes any stream or river which flows into the Aire and cuts under the provisions of the Act. If that be so, the Act would give jurisdiction to the magistrates over the whole of the basins which feed the Aire, including perhaps hundreds or even thousands of square miles. The Act should not be construed so as to be manifestly absurd, as it certainly would be if so extensive a jurisdiction were held to be given by the words "thereunto belonging." In my judgment these words are confined to something appertaining to the navigation and ancillary to the object for which the Act was passed. The term "belonging" should receive a reasonable limitation. Similar words are used in sect. 111, which begins thus: "Whereas the legal estate and interest in the present navigation of the said rivers, with the works and appurtenances thereunto belonging," &c. The meaning of the words are, as it seems to me, sufficiently clear; certain works are authorised by the Act, and at the close you have the words "thereunto belonging," which show that the word "belonging" means those things which appertain or are ancillary to navigation. Then in sect. 46, we have power given to the undertakers to make "arches, drains, &c., over, under, across, by, or into the said river, and the several cuts and canals authorised to be made by this Act, and the said trenches, streams, and watercourses communicating therewith," to carry the water from the adjoining lands. True the words there are somewhat changed, and are "streams and watercourses," but I think they refer to nothing else than to the drains, &c., previously spoken of. The word "watercourse" is the term employed in the principal Act of 10 & 11 Will. 3, c. 19; but it is not to be found in the preamble of this Act. The scope of the Act was to give power to the commissioners over everything forming part of the navigation, such as locks, and also drains, trenches, and watercourses which appertain to the navigation, including a power to cleanse. In order to keep those clean the present clause was inserted; and this construction is consistent with all the Acts, and gives a reasonable limitation to the magistrates' jurisdiction. As regards the meaning of the words "into any of the said rivers," there is doubtless a difficulty as pointed out by my brother Bramwell; but it is not necessary to dilate further on that now. Strictly rivers have not one source only; often they have two dozen or more sources. Often fifty streams running into one another at a particular spot form a river. But I think that all that was intended to be included in the word "rivers" were those parts of the rivers within the scope of the Act. The construction sought to be put on this section by the respondents would be an extravagant one, and one altogether, as it seems to me, opposed to the intention of the Legislature.

WILLIAMS v. BEDMINSTER UNION (ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE OF).

Tollhouses, rating of—Conjoint assessment—Notice of appeal against rate—25 & 26 Vict. c. 103, ss. 18, 19—27 & 28 Vict. c. 39, s. 1—"Failure to obtain relief."

By 27 & 28 Vict. c. 39, s. 1, before any appeal against an assessment to a poor rate is heard by quarter sessions, the appellant must give twenty-one days' notice previous to the sessions to the assessment committee, and "no person shall be empowered to appeal to any sessions against a poor rate made in conformity with the valuation list approved by such committee, unless he shall have given to such committee notice of objection against such list, and shall have failed to obtain such relief in the matter as he deems just."

The appellant gave notice of objection to the respondents as and being the assessment committee of the B. Union. The assessment committee adjourned their decision upon the appellant's case until a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench upon another case, which the committee took to be not distinguishable from his, should be given. The appellant then appealed to quarter sessions:

Held, upon a case stated by the recorder, that the appellant had not "failed to obtain relief" from the assessment committee, and that therefore the quarter sessions had no jurisdiction.

Tolls are not rateable in themselves, but a tollhouse is increasingly rateable by reason of the facilities which it affords for the collection of the tolls.

Where the subject-matter of a rate is improperly described in a rate book, the rate is not to be quashed by striking out the name of the person rated, but amended by altering the description of the property rated.

THIS was an appeal against a rate made for the relief of the poor by the churchwardens and overseers of the parish of Bedminster on the 11th Oct. 1872, in which the appellant was assessed as follows:—No. 620.—Name of occupier, William Williams; name of owner, The Bristol Harbour Railway Company; description of property rated, tollhouse and tolls for foot passengers on Prince-street Bridge; situation of property, Wapping; Gross estimated value, 800*l.*; rateable value, 700*l.*

The appeal came on to be heard at the Epiphany Quarter Sessions 1873, for the city and county of Bristol, before T. Kingdon Kingdon, Esq., the recorder, who amended the assessment by striking out the name of the appellant subject to the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench on the following:

CASE.

3. The Dean and Chapter of Bristol were at the time of the erection of the Prince-street Bridge, as hereinafter mentioned, possessed of land in the parish of Bedminster on the southern bank of the River Avon, and of an ancient ferry called the "Gib Ferry" across the said river from the said land. The land and ferry were at that time under lease to one Sidenham Fest.

4. The said Prince-street Bridge was erected on the site of the said Gib Ferry under the authority of and in accordance with the provisions of 48 Geo. 3, c. 11 (a copy of which accompanies and is to be taken as part of this case) by the Bristol Dock Company, who are now represented by the Corporation of the City of Bristol. The bridge and its approaches form a public highway, and the property in them, except in the tollhouse for foot passengers and trucks hereinafter mentioned, is exclusively vested in the said corporation.

5. In accordance with the provisions of sect. 21 of the said Act, the said dock company erected at the Bedminster end of the bridge, in the parish of Bedminster, two tollhouses opposite each other, one for foot passengers and the other for carriages. A different collector occupies each tollhouse, and between the tollhouses are two gates, a large one for carriages and a smaller one for foot passengers—such gates extend from one tollhouse to the other.

6. By a deed poll dated the 1st Oct. 1869 the representatives of Sidenham Feast conveyed to the Great Western and Bristol and Exeter Railway Companies the tolls and tollhouse for foot passengers and trucks for the residue of a term of years then vested in them, and the Great Western and Bristol and Exeter Railway Companies subsequently purchased the reversion in the lease from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and some time previously to the making of the said rate demised the said tolls and tollhouses to the appellant.

7. For some time previous to the making of the said rate, and up to the time of hearing the said appeal, the said tollhouse for foot passengers and trucks was occupied by a man in the employment of the appellant named Adolphus Dye, who collected at this tollhouse the tolls of foot passengers and trucks referred to in sect. 21 of the said Act (48 Geo. 3, chap. 11), and handed them over to the appellant every fortnight. The other tollhouse is occupied by the Corporation of Bristol, who place therein a servant who collects the tolls on horses, carts, and carriages referred to in the same section. Neither Dye nor the corporation collector interfered with any tolls but those which they were employed to collect, Dye attending exclusively to tolls of foot passengers and trucks, and the corporation collector attending exclusively to the tolls for horses, carts, and carriages.

8. The toll is taken from all foot passengers who pass through the said gate, and it is not taken from any foot passengers even though they pass up to the said gate if they return back and do not pass through the said gate.

9. The amount of the tolls on foot passengers and trucks collected at the said tollgate and received by the appellant is upwards of 800*l.* a year.

10. The appellant is liable to be rated in respect of the occupation of the tollhouse, and the gross value of the tollhouse as a building is 12*l.*, and its rateable value 10*l.*

11. The Corporation of Bristol as successors to the said Dock Company are bound to repair, and do repair, the said bridge, with the exception of the said tollhouse for foot passengers and trucks, which is repaired by the appellant.

12. The said poor rate of the 11th Oct. 1872 was made in conformity with the valuation list then existing, and which had been approved of by the respondents.

13. On the 25th Nov. 1872, the appellant served on the churchwardens and overseers of the parish of Bedminster, and also on the respondents, a notice of objection against the said valuation list in accordance with the provisions of "The Union Assessment Committee Amendment Act 1864."

14. The appellant had appealed against the previous poor rate, and the appeal had been heard at the Michaelmas General Quarter Sessions, 1872, for the city and county of Bristol, when the recorder had decided in favour of the appellant, but reserved a case for the opinion of this court. The case so reserved was still pending before this court at the meeting of the respondents hereinafter mentioned.

15. On the 3rd Dec. 1872, a meeting of the respondents was held (being their first meeting after the making of the said rate of 11th Oct. 1872), at which both the appellants and the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of Bedminster appeared, and the appellant then urged two objections only to the said valuation list, which were the same as two of those reserved for the opinion of this court by the said case in the last paragraph mentioned.

16. After the appellant had been heard, the respondents announced that they should not give their decision till the said case for the opinion of this court had been decided, and resolved to adjourn the hearing of the objection until after the decision of this court had been given, but as it was impossible to say when that decision would be given, and therefore to fix a day, it was adjourned sine die. And no decision of this court, or of the said committee, had been given before the hearing of the appeal to the court of quarter sessions hereinafter mentioned.

17. On the 12th Dec. 1872, the appellant served the respondents, and the churchwardens and overseers of the parish of Bedminster, a notice of appeal to the Epiphany Quarter Sessions held on Tuesday, the 7th of Jan. 1873, for the city and county of Bristol, and also served grounds of appeal upon the same parties.

18. At the hearing of the appeal, the respondents objected that the appellant had not failed to obtain relief from the respondents, and that the appeal had been brought too soon, but the court of quarter sessions overruled the objection on the ground that as the respondents had not given a judgment on the objections referred to in the 15th paragraph of this case, the appellant had failed to obtain such relief in the matter as he deemed just, but reserved the point for the opinion of this court. The court of quarter sessions further decided that the appellant was not liable to be rated in respect of the amount received by him for the said tolls under the circumstances set forth in this case either as a separate subject of rating, or as enhancing the value of the said tollhouse, and that as the appellant was rated as a conjoint assessment in respect of a tollhouse and tolls in respect of the latter of which he was not, in the opinion of the court, liable to be rated, the whole assessment on the appellant was bad, and the said court accordingly made an order that the rate should be amended by striking out the name of the appellant, which order is the order set forth in the 2nd paragraph of this case.

19. The questions for the opinion of this court are: first, whether the appellant was entitled to appeal to the quarter sessions under the circumstances stated in the case; secondly, whether the appellant was liable to be rated in respect of the amount received by him from the said tolls; thirdly, whether the court of quarter sessions had power to amend the rate by striking out the name of the appellant.

20. If the court shall be of opinion on the first and third questions in the affirmative and the second in the negative then the order of sessions is to be confirmed.

21. If the court shall be of opinion either on the first or third question in the negative, or if they shall be of opinion on the second question in the affirmative then the order of sessions is to be quashed.

Lopes, Q.C. in reply, sought to distinguish Reg. v. Biggleswade (ubi sup.).

BLACKBURN, J.—In this case the first question is whether the appellant was entitled to appeal under the circumstances. The answer to that question depends upon whether he has complied with the condition precedent marked out by the proviso equivalent to a substantive enactment of 27 and 28 Vict. c. 39, s. 1. That section enacts that before any appeal is heard by quarter sessions, the appellant shall give twenty-one days' notice previous to the sessions to the assessment committee. And the proviso is that "no person shall be empowered to appeal to any sessions against a poor rate made in conformity with the valuation list approved of by such committee, unless he shall have given to such committee notice of objection against the said list, and shall have failed to obtain such relief in the matter as he deems just." Now has the appellant fulfilled the condition precedent marked out by this proviso? I think not; I think that the effect of Reg. v. Biggleswade (21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 494) must be taken to be that his notice of appeal was premature. It appears that the assessment committee after first hearing him adjourned sine die until a judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench should be given, expecting that that judgment would decide the point involved in his case. The judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench was delayed for a year and a half, and after all did not decide the point. But the appellant had not failed to obtain relief. In Reg. v. Biggleswade the poor rate was made on the 30th May. On the 11th June the appellant gave notice of objection to the assessment committee. The committee met on the 30th June and refused to grant him relief. He appealed to sessions held on the same day and the justices allowed the appeal to be entered. But the Court of Queen's Bench granted a prohibition to stay all proceedings on the ground that the appellant had not failed to obtain relief from the committee until 30th June. The present case is a fortiori one to Reg. v. Biggleswade, for here there has been no fault on the part of the assessment committee. Their delay was justifiable in this case, whereas in Reg. v. Biggleswade it appears to have been otherwise. The notice of the appellant, therefore, was premature, and the appeal ought not to have been entertained. This would be enough to decide the case, but I think we ought to intimate our opinion on the second point. I am of opinion then that the recorder decided rightly that the tolls in themselves were not rateable, as not being incident to the real estate; only the toll houses were rateable, and their rateable value was the value of the houses coupled with the value of the facilities afforded by the houses for collecting the tolls: Reg. v. North and South Shields Ferry Company (7 Ba. Cas. 849, 1 E. & B. 440), decides this. But the recorder also thought that the mode of description amounted to a rate on two subject matters. Now in many like cases the court has said that this is mere repetition. The recorder might have struck out the non-assessable part, and ought not to have struck out the name of the appellant altogether. As to the third point, I have already said that the rateable value of the houses is enhanced by the facility which they afforded for collecting the tolls.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion on the three points. I cannot help thinking that the real contention before the recorder was, that the tolls were rateable in themselves, whereas of course this is not so. The recorder was right in his opinion that the tollhouse was to be considered as rendered more valuable by reason of the facilities which it afforded for the collection of the tolls. But I think that Reg. v. Ambleside (ubi sup.) is a clear authority that where a person is improperly rated, the proper course for the court is not to quash the rate but amend it. The proper course for the recorder here was not to strike out the name of the person rated, but to alter the amount and description.

Rule absolute to quash the order of quarter sessions.

REG. v. CARTER.

Coroner—Rejection of evidence—Open verdict—Further evidence after verdict—Melius in-quirendum.

Where a coroner rejects evidence which he ought to have admitted, and the jury return an open verdict, the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court has jurisdiction to order the coroner to re-open the inquiry.

Such jurisdiction will not be exercised unless the court can see that to do so will further the ends of justice.

The inquiry will be before a new jury.

An inquest was held on the body of B., and nine witnesses were examined. One of these, C., deposed that B. had told her that he had taken poison. The coroner rejected evidence of a doctor who stated that he had attended the deceased throughout his illness, and had material evidence to give. The jury returned a verdict that deceased died of a poison called antimony, but that there was no evidence to show how such poison came into his body.

O. afterwards stated that B. had before his death stated the reason for which he had taken poison. The doctor whose evidence had been rejected stated that B. had denied suicide. The Solicitor to the Treasury having taken the statements of O., of the doctor, and of about thirty other persons, some of whom had, and some of whom had not given evidence at the inquest, deposed that such persons could give further material evidence, and that further material evidence would be forthcoming from other persons upon a new inquiry.

Held, that the inquisition ought to be quashed, and a motus inquirendum awarded before the same coroner and another jury.

THIS was a rule calling upon the defendant as and being one of the coroners for the county of Surrey, to show cause why a writ of certiorari should not issue to remove into this divisional court all and singular inquisitions taken by or before him at the house called the Priory, in the parish of Streatham, in the said county of Surrey, on the 25th April last, on view of the body of Charles Delauney Turner Bravo; and why the said inquisitions and the proceedings thereon, when returned, should not be quashed and set aside, and why a better or new inquiry should not be directed to be held, and oral evidence taken either before the coroner or commissioners, and either before the same or a fresh jury; and on view of the body or without view thereof, as to this divisional court should seem fit; or why the court should not direct such steps to be taken as to reopening the inquiry or holding a new inquiry as to the court should seem fit; on the ground that there had been a miscarriage of justice and misconduct or mistake on the part of the said coroner, and on the ground that material evidence was rejected, and that material witnesses were not examined and the inquiry closed prematurely, and the coroner's depositions were incorrect, and that material evidence had since been discovered, and that the inquiry was incomplete, and the verdict of the jury imperfect and inconclusive, and the inquisition bad in law on the face of it.

The above rule had been drawn up on reading the affidavits of A. K. Stephenson, Solicitor to the Treasury, R. T. Reid, F. H. M'Calmont, G. Johnson, H. R. Bell, and W. H. Pollard, and certain exhibits annexed to such affidavits respectively. The effect of such affidavits and exhibits was as follows:

The deceased, who was a barrister, was taken ill upon the 18th March about 9.30 p.m., and died on the 21st of the same month. The inquest was held on the 25th, and afterwards by adjournment on the 28th, when it was concluded. The jury returned an open verdict, and the inquisition terminated as follows:

The said jurors now here say upon their oaths that the said C. D. T. Bravo on the 21st April, by taking of a poison called antimony, became mortally sick and distemper'd in his body, of which said mortal sickness and distemper he did die, and the jurors aforesaid upon their oaths aforesaid do say how or by what means the said poison came to be taken by the said C. D. T. Bravo we have no sufficient evidence proved to us.

From the depositions furnished by the coroner, it appeared that the following witnesses were examined at the inquest:

Mr. Bravo, step-father of the deceased.

Mrs. Cox, who had been living in the house of the deceased as companion to his wife, deposed that as soon as she went to the deceased upon his being first taken ill, he said he had taken poison: but, although she saw him continually until his death, he did not explain to her, or in her hearing, how he came to take the poison; also that he and his wife lived on good and affectionate terms.

Amelia Bushell, lady's maid, deposed that the deceased was conscious to the last, and did not account for his illness to her or to anybody in her hearing.

George Harrison, surgeon, deposed that the deceased was first treated for collapse, but afterwards had symptoms of labouring under an irritant poison.

[The inquiry was at this point adjourned.]

Mary Anne Kieber, servant, deposed that the deceased did not make use of the word poison in her presence.

J. T. Payne, physician, deposed that the post-mortem examination taken by him showed antimony to have been the cause of death.

H. R. Bell, surgeon, and cousin of the deceased, deposed that the deceased said that he had taken laudanum for neuralgia, but did not otherwise explain his symptoms.

T. Redwood, professor of chemistry, deposed to antimony having been the cause of death.

F. H. M'Calmont, barrister, and friend of the deceased, deposed that he was a most unlikely person to commit suicide.

Certain notes, taken by Mr. Reid, who had attended the inquest, but not professionally, at the request of the stepfather of the deceased, varied from the depositions taken by the coroner.

The following was the affidavit of Dr. Johnson:—

I professionally attended the late C. D. T. Bravo during the illness of which he died, having visited him on five separate occasions in two days in the month of April last past. I saw him first on Wednesday, the 19th April, at about 2.30 a.m., with Mr. Royes Bell, Mr. Harrison and Dr. Moore. I saw him a second time on the same day, at about 3 p.m., in company with (to the best of my recollection) the same three gentlemen. I saw him the third time on the following day (Thursday), at about 9 a.m., in company with (to the best of my recollection) the same three gentlemen. I saw him the fourth time on the same day (Thursday), at about 2.30 p.m., in company with Mr. Henry Smith, surgeon, of Wimpole-street, and the above-mentioned Mr. Royes Bell. I saw him the fifth time on the same day (Thursday), at about 6.30 p.m., with Sir William Gull and the above-mentioned Mr. Royes Bell. I did not see him again alive, but was informed that he died on the following day, Friday the 21st. I was present at the post-mortem examination made by Dr. Payne. On the morning of Friday, April the 28th, about 10 a.m., being the morning of the day on which the adjourned inquest was appointed to be held, Mr. Campbell, sen., the father of Mrs. Charles Bravo, the widow of the deceased, called on me at my house, and said to me that he had been advised by Sir William Gull to come to me, or words to that effect. Mr. Campbell further said to me, as near as I can recollect, the following words: "The question is, what verdict shall we get; I can get a verdict of suicide in five minutes." I said "How?" He said, "By repeating Sir William Gull's opinion." I said, "Well, it may be suicide, but, so far as I can see, there is no evidence to show it, and the only possible verdict is an open one, that he died by antimony." I added that I thought of going to the inquest. He said he hoped that I would not go, or he thought I had better not go, and that he would telegraph for me whether I should come or not. I received no telegram, but I went to Balham that afternoon, and attended the adjourned inquest about 4 p.m.

Q.B. Div.]

REG. v. CARTER.

[Q.B. Div.]

I was present when Mr. Royes Bell was giving his evidence. I heard Mr. Royes Bell, in giving his evidence, mention my name and state a conversation which had passed between myself and the deceased (Mr. Charles Bravo) with reference to taking poison. The conversation stated by Mr. Royes Bell was a portion only of what had passed between me and the deceased, and it was that portion which occurred immediately after I had heard Mrs. Cox's statement that the deceased said that he had taken poison. I heard Mr. Royes Bell tell the coroner that I had said to Mr. C. Bravo, "Mrs. Cox tells us you have taken poison," and that I asked him (Mr. C. Bravo) what the meaning of it was, and that he (Mr. C. Bravo) admitted taking laudanum, and that I said to him (Mr. C. Bravo) "That won't do," or "That won't explain your symptoms." The coroner said, "Dr. Johnson is not here, I suppose," upon which some person in the room said, "Yes, Dr. Johnson is here." I heard Mr. McCalmont give his evidence, after which the coroner was apparently about to close the inquiry, when I heard one of the jury say that the jury were in a state of doubt, and would be glad to have any assistance, or words to that effect. Upon this I got up from the other end of the room where I had been sitting and stepped forward to the table and said to the coroner, "My name is Dr. Johnson, I have seen Mr. Bravo several times, and I wish to give evidence." To the best of my recollection I also told the coroner that I had had several conversations with the deceased (Mr. C. Bravo) on the subject of his illness and its cause, but I cannot now undertake to repeat the exact words I used to the coroner in telling him of these conversations. The coroner said, "We don't require any further evidence; it is quite unnecessary to examine you." I have made a statement to the Treasury Solicitor of facts within my knowledge, and I should have been prepared to give evidence of these facts had I been examined by the coroner.

It will be convenient to set out here the coroner's affidavit filed after the rule had been served upon him.

I was elected one of Her Majesty's Coroners for Surrey in the year 1836, and since that time I have never taken a holiday or been absent from my duty either from sickness or any other cause, and no complaint has ever been made against me in respect of any of the many thousands of inquiries held by me during the forty years that have elapsed since my said election.

2. Previous to the inquest on the body of Charles Delauney Turner Bravo, deceased, I had no knowledge whatever of his family or relations, or of the family or relations of his wife, or of any member of either family.

3. The said inquest was conducted by me throughout in an orderly and regular manner, and simply with a view to advance the interests of justice, and in conducting the same I was influenced by no personal interest or corrupt motive.

4. To the best of my belief, the depositions taken by me and signed by myself and the foreman of the jury contain all the material evidence given by the witnesses before me, and to my knowledge no evidence was omitted that had any real bearing on the case.

5. It was not suggested to me during the said inquest that the deceased gentleman came to his death by any foul means, and I saw no reason to suspect any one of having caused his death, and I did not consider that by any further adjournment of the inquest or otherwise any evidence could or might be obtained as to how the poison came into the body of the deceased.

6. I have read the affidavits and statements of Dr. Johnson and Mr. Reid, and the statements of Mrs. Cox and Mrs. Charles Bravo, and if, before the close of the inquest, my attention had been called to the material facts therein stated, I would have again adjourned the inquiry.

7. I cannot recall the exact words used by Dr. Johnson when he offered to give evidence at the inquest, but I understood that he proposed to give medical evidence as to the cause of death only; but if I had known that he was prepared to give the evidence mentioned in his affidavit and statement, I should most certainly have received it.

8. In summing up the evidence, I drew the attention of the jury to the medical testimony, and also to the facts given in evidence by Mrs. Cox that the deceased had admitted to her that he had "taken poison," but I informed the jury that it was for them to say whether the poison was administered by the deceased himself or by others, or taken by accident.

9. After Mrs. Cox's evidence that the deceased had confessed to her that he had taken poison, I regarded the case as one of suicide, but from subsequent statements made by Mrs. Cox and others, I feel that further inquiry is necessary, and humbly submit to any order this honourable court may think fit to make.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department had requested the solicitor to the Treasury to "make all possible inquiry into the cause of the death of Mr. Bravo, and to take such further steps therein as he might be advised." The Solicitor to the Treasury, or persons acting under his directions, took down in writing, statements made either voluntarily or upon request by thirty-four persons. The voluntary statement of Mrs. Cox was to the effect that the deceased had admitted to her having taken the poison himself and on purpose, and had privately told her the reason for his having done so. The thirty-four statements were made exhibits to the affidavit of the Solicitor to the Treasury, and such affidavit concluded as follows:

I say that from the statements and other documents, copies of which are annexed to my affidavit, and also from information I have received which does not appear in any of these statements or documents, I believe that some of the persons who have made statements to me could, if they chose to do so, make further statements which, in my judgment, would be material, either as going to the credit of such persons, or as bearing upon the circumstances attending the death of the deceased, and that if a further inquiry were had on which such persons could be compelled to attend and give evidence upon oath, further material evidence, which was not before the coroner's jury at the inquest held on the 25th and 28th days of April last, would be forthcoming.

The Attorney-General having obtained a rule as above, which rule was served on the coroner, on the widow of the deceased, and on the stepfather of the deceased,

Parry, Serjt. (with him R. Burleigh Muir, and Macnamara, for the coroner), showed cause, and admitted that the coroner had committed an error of judgment in refusing to hear the evidence tendered by Dr. Johnson. He read the affidavit (set out ante) of the coroner, who was absent through illness, and referred to

Reg. v. Bunney, 1 Salk. 190; s.o. nom. Reg. v. Bonney, Carth. 72;

Reg. v. White, 3 E. & E. 1860.

[COCKBURN, C.J.—There has been no verdict here. The coroner has dismissed the jury. Reg. v. White (ubi sup.), no doubt, decides that the coroner cannot of himself re-open an inquiry, but the question is whether the court cannot direct him to do so.] It cannot be said that justice has been defeated by the coroner, who acted with perfect bona fides, whose bona fides is still unimpeached, and who now submits in everything to the directions of the court.

The Attorney-General (Sir J. Holker, Q.C.) with him the Solicitor-General (Sir H. Giffard, Q.C.), Poland, and C. Bowen for the Crown.—This inquiry has been conducted in a most unsatisfactory manner, and there has been no real conclusion at all, but a miscarriage of justice. [COCKBURN, C.J.—That may be, but I doubt whether there is any precedent for the granting a new inquiry on the ground of a mere error of judgment on the part of the coroner.] From Michael Barclay's case (2

MATHER (pet.) v. BROWN AND ANOTHER (resps.).

[U.P. Div.]

Siderfin, pp. 90, 101), it would seem that there is in that case a new inquiry was ordered on the ground that both sides had not been heard, after a finding of felo de se, before six of the old jurors and six new ones, and Glyn, C.J. said that the inquiry might have been held before him, inasmuch as "each Chief Justice of England is Chief Coroner of England." [COCKBURN, C.J.—There was a perfect finding in that case, so that it is distinguishable from the present, in which the finding is imperfect. If we order an inquiry before a new jury, exhumation will be necessary to satisfy the technical requisite of the law that all inquests must be super visum corporis. This is a requisite which ought to be made unnecessary by the Legislature, but until that is done, we must be governed by the law as it is. FIELD, J.—In R. v. Bunney (1 Salk 190), it is said that a new inquiry before special commissioners is held not super visum corporis, but upon affidavits]. He also referred to

Anon. 12 Mod. 112.

Sir H. James, Q.C. and Biron, for the widow, and Grantham, for the stepfather of the deceased, were not heard.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that the rule ought to be absolute to quash the inquisition, and to direct the coroner to hold a new inquiry before a fresh jury. I do not think the same jury can entertain the question again. The jury were discharged by the coroner, and were, therefore, functi officio. As we quash the inquisition, this will involve the very painful necessity of an exhumation of the body, inasmuch as the inquest must be super visum corporis according to law. The course which we now take is most in accordance with legal precedents. But I wish it to be very distinctly understood that a new inquiry will not be granted in every case of an open verdict, but only in the case where the court sees that some practical end may be gained. Ordinarily, the court will take care not to increase public excitement by a further public investigation. But the present case is one of a mysterious character, and the coroner rejected evidence which might have thrown light on the cause of death. Heaven forbid that we should suggest that the death was caused by either murder or suicide. It might have been caused by accident. It will be for the jury to say what the cause of death was, and the evidence of Dr. Johnson may assist them in forming a conclusion. The rule, therefore, will be absolute.

MELLOR and FIELD, JJ. concurred.

The rule was drawn up as follows: "Upon reading the affidavit of William Carter, and upon hearing counsel on both sides, it is ordered that a writ of certiorari issue to remove into this divisional court all and singular inquisitions taken by or before the said William Carter, one of Her Majesty's coroners for the County of Surrey, at the house called the Priory, in the parish of Streatham, in the said county of Surrey, on the 25th day of April last, on view of the body of Charles Delauney Turner Bravo. MATHER (pet.) v. BROWN AND ANOTHER (resps.)

Municipal election—Nomination paper—Mistake—Use of initial for name—5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 142, 38 & 39 Vict. c. 40.

By 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 142, a misnomer in certain documents, among which nomination papers are not mentioned, is immaterial, if the description is such as to be commonly understood. 38 & 39 Vict. c. 40, which requires nomination papers at municipal elections to state the surname and other names of the person nominated, is to be construed as one with that Act.

At a municipal election a candidate's second Christian name was represented in his nomination paper by its initial. The nomination paper was objected to, and was rejected by the mayor.

Held, on a case stated on petition against the mayor's decision, that there was a fatal misnomer, and that 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 142, does not apply to nomination papers, and did not cure the objection.

A SPECIAL case had been stated on an appeal from the decision of the mayor of Southport, who had allowed an objection to the nomination of the petitioner as a candidate for the office of town councillor for the Talbot Ward of the borough of Southport. The nomination paper of the petitioner was duly subscribed by two enrolled burgesses of the borough as proposer and seconder, and by eight other enrolled burgesses of the borough as assenting to the nomination in accordance with the Municipal Elections Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 40) sect. 1, sub-sect. 2, and was delivered to the town clerk in due time as required by sub-sect. 3. The name of the petitioner was Robert Vicars Mather; the nomination paper was filled up as follows:

Surname.	Other Names.	Abode.	Description.
Mather.	Robert V.	Chapel-street.	Hotel Proprietor.

The petitioner's name was on the burgess roll as "Robert V. Mather." There were only three other ratepayers named Mather in the borough of Southport, of whom two were women, and the other was Richard Mather, who resided at 28, Sussex-road, and who was not a hotel proprietor.

The mayor attended at the town hall, as directed by the Act (sect. 1, sub-sect. 3), to decide on the validity of objections to the nomination papers. No one was in attendance on behalf of the petitioner.

An objection was made by John Holt, one of the burgesses, to the petitioner's nomination paper, on the ground that his Christian names were insufficiently stated. The mayor decided that this objection must prevail, and the town clerk published the names of the two respondents, Brown and Witham, as the only candidates, and they were declared duly elected. Mr. Mather took objection to the decision of the mayor disallowing his nomination paper by petition, which was turned into a special case by order of Huddleston, B., and the case now came before the court for decision. (a)

2 H

May 4.—A. L. Smith (Hutton with him) for the petitioner.—It must be admitted that the use of an initial for one of the petitioner's names is a misnomer: (Reg. v. Plenty, L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 346: 38 L. J. 205, Q. B.; 9 B. & S. 386; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 521). But it was there held that a similar misnomer was cured by 5 & 6 Will. c. 76, s. 142, which is incorporated by 38 & 39 Vict. c. 40, s. 13. The earlier Act does not expressly mention nomination papers, because they were not then used in municipal elections, but the Legislature has incorporated its provisions in an Act which treats of nomination papers, and must have intended to apply sect. 142 to nomination papers. R. v. Tugwell (L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 704; 37 L. J. 275, Q. B.; 9 B. & S. 367) shows that this section applied to nomination papers under 22 Vict. c. 35, s. 6. The description is clearly such as to be commonly understood.

No counsel appeared for the respondents.

Our. adv. vult.

May 5.—Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—In the case of Mather v. Brown, which was argued yesterday, we have looked into the authorities to see if we could give effect to Mr. A. L. Smith's argument, and overrule the objection which has been taken to the nomination of the petitioner, and we are of opinion that we cannot. We have arrived at this decision with extreme reluctance, but it is our duty to

(a) By the Municipal Elections Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 40), sect. 1, sub-sect. 2, at any such election every candidate shall be nominated in writing; the writing shall be subscribed by two enrolled burgesses of such borough or ward as proposer and seconder, and by eight other enrolled burgesses of such borough or ward as assenting to the nomination. . . . The nomination paper shall state the surname and other names of the person nominated, with his place of abode and description, and shall be in the Form No. 2 set forth in the first schedule to this Act, or to the like effect. . . .

Sub-sect. 3. Every nomination paper subscribed as aforesaid, shall be delivered by the candidate himself, or his proposer or seconder, to the town clerk, seven days at least before the day of election, and before five o'clock in the afternoon of the last day on which any such nomination paper may by law be delivered; the town clerk shall forthwith send notice of such nomination to each person nominated. The mayor shall attend at the town hall on the day next after the last day for the delivery of nominations to the town clerk between the hours of two and four in the afternoon, and shall decide on the validity of every objection made to a nomination paper, such objection to be made in writing. . . . The decision of the mayor, which shall be given in writing, shall, if disallowing any objection to a nomination paper, be final, but if allowing the same, shall be subject to reversal on petition questioning the election or return. . . .

Sect. 13. This Act shall, so far as consistent with the tenor thereof, be construed as one with the Act 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, and the Acts amending the same, and the Acts for the time being in force relating to elections of councillors, auditors, and assessors in boroughs.

By 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 142. . . . No misnomer or inaccurate description of any person, body corporate, or place named in any schedule to this Act annexed, or in any roll, list, notice, or voting paper required by this Act, shall hinder the full operation of this Act with respect to such person, body corporate, or place, provided that the description of such person, body corporate, or place, be such as to be commonly understood.

decide what is the law, and we can come to no other conclusion than that the objection is good. The question has arisen thus. There was a municipal election for Southport, and Robert Vicars Mather was nominated for the office of town councillor. He was duly nominated in every respect, except that in the nomination paper in the column for the Christian names of the candidate, where the names inserted should have been "Robert Vicars," what actually was inserted was "Robert V." Objection was taken to this defect in the nomination paper in proper time and the objection was allowed by the mayor, and the question for our decision is whether we are obliged to give effect to the objection which has been so taken and allowed. The Municipal Elections Act of last year (38 & 39 Vict. c. 40) among other provisions directs by sect. 1 sub-sect. 2 that "The nomination paper shall state the surname and other names of the person nominated, with his place of abode and description, and shall be in the Form No. 2 set forth in the schedule to this Act, or to the like effect;" and the form in the schedule gives four separate columns, for the surname, other names, abode, and description. The objection is that whoever filled up the paper has not properly filled up the column for the candidate's other names. It was made at a time when the defect might have been cured. The nomination paper is to be delivered by the candidate himself or his proposer or seconder, and the candidate had no opportunity of correcting the defect when he knew of the objection. The question is, is it a misnomer? In the absence of authority I do not know what my opinion might have been, but there is a unanimous decision that a description in which the Christian name, which is required to be stated, is represented by an initial, is a misnomer; for although it was held in R. v. Bradley (3 E. & E. 634) that "Wm." or "Willm." might be used for "William," yet it has since been held in Reg. v. Plenty (ubi sup.) that the use of an initial was insufficient. In that case it was held that 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 142 cured the objection. That section enacted that no misnomer or inaccurate description of any person, &c. in certain documents required by the Act, including voting papers should hinder the full operation of the Act with respect to such person, &c., provided the description of such person, &c. were such as to be commonly understood. Therefore this decision carries the matter thus far; there was undoubtedly a misnomer, but it was cured by sect. 142 of the old Municipal Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76). 38 & 39 Vict. c. 40 incorporates that Act by sect. 13, but in these words, "This Act shall, as far as consistent with the tenor thereof, be construed as one with the Act 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76," and it does not say that the operation of sect. 142 of the old Act shall be extended. If this provision were taken as inserted in the later Act, still nomination papers would not be mentioned; for at the time when the old Act was passed nomination was oral, and the Act does not seem to extend to a document which was not in existence at that time. I confess I am aware that this is a technical objection, but the respondents had a right to take it, and it was taken in time and when the nomination paper might have been amended. We must give effect to the law; and we feel bound, being the court of final appeal in these election cases, to follow the strict letter of the law. Political questions, or questions between political parties, often arise in these cases, and we ought to abstain from any attempt to strain the words which have been used by the Legislature. Although I have come to this conclusion with great reluctance, I am clearly of opinion that we must give judgment against the petitioner.

LINDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion. I have examined the authorities to see if there is any decision which would enable us to get over this objection, but I cannot find any authority which enables us to do so, and I can find authorities to the contrary. In Davison v. Farmer (6 Ex. 242) there was an omission from a statute which the court said was no doubt an oversight in the Legislature; but they held that they could not supply the defect. The same point was decided in the same way in Lane v. Bennett (1 M. & W. 70). The Act of last year by sect. 13 is to be construed as one with the old Act, but it has omitted to continue the language used in sect. 142 of the old Act so as to extend that Act to documents in pari materia with those which are there mentioned. Here it appears probably to have been by an oversight that the provision in question was not so extended, but we cannot stretch the language which is actually used beyond its true meaning.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—My brother Archibald, who heard the argument, has authorised me to state that he concurs in the view which we have adopted.

STONE v. THE MAYOR, ALDERMEN, AND BURGESSES OF THE BOROUGH OF YEovil.

Construction of statute—Word making clause unintelligible—Diversion of streams—Injury to lands—Waterworks Clauses Act 1847 (10 Vict. c. 17)—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), s. 9.

Where a word in a statute would make the clause in which it occurs unintelligible the word may be eliminated and the clause read without it.

8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, s. 9 provides for assessment of purchase money for lands taken from parties under disability and compensation for injury "to any such lands."

Held, that the section may be read as if the word "such" were not in it, and therefore a party under disability is entitled to compensation for injury to lands not taken.

Defendants, under a private Act incorporating the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 and the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847, diverted streams which supplied a mill of which plaintiff was tenant for life, and were empowered to divert, and gave notice of intention to divert others. Plaintiff and defendants agreed to refer to two surveyors the amount of compensation to be paid for all such streams. The surveyors disagreed, and a third surveyor was nominated by two justices under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, s. 9, who made his award assessing compensation for all such streams.

Held, on demurrer to a statement of claim, that defendants' submission to valuation was not ultra vires, that there had been a good valuation under sect. 9, and that plaintiff was entitled to have compensation assessed for the streams which defendants had power to divert and had given notice of intention to divert, as well as for those which they had already diverted.

The statement of claim was as follows:

1. The plaintiff, before and at the time of the agreement hereinafter mentioned was and is the owner, to wit as tenant, for life of a certain water grist mill and premises called "Withyhook Mill," situate in the parish of Leigh, in the county of Dorset, and also was and is entitled to the use and enjoyment of certain streams, springs, and waters flowing down to the said mill, and necessary for the purpose of working the same.

2. By the "Yeovil Improvement Act 1870" (which incorporated amongst other Acts the "Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845" and the "Waterworks Clauses Acts 1847 and 1863") the defendants were authorised and empowered to construct certain waterworks for supplying water to the borough of Yeovil and to the other places mentioned in the said Act, and for that purpose to take, use, divert, and appropriate the several streams, springs, waters, and sources of water shown on the plans, and described in the books of reference deposited by the defendants as mentioned in the said Act.

3. The streams, springs, and waters which the defendants were so empowered to divert and appropriate for the purposes of the waterworks authorised by the said Act, included certain streams, springs, and waters flowing down to and forming the principal supply of water to the plaintiff's said mill.

4. In or about the month of Sept. 1872, the defendants gave notice to the plaintiff of their intention to divert and appropriate under the powers of the said first-mentioned Act the whole of the said last-mentioned streams, springs, and waters, and at or about the same time the defendants actually took and diverted a great portion of the said streams, springs, and waters for the purposes of the said waterworks.

5. The necessary effect of such diversion and appropriation of the said streams and waters by the defendants was to cause permanent injury and damage to the said mill and premises of the plaintiff; and the plaintiff, as such owner thereof as aforesaid, then became and was entitled to have the permanent damage and injury which then had been or might thereafter be sustained by the plaintiff or the owner for the time being of the said mill and premises by reason of the exercise by the defendants of the powers of the said Act ascertained by valuation in the manner provided by the "Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845."

6. A correspondence subsequently took place between the plaintiff's solicitors and the solicitor of the defendants as to the best mode of determining the amount of compensation due to the plaintiff.

7. On the 13th April 1874 an agreement was made and entered into between the plaintiff and the defendants. (The agreement, in which the defendants were called "the corporation," was set out; so far as material for this report, it is as follows.) . . . "Whereas the corporation, in pursuance of the powers and provisions of the Yeovil Improvement Act 1870 and the several Acts and parts of Acts incorporated therewith, are, for the purposes of the waterworks authorised by the said first-mentioned Act, empowered, and intend from time to time to take use, divert, and appropriate the streams, springs, and waters arising," &c. . .

(describing them by reference to the plans and book of reference deposited with the clerk of the peace.) "And whereas the said Thomas Stone" (the plaintiff) "as tenant for life of a certain water grist mill called 'Withyhook Mill,' and certain lands adjoining and belonging thereto situate, &c. . . . under and by virtue of the last will and testament of John Stone deceased is interested in all or some of the said streams, springs, and waters. Now be it known that in pursuance of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 the corporation do hereby nominate on their behalf Henry Parsons, of &c. . . . an able practical surveyor and the said Thomas Stone doth hereby nominate John Day, of &c. . . . another able practical surveyor, to be the two surveyors who shall determine (if they can agree) the amount of compensation money to be now paid by the corporation for the damage which the owner or owners for the time being of the said premises may sustain by the abstraction of the whole of the said streams, springs, and waters, which the said corporation are so as aforesaid authorised to take, use, divert, and appropriate for the purposes of the said waterworks or otherwise by reason of the execution of the powers of the said first-mentioned Act."

8. The said Henry Parsons and John Day, the valuers named in the said agreement, having disagreed in the valuation of the matters and things referred to them by the said agreement, one James Rawlence, an able practical surveyor, was shortly afterwards, upon the application of the defendants and with the consent of the plaintiff duly, nominated by two justices in accordance with the provisions in that behalf of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, to determine the amount of compensation to be paid by the defendants to the plaintiff in respect of the said damage and injury to the said mill and premises as aforesaid.

9. The said James Rawlence afterwards took upon himself the burthen of such valuation accordingly, and having been attended by the said parties respectively, their respective solicitors and witnesses duly and in accordance with the provisions of the said Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 made his award and valuation respecting the premises as follows (that is to say):

I, James Rawlence, the surveyor, nominated by two justices in and by the nomination under their hands indorsed on the above-written agreement do by this my valuation determine that the sum of £939 5s. is the compensation money to be paid by the above-named corporation for the permanent damage and injury which the owner or owners for the time being of the above-mentioned mill, lands, and premises may have sustained or shall or may sustain by the abstraction of the whole of the streams, springs, and waters which the said corporation are authorised to take, use, divert, and appropriate for the purposes of the waterworks authorised by The Yeovil Improvement Act 1870. . . . (dated 18th July 1874).

10. The defendants themselves took up the said award and valuation of the said James Rawlence, but (though frequently requested by the plaintiff so to do) have not paid either to the plaintiff, nor into the bank pursuant to the directions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 the amount of the said valuation, but on the pretext of the said valuation, and award being ultra vires or otherwise invalid have constantly neglected and refused so to do.

The plaintiff claims 939l. 5s. and interest thereon from the 18th July 1874 until judgment and a writ of mandamus directing the defendants to pay the above amount and interest into the bank pursuant to the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act 1845. Demurrer. (a)

Kingdon, Q.C. (H. Cary Batten with him) for the defendants.—The defendants have not taken or used lands or streams within the meaning of the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847 (10 Vict. c. 17) sect. 6; the plaintiff's claim must be for lands and streams injuriously affected. Ferrand v. The Corporation of Bradford (21 Beav. 412), where the Master of the Rolls took the opposite view to this, is directly in conflict with Bush v. The Trowbridge Waterworks Company (32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 182; L. Rep. 19 Ex. 291; 44 L. J., 235, Ch.) affirmed by the Lords Justices (33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 187; L. Rep. 10 Ch. 459; 44 L. J. 645, Ch.) The plaintiff, then, is not entitled to compensation, for sect. 9 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), under which the compensation payable to parties under disability is to be ascertained, applies only to cases where lands are purchased or taken, and does not provide for payment of compensation for lands which are injuriously affected without being taken. The words, "compensation to be paid for any permanent damage or injury to any such lands" in that section can only refer to the lands mentioned earlier in the section, that is "lands to be purchased or taken." The agreement for submission was ultra vires, and therefore not binding on the ratepayers:

Ashbury Railway Carriage and Iron Company v. Riche, 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 450; L. Rep. 7 H. of L. 653; 44 L. J. 185, Ex.

Pinder (Lopes, Q.C., with him) for the plaintiff.—This is not a valuation under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, but an arbitration by agreement on the terms of the Act. First, if there had been no agreement the arbitrator would have been bound under sect. 68 to give damages for all the streams, and there could have been no second action or arbitration. Secondly, if this would not be so independently of the agreement, the parties have made an agreement to that effect. Oroft v. The London and North-Western Railway Company (3 B. & S. 436; 32 L. J. 113, Q. B.), is an authority for the first of these propositions, which is also supported by the judgment of the court delivered by Erle, C.J., in

(a) Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), s. 9. The purchase-money or compensation to be paid for any lands to be purchased or taken from any party under any disability or incapacity, and not having power to sell or convey such lands except under the provisions of this or the special Act, and the compensation to be paid for any permanent damage or injury to any such lands, shall not, except where the same shall have been determined by the verdict of a jury or by arbitration, or by the valuation of a surveyor appointed by two justices under the provision hereinafter contained, be less than shall be determined by the valuation of two able practical surveyors, one of whom shall be nominated by the promoters of the undertaking, and the other by the other party; and if such two surveyors cannot agree in the valuation then by such third surveyor as any two justices shall, upon application of either party after notice to the other party for that purpose, nominate; and each of such two surveyors if they agree, or if not then the surveyor nominated by the said justices, shall annex to the valuation a declaration in writing subscribed by them or him of the correctness thereof; and all such purchase money or compensation shall be deposited in the bank for the benefit of the parties interested in manner hereinafter mentioned.

[C.P. Div.]

Brogden v. The Llynvi Valley Railway Company (9 C. B., N. S., 229; 30 L. J. 61, C. P.). The latter case shows that the submission was not ultra vires; see also as to this point, Martin v. The Leicester Waterworks Company (3 H. & N. 468; 27 L. J. 432, Ex.). There can be a reference to settle the amount of compensation, not according to the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act: (Collins v. The South Staffordshire Railway Company, 7 Ex. 5.) The defendants, having appeared and taken up the award, are estopped from taking the objection that the submission is ultra vires:

Tyerman v. Smith, 6 E. & B. 719; 25 L. J. 359, Q. B.;

Andrews v. Elliott, 5 E. & B. 502; 25 L. J. 1, Q. B.; affirmed 6 E. & B. 338; 25 L. J. 336, Q. B.

Assuming that sect. 9 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act applies, the words "compensation to be paid for any permanent damage or injury to such lands," cannot refer to lands which are taken, for that construction would make the clause unintelligible. They must refer to lands belonging to the tenant for life.

The Waterworks Clauses Act 1847 (10 Vict. c. 17) sect. 12;

Caledonian Railway Company v. Lockhart, 3 Macqueen 808.

BRETT, J.—In this case the statement of claim is founded on an allegation that the plaintiff was tenant for life and in possession of a certain mill, and the defendants, under a private Act incorporating the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act and the Waterworks Clauses Acts, diverted part of certain streams which did not belong to the plaintiff, but over which he was entitled to a millowner's rights, and that the defendants had given notice to the plaintiff of their intention to divert the whole of the said streams. The remedy sought is a writ of mandamus directing the defendants to pay the amount which has been assessed as compensation for damage sustained or to be sustained by the plaintiff by the diversion of the whole of the springs. To this statement of claim there is a demurrer, and therefore all the facts alleged must for the purposes of the present decision be taken to be true. The plaintiff argues that the submission and assessment have taken place under and according to sect. 9 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), or if not under sect. 9 then under sect. 22, and that in either case the assessment is binding on both the plaintiff and the defendants. The defendants argued that the submission and assessment are not within sect. 9, and if not within sect. 9, are not within sect. 22, and therefore not properly within the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act; or that if they are within this Act the provisions of the Act are not applicable to a part of the claim, that is the claim for compensation for diversion after the time of the assessment. The defendants further argue that if the submission and assessment are not within the Act, the defendants are not bound, nor is the plaintiff; and that if the defendants agreed to assess and pay compensation for diversion after the time of the assessment, they attempted to bind the shareholders or ratepayers where they were not compelled to make compensation, and therefore they were not entitled to make the agreement for submission which they did, and the submission was ultra vires. It was said for the defendants that the Waterworks Clauses Acts did not enable a corporation to bind their shareholders to make compensation for injury which might be sustained after the time of the assessment. The first question is whether the submission and assessment are under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, which is incorporated by the Private Act under which the defendants diverted the streams. Now I think that sect. 22 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, gives no power to refer, and that the word "agreement" in that section means an agreement as to value, not an agreement for reference; but whether this is so or not, I think that under that section a tenant for life cannot bind a remainderman, although he might bind himself; for the remainderman is not bound by the decision of any person who settles the amount of compensation to be paid, unless that person is chosen by the remainderman himself, or else is a person invested with power by the Act. Therefore, if there is to be an arbitration to assess the amount of compensation to be paid, it should be carried out by persons who have a right by the statute to act. The umpire is to be selected by the arbitrators, and no one else by the Act has power to bind the remainderman. Now it is clear that in the present case the person who assessed the amount of compensation to be paid was not chosen by the arbitrators, but was selected by two justices. Therefore this assessment of compensation cannot be binding if it is to be regarded as an arbitration, but if it is to be regarded as a valuation within the meaning of sect. 9, I think it is binding. It is said on behalf of the defendants that it is not within sect. 9, because compensation is sought for injury by diversion as compensation for injuriously affecting, not for taking the property of the claimant, for that sect. 9 applies only to cases of taking property, and not to cases where compensation is sought for property which has been injuriously affected. The question as to whether diverting a stream is taking property or injuriously affecting it, is one which has been decided by judicial authority. In Ferrand v. The Corporation of Bradford (21 Beav. 412), Lord Romilly, M.R., decided that where there was a taking of water from a stream under the Waterworks Clauses Act, the property of a person claiming compensation was to be valued, as if his land were taken; but the present Master of the Rolls (Sir G. Jessel) differed from that decision, and came to a contrary conclusion in Bush v. The Trowbridge Waterworks Company (32 L. T. Rep. N.S. 182; L. Rep. 19 Eq. 291; 44 L. J. 235, Ch.), and decided that the person claiming compensation cannot say that any property of his is taken, but can only claim for property injuriously affected. If the question depended on the conflicting decisions of the two Masters of the Rolls, we should have to decide which of the two, in our opinion, ought to be followed; but the Court of Appeal took the view of the present Master of the Rolls, and affirmed his decision (33 L. T. Rep. N.S. 137; L. Rep. 10 Ch. 459; 44 L. J. 645, Ch.), and their decision is binding on us. If we had to determine the point for ourselves, we should have determined it as they have. Therefore this case comes under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, for the property of the plaintiff has been injuriously affected. Then can this be the subject of valuation under sect. 9? By that section, "the purchase-money or compensation to be paid for any lands to be purchased or taken from any party under any disability or incapacity, and not having the power to sell or convey such lands except under the provisions of this or the special Act, and the compensation to be paid for any permanent damage or injury to any such lands" is to be assessed in the way in which the compensation claimed by the plaintiff in this case has been assessed. The word "such," at first sight, appears to confine the provisions of the section to lands purchased or taken, but this construction is so nonsensical that it is impossible to give effect to it. A true canon of construction is, that if you can give effect to the exact words of any statute or other document, you are bound to do so, but if a word or phrase occurring in an Act of Parliament or agreement can have no sensible meaning, it must be eliminated. Therefore, the word "such" must be eliminated from the 9th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. Then the subjects dealt with by sect. 9, if we look at the general provisions of that section, are lands purchased or taken, or injuriously affected, and if this is so, compensation for permanent injury is within sect. 9; and so far as the plaintiff's property has been injuriously affected, it is within sect. 9, and may therefore be treated as matter for valuation. But it is said that the assessment is wrong, because it gave compensation for damage by diversion which had not yet taken place. The statement of claim says that the defendants had power to divert all the streams in respect of which compensation is assessed, so it is not a case where they had not power to do that for which the claim is made. Were that so, the agreement under which the compensation was assessed would be clearly ultra vires, but here the compensation is in respect of streams which the defendants had power to divert; for paragraph 4 of the statement of claim alleges that "the defendants gave notice to the plaintiff of their intention to divert and appropriate under the powers of the said first-mentioned Act, the whole of the said last-mentioned streams, springs, and waters;" that is, those supplying the plaintiff's mill, which, as alleged in paragraph 3, the defendants were empowered to divert and appropriate. I do not so much rely on that notice, but when the agreement under which the compensation has been assessed is referred to, it will be seen that it is recited that the defendants, who are the promoters of the waterworks, "intend from time to time to take, use, divert, and appropriate the streams, springs, and waters," for which the plaintiff claims compensation. Therefore, at the moment of the submission, they say that they are about to divert the whole of the water, which is equivalent to saying that they would shortly divert the whole. Yet it is said (the intention to divert the whole being expressed, and the arbitrator having notice of such intention) that the arbitrator was not entitled to assess compensation for the whole. It would seem almost insensible if we were to hold that if the defendants diverted part of the streams in May and the rest in June, there must be one assessment of compensation in May and another in June. I think the true interpretation is, that where there are diversions from time to time, there may be separate assessments, but it does not follow that if when compensation is assessed for the first diversion the persons having power to divert have given notice of their intention to divert further, there is anything to prevent the arbitrator from assessing compensation for all diversions of which notice has been given. Then the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847 (10 Vict. c. 17, s. 12) is relied on by which power is given to the undertakers (i.e. the persons authorised to construct the waterworks) from time to time to divert and impound the water from the streams mentioned for that purpose in the special Act, &c., "Provided always that in the exercise of the said powers the undertakers . . . shall make full compensation to all parties interested for all damage sustained by them through the exercise of such powers." It is argued from the use of the word "sustained" that it is only where the damage has taken place that compensation is to be made, but according to the common interpretation this would mean "sustained or to be sustained." Therefore the defendants and the plaintiff had a right to refer the matter for valuation under sect. 9 to have the amount of compensation assessed not only for diversion which had been made already, but also for that which was about to take place and of which notice had been given, and the valuer had authority to assess compensation in both instances. The case in the House of Lords, which has been referred to (Caledonian Railway Company v. Lockhart, 3 Macq. 808) only shows that where there are successive diversions there may be successive valuations; but it does not show that compensation may not be assessed for all diversions of which notice has been given. It therefore seems that the case is brought within sect. 9 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, and the claim to compensation is not invalidated by sect. 12 of the Waterworks Clauses Act. I think, therefore, that the case is within the statute, and that there is no ground for the argument that the submission was ultra vires, and the statement of claim is good.

ARCIBALD, J.—This is a statement of claim in which the plaintiff avers that he was tenant for life of a mill, and the defendants were authorised by statute to divert the streams which formed the principal supply of water to the mill, that they had given notice of intention to divert the whole of these streams, and had actually diverted some, and that the necessary effect of such diversion was to cause permanent injury and damage to the mill and premises of the plaintiff. It then sets out an agreement by which the plaintiff and defendants agree to nominate two surveyors to assess the amount of compensation to be paid for damage which might be caused by abstraction of the whole of the streams. It then goes on to say that the two surveyors disagreed, and a third was nominated by two justices and undertook the valuation; and it then gives his award assessing compensation for all damages which the plaintiff's premises may have sustained, or shall or may sustain by the diversion of the whole of the streams. To this statement of claim there is a demurrer on the ground that the award is ultra vires, because the Waterworks Clauses Act (10 Vict. c. 17, s. 12), provides that the undertakers may divert water from time to time, and shall make full compensation for all damage sustained. The question arises whether this reference to the surveyor was an arbitration within sect. 68 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act or a valuation within sect. 9. Sect. 9 gives power to make a valuation in respect of the money to be paid for lands purchased or taken from persons under disability and in respect of compensation for permanent damage or injury to any such lands. Here the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act and the Waterworks Clauses Act are incorporated in the special Act. The question on sect. 9 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act is whether the provisions of that section apply only to lands taken or extend also to lands injuriously affected. It has been pointed out in the argument that the words are larger than the language necessary for cases of purchase; but it is said on the other side that the expression "such lands" shows that compensation was not intended to be assessed under this section for lands not taken, but injuriously affected. I think the former argument must prevail. The only circumstance opposed to it is the use of the word "such;" and I agree with my brother Brett that it is a just canon of construction that where a word occurring in a statute would render the clause in which it occurs senseless it must be eliminated. If this were read without the word "such" it would be "the compensation to be paid for any permanent damage or injury to any lands." This interpretation seems to give sense and meaning to the clause, and to apply it to cases of compensation such as sect. 68 applies to. The umpire was appointed by the justices, and his award is a valuation, which gives the plaintiff all that he can require. The Waterworks Clauses Act gives power to divert from time to time, and at once give notice of intention to take the whole. It is recited in the agreement that the defendants have power to take the whole, and that they intend to do so, and the whole amount of compensation was very properly submitted to reference, and the arbitrators or umpire were entitled to find the whole amount. It follows that the defendants are bound by sect. 9, and therefore the plaintiff is entitled to a writ of mandamus. As to whether this may be a good reference under sect. 22 I do not mean to bind myself to any express opinion. It is clear that this comes under sect. 9, and therefore the demurrer must be overruled, and the statement of claim held sufficient.

ALLGOOD v. GIBSON.

Common of fishery—Profit à prendre—Claim by dwellers in parish and manor—Unreasonable custom.

A custom for the commoners, copyholders, and ancient freeholders of a manor and their tenants, and the dwellers in the parish and manor to have common of fishery over the lord's waters on the waste of the manor, and to take and carry away fish as a profit à prendre, is unreasonable and bad.

The statement of claim alleged that the plaintiff was possessed of certain lands and land covered with water, and of a sole and exclusive right of fishery, or several fishery, and that the defendant trespassed on the plaintiff's land, and infringed her right of fishery.

Statement of defence.

Para. 5. The defendant says that all the lands and land covered with water aforesaid are lands within the parish of Hexham and manor of Hexham aforesaid, and form part of the waste land of that manor, and that there is an ancient, laudable, and reasonable custom within the said manor, that all persons of the class of and being commoners, copyholders, ancient freeholders, and tenants of such commoners, copyholders, and ancient freeholders and dwellers in such parish and manor aforesaid, have a customary common of fishery over and in the lord of the manor's waters, and over the lord's land covered with water, forming part of the waste of and in the said manor, and that the defendant and his ancestors, and other persons of the above-mentioned class have always enjoyed such common of fishery uninterruptedly and peaceably from time immemorial and by prescription, and also in right of their customary tenements within the said manor, and that they have immemorially been accustomed without licence or leave of the lord of the manor, and still of right have common of fishery to fish, and take, and convey away fish from the lord's waters in the same waste as profits à prendre out of the lord's soil, and a right to enter upon the lands bordering on the lord's waters in the said waste for the above purposes.

6. The places in which the acts complained of in the third paragraph of the said statement are alleged to have taken place are within the waste land, and are part of the said manor, and of the lord's waters within it.

7. The defendant was at the times of the committing of the acts complained of, a tenant of a commoner, copyholder, and ancient freeholder within the said manor, as well as a commoner in the said manor, and a dweller in the parish of Hexham, and in the said manor; and the defendant was and is therefore entitled to enter and go upon the lands and to fish in the waters mentioned in the first paragraph of the said statement.

8. The acts complained of were committed in the defendant's exercise of his said right as a tenant of a commoner in right of his customary tenements, as also as a commoner as aforesaid.

Demurrer to paragraphs 5, 6, 7, and 8 of the statement of defence.

Herschell, Q.C. (Gainsford Bruce with him) for the plaintiff.—The custom alleged is bad. The words "the above-mentioned class" include all dwellers in the parish, but you cannot have such a custom to enjoy a profit à prendre existing as to such a class:

Race v. Ward, 4 E. & B. 702; 24 L. J. 153, Q.B.;

Bland v. Lipscombe, 4 E. & B. 713 (note); 24 L. J. 155, Q.B.; 24 L. T. Rep. O. S. 92.

The custom must be bad, unless it is confined to a custom of the manor as between the lord and the tenants. A custom to take fish cannot be unlimited. It was so held as to turbary in Wilson v. Willes (7 East 121); Lord Ellenborough there says, "A custom, however ancient, must not be indefinite and uncertain; and here it is not defined what sort of improvement the custom extends to. . . . There is nothing to restrain the tenants from taking the whole of the turbary of the common and destroying the pasture altogether.

HOWES AND ANOTHER (pets.) v. TURNER AND ANOTHER (resps.).

[C.P. Div.]

A custom of this description ought to have some limit; but here there is no limitation to the custom as laid but caprice and fancy."

McClmont for the defendant.—The custom is good, and the want of an allegation of stint is no objection. Taking turf or sand without stint would injure the freehold, which makes a distinction between customs of that sort and the custom claimed here. In Davies' case (3 Mod. 246) a prescription claimed by the defendants for themselves, their tenants and farmers to fowl on another person's land was held not to be too large, and fishing is a right of exactly the same nature: (Wickham v. Hawker, 7 M. & W. at p. 79). In Hall v. Nottingham (L. Rep. 1 Ex. Div. 1, 45 L. J. 50, Ex.; 33 L. T. Rep. N.S. 697), a custom for all the inhabitants of a parish to enter on land and erect a maypole and dance round it, and enjoy other lawful recreations at any times in the year was held good; and a custom for all the inhabitants of a parish to play at all lawful games at all reasonable times of the year on another person's ground was held good in Fitch v. Rawlins (2 H. B. 394). See also,

Commissioners of Sewers of the City of London v. Glasse, L. Rep. 7 Ch. 456; 41 L. J. 409, Ch.; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 647;

Warwick v. Queen's College, Oxford, L. Rep. 6 Ch. 716; 40 L. J. 780, Ch.; 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 254.

The Court did not call for a reply.

BRETT, J.—The statement of claim is for trespass to land alleged to be in the possession of the plaintiff, and also to land covered with water, which is also alleged to belong to the plaintiff. Paragraph 5 of the statement of defence sets up that the lands were part of the waste land of a manor, and then sets up a custom under which the defendant seeks to justify the alleged trespasses. The defendant's contention must come to this—that the plaintiff had encroached on the waste land of the manor, but was in actual possession, and then the defendant must be ready to justify as if against the lord of the manor. The question is whether all commoners, copyholders, and ancient freeholders, and tenants of such commoners, copyholders, and ancient freeholders, can have the right here claimed, and whether not only persons belonging to those classes, but also all dwellers, it may be in the manor, or it may be in the parish, can have the same right, if they are neither commoners, copyholders, or ancient freeholders, nor tenants of such persons. Two objections are taken to the custom alleged. It is said to be so large as to be unreasonable, and therefore void in two particulars. First, assuming that it is claimed by the proper persons, it is said to be too large, as being a right to take fish in an indefinite quantity. I am not prepared to say that it would be void on that ground, but secondly, it is objected to as being a right claimed to belong to too many persons. Assuming that the custom would be good if it were confined to commoners, copyholders, and ancient freeholders, and the tenants of persons of these classes, still I think that, inasmuch as the right is alleged to exist in others besides these, namely, all dwellers in the parish or manor, the claim is too large, for the number of people for whom it is made is unreasonable, and therefore the custom is void. The custom set up is one and indivisible, and is bad as alleged in the statement of defence. Our judgment, therefore, must be for the plaintiff.

GROVE, J.—I have very little to add. I think it cannot be contended with any show of reason that all "dwellers" in a parish or manor, (an expression which is so vague that one cannot properly call them a class) can have a customary right to fish in another person's river. None of the cases which were cited at all supported the defendant's contention. The case of the maypole (Hall v. Nottingham, ubi sup.) is perfectly distinct from this. It may be a reasonable custom for the inhabitants to dance on the green, but a custom for all the dwellers to take the profits of a valuable property which would otherwise belong to an individual only requires to be mentioned to show how unreasonable it would be, for it would ruin the property over which it was exercised. Besides there is a distinct authority against the validity of such a custom. In the Commissioners of Sewers of the City of London v. Glasse (L. Rep. 7 Ch. at p. 465) James, L.J. says "It is settled and clear law that you cannot have any right to a profit à prendre in alieno solo in a shifting body like the inhabitants of a town or residents of a particular district." This is a clear authority that the custom claimed in the present case is bad, and our judgment must be for the plaintiff. As to the mode in which the custom is alleged, there may be some doubt as to how far it could exist in all the commoners, copyholders, and ancient freeholders, and their tenants; for supposing the tenants of the manor were to cut up their holdings into very small divisions, it may be doubtful whether the right of fishing could be exercised by every occupier to whom the tenants sublet. It is not necessary to express an opinion as to whether this could be so or not; but the Epping Forest case (Commissioners of Sewers of the City of London v. Glasse, ubi sup.) does not go that length, for there the owners and occupiers who claimed common of pasture claimed it as appendant and appurtenant to their lands and tenements. The words there are very different from the words in which the custom is alleged here. In that case there were tenements in which the right existed. I have no doubt that the custom here claimed is bad.

HOWES AND ANOTHER (pets.) v. TURNER AND ANOTHER (resps.)

Municipal Elections Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 40, s. 1, sub-sect. 1)—Notice by town clerk—Time for delivery of nomination papers—Objection to nomination—Decision of mayor—Withdrawal of nomination paper—Jurisdiction of court to decide on petition.

An objection to the nomination of a candidate at a municipal election, on the ground that the notice, which by 38 & 39 Vict. c. 40, s. 1, sub-sect. 1, is to be given by the town clerk nine days at least before the election, is invalid, is not an objection to be decided by the mayor under sub-sect. 3, but may be taken by petition.

If the notice is such as to mislead a material part of the electors the election is void.

O.P. Div.]

HOWES AND ANOTHER (pets.) v. TURNER AND ANOTHER (resps.).

[O.P. Div.]

An objection that a nomination paper was delivered too late is not an objection to the nomination paper within the meaning of sub-sect. 3 so as to make the mayor's decision disallowing the objection final.

The town clerk gave notice of a municipal election in due time, but the notice directed candidates to deliver their nomination papers on a day which by sub-sect. 3 was too late. The petitioners and the respondent W. delivered their nomination papers in proper time. The respondent T. delivered his on the day named in the notice. Afterwards W. took away his paper to correct a supposed error, and re-delivered it after the proper time for delivery. The petitioners objected before the mayor to the nomination of the respondents. The mayor disallowed the objection, the election was held, and the respondents were elected.

Held, on a special case, that the mayor's decision was not final, and that the court had jurisdiction to decide the question raised by the petition.

Held, also, that W.'s taking away the nomination paper was not such a withdrawal as to avoid his nomination.

Held, also, that the notice was such as to mislead the electors, and therefore the election was void, and there must be a new election.

A PETITION had been presented by Richard Howes and William John Pierce against the return of Richard Turner and Thomas Wright as councillors for the East Ward of the borough of Northampton. By order of Denman J. the questions raised by the petition were stated in the form of a special case, which was as follows:

1. The borough of Northampton, in the county of Northampton, is a borough incorporated under the name of "The Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of the Borough of Northampton," having a mayor, six aldermen, and eighteen councillors. The said borough is divided into three wards, one of which is called and known by the name of the East Ward. The East Ward is represented in the council of the said borough by six councillors, who are elected from the burgesses duly qualified in that behalf. Two of such councillors retire annually on the 1st Nov., when two fresh ones are elected or the same re-elected.

2. On the 19th Oct. 1875 Mr. Wm. Shoosmith, the town clerk for the said borough, published a notice that the nomination papers of candidates at the forthcoming election of two councillors for the wards of the said borough were to be delivered to him at his office before 5 p.m. on Saturday the 23rd Oct. 1875, and that the mayor of the said borough, Mr. Wm. Adkins, would attend at the town hall on Monday the 25th Oct. 1875, from 2 to 4 in the afternoon to hear and decide objections to nomination papers.

3. The petitioners, being duly qualified burgesses, were nominated as candidates at the said election for the East Ward, and their respective nomination papers were duly signed by properly qualified persons, and were duly delivered to the town clerk before 5 p.m. on Friday the 22nd Oct. 1875, in accordance with the Municipal Elections Act 1875.

4. The respondent, Thomas Wright, being also a duly qualified burgess, was nominated as a candidate at the said election for the East Ward, and his nomination paper in like manner signed in the manner hereinafter appearing was delivered to the town clerk before 5 p.m. on Friday the 22nd Oct. 1875, in accordance with the said Act, and was accepted and received by the said town clerk as a due and proper nomination of the said Thomas Wright, and the said town clerk placed the said nomination paper with the other papers relating to the said election. Afterwards on the same day the said Thomas Wright, without the sanction, authority, or knowledge of the town clerk obtained the said nomination paper from one of the town clerk's clerks (who had no authority to give up the same) for the purpose of getting one of the proposers who had signed one of his Christian names abbreviated to sign it in full, and the said Thomas Wright, having got the signature altered accordingly, delivered back the said nomination paper at the town clerk's office on the following day before 5 p.m.

5. The respondent, Richard Turner, being also a duly qualified burgess, was nominated as a candidate at the said election for the East Ward, and his nomination paper, duly signed, was delivered to the town clerk before 5 p.m. on Saturday the 23rd Oct. 1875.

6. On the said 23rd Oct. 1875 the said mayor of the said borough did not attend at the town hall, but on Monday the 25th Oct. 1875, according to the above-mentioned notice of the town clerk, he attended at the town hall between the hours of 2 and 4 p.m., as mentioned in the said statute, to decide on the validity of objections made to nomination papers. An agent on behalf of the petitioner, William John Peirce, then appeared before the mayor, and contended that the nomination of the respondents was not legal, and ought not to be allowed. The mayor, having heard the said contention, disallowed the objection. No objection was made to the right or authority of the mayor then to hear such contention and to determine such objection.

7. On the said 25th Oct. 1875 the town clerk published the names of the petitioners and respondents as candidates for the office of councillors in the East Ward in the form required by the statute, and notice was given that the elections for the said ward would be proceeded with on the 1st Nov. 1875 according to notice.

8. On the 1st Nov. 1875 the poll was taken in the usual manner for all the four candidates aforesaid, when the returning officer declared the respondents duly elected by a majority of votes to fill the two vacancies in the said East Ward.

9. On the 20th Nov. 1875 the said petition in this case was duly filed, but it was not served upon the returning officer, nor was any notice thereof given to him, and on the 11th Jan. 1876 the order of the honourable Mr. Justice Denman was made herein.

The questions for the opinion of the court are:

1. Whether the election of the respondents, under the circumstances, can be questioned by petition?

2. Whether the respondents were duly elected and returned, or whether the petitioners were elected and ought to have been so returned pursuant to the statute in that behalf, or whether there ought to be a fresh election?

By the Municipal Elections Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 40), s. 1. "The following provisions shall be enacted and apply to nominations at all municipal elections of councillors, auditors, and assessors after the passing of this Act:

HOWES AND ANOTHER (pets.) v. TURNER AND ANOTHER (resps.).

[C.P. Div.]

1. Nine days at least before any such election the town clerk shall prepare, sign, and publish a notice in the form No. 1 set forth in the first schedule to this Act, or to the like effect, by causing the same to be placed on the door of the town hall, and in some conspicuous parts of the borough or ward for which any such election is to be held.

2. At any such election every candidate shall be nominated in writing; the writing shall be subscribed by two enrolled burgesses of such borough or ward as proposer and seconder, and by eight other enrolled burgesses of such borough or ward as assenting to the nomination. . . .

3. Every nomination paper subscribed as aforesaid shall be delivered by the candidate himself or his proposer and seconder to the town clerk, seven days at least before the day of election, and before five o'clock in the afternoon of the last day on which any such nomination paper may by law be delivered; the town clerk shall forthwith send notice of such nomination to each person nominated. The mayor shall attend at the town hall on the day next after the last day for the delivery of nominations to the town clerk between the hours of two and four in the afternoon, and shall decide on the validity of every objection made to a nomination paper, such objection to be made in writing. The candidate nominated by each nomination paper and one other person appointed by or on behalf of the candidate as hereinafter mentioned, and no person other than aforesaid, shall, except for the purpose of assisting the mayor, be entitled to attend such proceedings, and each candidate and the person appointed by him shall, during the time appointed for the attendance of the mayor for the purposes of this section have respectively power to object to the nomination paper of every person nominated at the same election. The decision of the mayor, which shall be given in writing, shall, if disallowing any objection to a nomination paper, be final, but if allowing the same shall be subject to reversal on petition questioning the election or return.

SECT. 11. In reckoning time for the purpose of this Act, Sunday, Christmas Day, Good Friday, and any day set apart for a public holiday, fast, or public thanksgiving, shall be excluded.

By sect. 1 of the Corrupt Practices (Municipal Elections) Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 60),

The election of any person at an election for a borough or ward may be questioned by petition before an election court constituted as hereinafter in this Act provided, and hereinafter in this Act referred to as the "court," on the ground that the election of such person was avoided by corrupt practices or offences against this Act committed at the election, or on the ground that he was at the time of the election disqualified for election to the office for which the election was held, or on the ground that he was not duly elected by a majority of lawful votes.

An election shall not, except in the manner provided by this Act, be questioned upon an information in the nature of a quo warranto, or by or in any process or manner whatsoever for a matter for which it might be questioned under the provisions of this Act.

Cave, Q.C. (A. L. Smith with him), for the petitioners.—The petitioners are entitled to be declared duly elected, for they are the only candidates who have complied with the provisions of 38 & 39 Vict. c. 40, s. 1, subsect. 3 as to delivery of nomination papers. The delivery of the respondent Wright's nomination paper, though valid at first, was avoided by his taking it away, and the subsequent delivery was too late. If after he had taken away the nomination paper he had never returned it at all he would clearly have been disqualified, and his having redelivered the paper when it was too late cannot get rid of the disqualification. This was not an objection to a nomination paper, which the mayor could hear, and on which his decision, if he disallowed the objection, would be final. Here there was no nomination paper before the mayor; there had been no proper nomination. The objections as to which the mayor is to decide are objections such as those to the description of a candidate, which he would be peculiarly well qualified to decide; see the Ballot Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 33) sched. 1 rules 6, 12, 13. The mayor's jurisdiction applies only to objections that can be decided on inspection of the nomination papers. Assuming that the mayor's decision is not final, this is a proper subject for petition, the petitioner could not have proceeded by information in the nature of a quo warranto (35 & 36 Vict. c. 60, s. 12). The respondents were not qualified, and therefore were not duly nominated; therefore the votes given for them were void, and the petitioners are elected. He also referred to

Reg. v. Parkinson, L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 11; 37 L. J. 52, Q. B.; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 169.

J. O. Griffiths, Q.C. (Anstie with him), for the respondents.—The giving of a proper notice of the election by the town clerk is not a condition precedent to the validity of the election; the clause is directory only. The defect, if there is one, is not such a defect as can be taken advantage of by petition, for the right to petition is given by 35 & 36 Vict. c. 60, s. 12, which does not extend to cases where the nomination is questioned. As to the nomination papers, the mayor has jurisdiction to see that they are in the proper form and are delivered in time. It was not intended that there should be any appeal from the decision of the mayor, except where a nomination paper was rejected; here there has been no such rejection, and therefore the mayor's decision is final. The respondent Wright's nomination paper having been delivered to and accepted by the town clerk, Wright had become duly nominated as a candidate, and his subsequent act in taking back the paper could not make him cease to be a candidate; it was not a withdrawal, for he could only withdraw by giving notice according to the terms of 38 & 39 Vict. c. 40, s. 7. Therefore Wright was duly elected. If the respondents' contention is wrong, and the election is invalid, the petitioners cannot be held to have been duly elected, but there must be a new election.

Cave, Q.C. in reply.

BRETT, J.—The material fact of this case is that the notice given by the town clerk under 38 & 39 Vict. c. 40, s. 1, was bad in this particular, that though it was issued in proper time, it gave notice that the nominations were to be given in on the 23rd Oct., whereas it should have been the 22nd. The petitioners were nominated, and their nominations were sent in insufficient time, as also was that of one of the respondents, but on the same day he takes it away, to correct it, as he thought. The nomination of the other respondent was sent in within the time named by the town clerk, but not in proper time. An objection was taken on this ground, but the mayor decided against it, and the election was held. The petitioners, relying on the validity of their objection, did not poll their voters, and the two respondents were elected. It has been suggested on behalf of the petitioners that the notice given by the town clerk was void because it has not followed the terms prescribed by the section of the Act, and the question is raised whether we can declare it to be void. It is said for the respondents that we have no jurisdiction, for we are not the election court, but that the only remedy is in the nature of a quo warranto; the other side says that we have jurisdiction. The question is, are we bound if there is a defect in the notice to say that the election is void, or are we at liberty to hold that some defects in the notice would have the effect of avoiding the election, but others would not, and then what is the effect of what has been done in this case? It is suggested that the mayor having decided as to the validity of the objection, his decision is final and we cannot review it. With regard to the decision of the mayor, the question seems to us not to be one, arising on the form of the nomination paper, but as to the time within which the nominations were to be sent in, and as to whether the nominations were void; it is not an objection to the paper, and both the grounds of objection might exist without there being any defect in the paper. By sect. 1 sub-sect. 3 it is enacted that the mayor shall attend at the town hall on the day next after the last day for the delivery of nominations to the town clerk between the hours of two and four in the afternoon, and shall decide on the validity of every objection made to a nomination paper. We think that the only office of the mayor is to decide as to objections arising on the nomination paper, and this was not a question for the mayor to decide, and therefore it is open to us. Then as to the delivering back of the nomination paper, the paper was sent in in proper time at first. The Christian name of the proposer was written with an abbreviation, but it was not such an abbreviation as would render the nomination invalid; therefore it was a good nomination paper. If the paper had been withdrawn, and the candidate in withdrawing it had intended that the nomination should be withdrawn, but he had afterwards changed his mind, this might have amounted to a withdrawal of the nomination. As at present advised I should say that in such a case as that the second delivery of the nomination paper would be equivalent to a first delivery, and would, therefore, be too late, and the same would be the case if at first there were a bad nomination owing to a defect in the paper, and it were taken away to be corrected, and when it was redelivered the time for delivery had elapsed. But where the nomination was in the first instance good, and the paper was withdrawn, not in order to withdraw the nomination, but for another purpose, and redelivered after the time for delivery had expired, I do not think that this makes the nomination void. The two petitions were nominated in time, and one of the respondents was also nominated in time, but the nomination of the other respondent was too late, because he was misled by the notice of the town clerk, who made a mistake, which might very easily be made before the question had been decided. I am of opinion that the notice was wrong, but we have to decide whether this is the proper court to say whether it is wrong in such a manner as to avoid the election. We cannot decide more than the Election Court could decide under the Corrupt Practices (Municipal Elections) Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 60) ss. 12 to 15. Sect. 12, after enunciating certain other causes for which a municipal election may be questioned, says that it may be questioned on the ground that the person elected was at the time of the election disqualified for election to the office for which the election was held; it follows that the person elected may therefore be petitioned against, and the election may be declared void because the disqualification existed. It has been suggested that this provision refers only to personal disqualifications, and that if any other kind of disqualification is suggested the proper remedy would be by information in the nature of a quo warranto; but at the end of the same section there is a provision that an election shall not, except in manner provided by the Act, be questioned upon an information in the nature of a pro warranto, or by or in any process or manner whatsoever for a matter for which it might be questioned under the provisions of the Act. If the first part of the section applied merely to personal disqualifications, as there is nothing provided by the Act for the trial of questions relating to the validity of elections except a petition, it would appear that an election could not be questioned at all for any disqualification which was not a personal one. This seems to show that disqualification is not to be construed in such a confined sense as that contended for on behalf of the respondents. All inquiry under the Act is to be by petition, and by ss. 12—15 this court has the same power in municipal as it has in parliamentary election petitions. The Legislature intended all decisions of all questions by which a parliamentary election could have been avoided before this court had jurisdiction to be decided by this court, and also, by these sections to which I have referred, this court has the same jurisdiction in cases of municipal elections. I think, therefore, that we have jurisdiction to determine what was the effect of the notice of the town clerk. It is said that, although this notice was given in time, yet because it was wrong in its terms it was void; it is said that if there is any defect which causes the notice not to be like the form given in the schedule to the statute, then the notice is void necessarily, although no one may have been misled by it. I cannot think this is so; I think that even if the notice is only to the same effect as the form provided by the statute, but differs from that form in some particulars, it is not necessarily void. But I think if the defect is so great as to persuade the court that the electors, or a material part of them, were misled, so as to cause the election to be contrary to the real views of the constituency, and this result has fairly and reasonably been brought about by a defect in the notice, the court has power to say that the notice is void, and if it is void it seems that every person nominated as a candidate for election would be disqualified, and the election would be void. Here it is clear that one candidate, the person who had a majority of votes at the election, was misled by the defect in the notice. We cannot say which of the two petitioners would be elected if we simply declared that the respondent Turner was not duly elected. The defect in the notice may have or might have misled others, and it seems to be such a defect as misled an important part of the constituency; and so the notice and nomination were bad, which made the whole election void, and all the petitioners and respondents were disqualified. I think the proper decision is that this election is void, and there must be a new election.

C.P. Div.]

HOWES AND ANOTHER (pets) v. TURNER AND ANOTHER (resps.).

[O.P. Div.]

DENMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The first point is as to the power of the mayor, and as to that I agree with my brother Brett that 38 & 39 Vict. c. 40, s. 1, sub-sect. 3, was not intended to give the mayor so strong a power as to enable him to dispense with the necessity for delivering the nomination papers on the statutory day; the questions as to the day of delivering the nomination papers, and as to the effect of the notice were beyond the jurisdiction of the mayor. It follows, that if the mayor had no power, this court must decide the matter, for the question arises whether the candidates were disqualified, or whether those who were elected were not duly elected by a majority of lawful votes. Unless this is a casus omissus, I think it is a case within sect. 12 of the Corrupt Practices (Municipal Elections) Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 60). On the facts stated in the special case, it was directly in question whether certain persons were disqualified, and whether certain persons were duly elected by a majority of lawful votes. It is contended that this court has no power to avoid the election, but I think that would be an erroneous conclusion. By sect. 15 of the Corrupt Practices (Municipal Elections) Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 60), this court has jurisdiction. That statute imposes on the court the duty of first seeing whether on the facts of the case, or according to law, the person declared elected was properly elected, or if any other persons were elected, and if the court cannot say either that the person declared elected was properly elected, or that some other person was, the court has power to declare the election void. Now in this case can the court do justice by declaring that any person is entitled to be considered duly elected, or are we driven to the alternative of declaring the election void? I think justice cannot be done except by adopting the latter course. We can not say that any one or more of the candidates were properly rejected or elected. Consequently the election is void, and there must be a new one.

ARCHIBALD, J.—I am of the same opinion. Questions are raised as to the effect of the nomination papers, and as to the jurisdiction of the mayor. I agree with my brothers Brett and Denman as to the power of the mayor, that it only extends to deciding on objections arising on the face of the nomination paper, and that he cannot decide whether a candidate is qualified or not. I think that the respondent, Wright's nomination paper, if it was good, was never withdrawn with the intention of withdrawing the nomination, and, as to its validity, writing the proposer's Christian name "Fredk" is sufficient. If the paper was invalid, and were taken away and amended, I think it would be right to say that it would be invalid if it were redelivered after the proper day for delivery, but it is not necessary to decide that point, for our decision rests on the ground that the notice was invalid. The statute 38 & 39 Vict. c. 40, which repeals 22 Vict. c. 35, s. 5, provides by sect. 1, sub-sect. 1, that nine days at least before the election, the town clerk shall give a notice in the form in the schedule or to the like effect, and specifies how the notice is to be published, and by sub-sect. 3 every nomination paper is to be delivered seven days at least before the day of election. This was the ordinary annual election. The town clerk gave the notice wrong; two candidates, the petitioners, were in time in delivering their nomination papers, and the respondent Wright was also in time, but the respondent Turner was too late. Then was he misled? The only inference is that in consequence of having received insufficient notice he delivered his nomination paper on the 23rd. Without necessarily considering whether the provisions as to notice are directory or compulsory, it is enough to say that if they are directory, and the candidate is misled through their not having been followed, it is a bad notice. In this case the defect in the notice did mislead one of the candidates, and caused him to send in his nomination paper too late, and there has not been a proper election by the voice of the constituency. It is said then we have no jurisdiction to decide this case, but I think that the Corrupt Practices (Municipal Elections) Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 60) shows that the intention was to transfer all such trials to the Election Court created by that Act, with power to reserve questions of law for the Court of Common Pleas. Sect. 12 of that Act provides for questioning an election on the ground of disqualification in terms which on one reading may appear somewhat restricted, but I do not think that they need be so read, and sect. 15, sub-sect. 4, shows that the court is to decide whether the election is void absolutely, or whether it ought to be held invalid on the ground stated in sect. 12, that the candidate was disqualified. I think we must hold this election void, and order another to be held.

Judgment accordingly without costs.

A company carrying on business as ironfounders, in making a return of their annual profits and gains under schedule D for the purpose of assessment to the income tax, are not entitled to claim a deduction in respect of a sum of money annually set apart by them out of their net profits, in accordance with their articles of association, for "depreciation of buildings, fixed plant, and machinery," the amount so set aside being net profits and an addition to capital, and not a sum expended in repairs, and the deduction, therefore, being contrary to 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 100, schedule D, case 1, rule 3.

So held by the Exchequer Division (Kelly, C.B. and Pollock and Huddleston, BB.), approving the case of Addie v. the Solicitor of Inland Revenue (in the Scotch Court), 12 Scotch Law Rep. 274.

THIS was a case stated for the opinion of the court pursuant to the provisions of 37 Vict. c. 16, ss. 8 and 9, in the matter of an appeal of Andrew Handyside and Company (Limited), against an assessment to income tax under schedule D, made upon them by the commissioners for the district of

CASE.

For the year 1874-1875, an assessment under schedule D was made by the commissioners for the district above named upon Andrew Handyside and Company (Limited), a company carrying on the business of iron foundries in the parish of St. Alkmene, in Derby.

The assessment made upon the company was 8642*l.*, the amount taken from their own report, and therein specified as net profits; but in this amount a sum of 1509*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* is shown as "amount written off for depreciation of buildings, fixed plant, and machinery." (a) The company (the now respondents) on their appeal to the commissioners on the 29th June 1875, produced a balance sheet for the year ended on the 29th June 1874, being their first year of trading, and objected to the charge in respect of the sum of 1509*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.*; and contended that, inasmuch as such sum had no real existence, but was written off in the accounts in accordance with the articles of association, as the works must of necessity depreciate from year to year, and as the sum expended in repairs could not entirely replace such depreciation, they were justified in writing off that amount as a deduction. (b).

The surveyor (the now appellant) objected that the sum appealed against was a deduction in respect of capital, and as such was contrary to the provisions of the 3rd rule of section 100 of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, that no allowance for depreciation was provided for in the said Act, and that sect. 159 prohibited any deductions being made except those expressly enumerated in the Act.

The majority of the commissioners, however, being of opinion that persons in trade were equitably entitled to write off from their profits each year a sum for depreciation, and that the amount claimed was fair and reasonable, decided in favour of the company.

The surveyor being dissatisfied with such decision, requested that a case for the opinion of the court should be stated.

The opinion of the court is therefore desired as to whether the appellants (the now respondents, the company) are justified in making and should be allowed the deduction of 1509*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* claimed by them for depreciation.

The material parts of the Act of Parliament

(a) In the course of the argument it was admitted that the company had, as they might properly do, written off a certain amount for repairs actually done.

(b) The 138th article of the company's articles of association on which they relied as above mentioned is as follows: "The directors may from time to time, before recommending any dividend, set aside out of the net profits of the company such sum as they think proper as a reserve fund, for the purpose of meeting contingencies, or of purchasing, improving, enlarging, rebuilding, restoring, reinstating, or maintaining the works, plant, and other premises or property of the company, or the erection or construction of new buildings, works, or plant, or for equalising dividends, or for any other purposes connected with the business of the company, or in furtherance of any of the objects of the company; and the same may be applied accordingly from time to time in such manner as the directors may determine. The reserve fund, or such part thereof for the time being as is not invested as hereinafter provided, may be used for the general purposes of the company. The interest of the reserve fund shall be treated as annual profits of the company."

(5 & 6 Vict. c. 35) relied on by the Crown and referred to in the case and the judgment of the court, are the third rule to the first case in Schedule (D) sect. 100, of the Act, and sect. 159.

Rule 3 is as follows:

Third, in estimating the profits and gains chargeable under Schedule (D), or for the purpose of assessing the duty thereon, no sum shall be set against or deducted from, or allowed to be set against or deducted from such profits or gains on account of any sum expended for repairs of premises occupied for the purpose of such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, nor for any sum expended for the supply or repairs, or alteration of any implements, utensils, or articles employed for the purpose of such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, beyond the sum annually expended for such purposes according to an average of three years preceding the year in which such assessment shall be made; nor on account of any loss not connected with or arising out of such trade; nor on account of any capital withdrawn therefrom; nor for any sum employed or intended to be employed as capital in such trade, &c.; nor for any capital employed in improvement of premises occupied for the purpose of such trade, &c.; nor on account or under pretence of any interest which might have been made on such sums if laid out at interest; nor for any debts except bad debts proved to be such to the satisfaction of the commissioners respectively; nor for any average loss beyond the actual amount of loss after adjustment; nor for any sum recoverable under an indenture or contract of indemnity.

Sect. 159 enacts:

That in the computation of duty to be made under this Act in any of the cases before mentioned, either by the party making or delivering any list or statement required as aforesaid, or by the respective assessors or commissioners, it shall not be lawful to make any other deductions therefrom than such as are expressly enumerated in this Act, nor to make any deduction on account of any annual interest, annuity, or other annual payment to be paid to any persons out of any profits or gains chargeable by this Act, in regard to a proportionate part of the duty so to be charged is allowed to be deducted on making such payments; nor to make any deduction from the profits or gains arising from any property herein described, or from any office or employment of profit on account of diminution of capital employed, or of loss sustained in any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, or in any profession, employment, or vocation.

Pinder (with whom were the Attorney-General (Sir J. Holker, Q.C.) and the Solicitor-General (Sir H. S. Giffard, Q.C.), for the Crown, contended that the company were not entitled to the deduction which they claimed in respect of this sum of 1509*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.*, set aside by them to meet the expected yearly depreciation in their machinery and works. Admitting the company to be justified under their 138th article of association, in writing off this sum, the deduction is one which cannot possibly be allowed in law, being quite contrary to the express terms of the Act of Parliament: (see Rule 3, case 1, schd. D., sect. 100; and sect. 159 of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35). They have already claimed in their account and been allowed a sum for repairs; but this amount now claimed is no more or less than an addition to or an investment of capital. This precise point of depreciation was before the First Division of the Scottish Court in Feb. 1875, in the case of Addie and Sons v. The Solicitor of Inland Revenue (12 Scottish Law Rep. 274), and the short judgment of the Lord President (in which the three other Lords of Session concurred), is so completely in point, and so decisive of the present question, that I will read it as my argument on the part of the Crown on the present occasion. His Lordship said, "The appellants have been assessed under schedule D. in respect of profits from their business of ironmasters, and they claimed to have deducted from such profits two sums of 5525*l.* and 4435*l.*, as a percentage for pit sinking and depreciation of buildings and machinery, upon the ground that the sinking of new pits, though only an occasional thing, is still part of what may fairly be called the annual expenditure, necessarily incurred in realising the profits from their trade. There is, I think, only one point to be determined here, and not two, as represented, because the machinery and buildings connected with a pit appear to me to be just part of the pit itself. It is one compound structure necessary for the working of the mine, and the question is whether, under the special rules of the Income Tax Act, they are entitled to deduct something on account of the amount expended in making a new pit. Now I am quite clear that the making of a new pit in a trade of this kind is, in every sense of the term, just an expenditure of capital. It is an investment of money, of capital, and must be placed to capital account in every properly kept book applicable to such a concern. Now if that be so, it seems to me that the provision of the third rule under the first head of sect. 100 of the Property Tax Act, is conclusive upon the question before us, because it is there provided that in estimating the balance of profits and gains chargeable under schedule D., or for the purpose of assessing the duty thereon, no sum shall be set against, or deducted from, or be allowed to be set against, or be deducted from, such profits or gains on account of any sum employed, or intended to be employed, as capital in such trade. It seems to me that it is quite unnecessary to go beyond that one part of the statute. No doubt some support may be had also from the 159th section, but I think this rule is in itself perfectly conclusive. As soon as you ascertain that this is an expenditure of capital, there is an end to any proposal to deduct anything in respect of it, and on that simple ground I think the judgment of the commissioners right."

Grantham, for the respondents, the company, contra, was called on by the court.—This point has never been discussed or decided by any court except in the Scotch case now cited on the part of the Crown, and which I submit does not apply. In the case, as that was, of a mine, and a pit, and machinery for bringing up coal, where a new shaft is sunk or opened, it is a new concern, and an investment of new capital. But here, in these heavy ironworks, the wear and tear is great, and the actual work causes a very large depreciation in the machinery and works, &c., every year, which cannot be met by mere repair. [KELLY, C.B.—Were it not for the words of the Act of Parliament I should be inclined to think that the view of the matter would be in your favour.] No doubt the words of the Act are strong, but I submit the present is a very different case from the Scotch mining case. That was, no doubt, a question of capital; but the present case does not come within the provision of the Act which was intended to apply to capital. The depreciation here cannot be met in any other way, and if this is not to be allowed, all the capital would in a few years be gone. No doubt—as my friend has argued—if the entire machinery is worn out in course of years, and is replaced by new, that would be charged to capital; but here it has to be reinstated every one or two years, piece by piece as it were;

it is a depreciation going on constantly, and not occurring entirely at any one time, and a clean sweep made once for all. No average for three years can be arrived at. Now the company has only been at work some eighteen months, and they are entitled to make the deduction now claimed; and at the end of three years, when the average amount of the repairs can be correctly calculated, they can be surcharged for any that may have been wrongly deducted. The rule in the sixth case in Schedule (D) to section 100 is applicable to the present case, and the commissioners, who are well qualified to judge in the matter, have decided on a fair and equitable view of the matter, and that decision the court will uphold.

Pinder was not called upon to reply.

KELLY, C.B.—Whatever may be our opinion of the justice and fairness as regards commercial or manufacturing interests, of some parts of this Act of Parliament upon which there is no case now before the court, and upon which I do not feel myself at liberty at all to comment, it is perfectly clear that upon the 3rd rule in the first case in schedule D of the Act, the respondents, the traders, are not entitled to the deduction which has been claimed by them. It appears that in the 138th article of the company's articles of association there is a provision that a reserve fund is to be formed, and before recommending a dividend, and of course, therefore, before they pay any, the company, perhaps very prudently and properly, agree to set aside from their net profits a sum as a reserve fund for the purpose of meeting contingencies. But what are those contingencies? They are a variety of matters which the company have no more right to deduct from the net profits and say that the net profits are thereby diminished and that they have not really netted that amount of profit, than they would have a right to deduct a sum which they might spend upon the purchase of a house or a carriage. What they say is that it is "for the purpose of meeting contingencies, or of altering, improving, enlarging, rebuilding, restoring, reconstructing, or maintaining the works, plant, and other premises or property of the company. Now I leave out the word "repairing," because it is admitted that they are entitled to deduct, and they have deducted, a sum for repairs; and we must take it for granted, as there is no appeal against that deduction on the one side or the other, that it is a proper deduction according to the Act of Parliament. The article then goes on to say, "or the erection or construction of new buildings, works, or plant, or for equalising dividends, or for any other purposes connected with the business of the company, or in furtherance of any of the objects of the company, and the same may be applied accordingly from time to time in such manner as the directors may determine." The question, then, is, are the company entitled to claim a deduction in respect of that portion of the reserve fund which they have set aside for the purpose of applying, or which they may have applied, to any of the purposes above mentioned besides repairs. No doubt they are empowered by their articles to set the amount aside and to apply it to any of the many purposes mentioned; but the case shows clearly that such sum is net profit, and in my opinion it is clearly contrary to the Act of Parliament that the deduction claimed should be allowed.

[Ex. Div.]

FORDER v. HANDYSIDE AND Co. (LIMITED.)

[Ex. Div.]

The Act is quite explicit, and admits of no doubtful or difficult question of construction. It says that in estimating the balance of profits and gains chargeable under schedule D, or for the purpose "of assessing the duty thereon, no sum shall be set against or deducted from, or allowed to be set against or deducted from, such profits or gains on account of any sum expended for repairs of premises, occupied for the purpose of such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, nor for any sum expended for the supply of, repairs, or alterations of any implements, utensils, or articles employed for the purpose of such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, beyond the sum usually expended for such purposes, according to an average of three years preceding the year in which such assessment shall be made." Now, just let us suppose that this business had been carried on for three or four years, and that the average sum actually expended for the necessary and usual repairs had been 500*l.* a year, the company, in that case, would be entitled to deduct from the amount of their net profits 500*l.* The average of the expenditure upon the repairs for the past three years would be about what they would expect to expend in repairs in the ensuing year, the year of charge in question, and that would be a fair and just deduction from their profit. But here it is said that the case is different, because the company have been in business only one year. But, there being no specific proviso in the statute applicable to that state of things, the result is that, if we are to take the average of three years to determine how much may be expected to be expended in repairs in the year to come, and if there are not three, nor even two years, but only one year, we must get the best information that we can, and must judge from what has been done during that one year what will be the probable amount expended in the ensuing year, and calculate the proper deduction on that footing. But the question here is, not what sum has been expended upon repairs, inasmuch as it is admitted that a sum has been set aside and allowed as a deduction from the net profits in respect of the repairs that have been effected, but it is, whether the respondents are entitled to deduct this entire sum of 1509*l.*, which may be applied anywhere, or at any time, and in any way they please, for a great variety of purposes, which are actually forbidden, directly as well as indirectly, by the provisions of the Act of Parliament? All that they are entitled to deduct they have already deducted, namely, the reasonably probable amount of repairs in the ensuing year, and no other deduction is allowed by the terms of the Act. Our judgment, therefore, in my opinion, should be for the Crown.

FOLLOCK, B.—I am of the same opinion. The only question here is whether the amount, 1509*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.*, written off for the depreciation of buildings fixed plant, and machinery, can be properly deducted in estimating the income tax payable by the company. Now, in my judgment, upon no construction of the Act of Parliament can that deduction be made. Strictly speaking, there is no difference between what is called an equitable construction of an Act of Parliament and any other construction. It appears to me that upon the most just and favourable construction of this Act of Parliament, as regards the respondents, they are not entitled to this deduction. There are three modes in which this fund to meet the depreciation of machinery may be dealt with. One is by adding to the company's original capital what is called a depreciation fund; the second is by laying aside out of the annual profits, which would be otherwise divisible among the shareholders, a certain sum to meet the estimated depreciation; and the third is by waiting until the depreciation occurs, and then either repairing or reinstating the machinery, so as to make it of equal value and efficiency to that which it was before. There are many ways in which expenses accrue by reason of depreciation. There are cases where there is a renewal of machinery from week to week, and sometimes from day to day; and there are cases in which the machinery, or certain parts of machines employed, may cost many hundred pounds, and the depreciation of which does not occur actually from day to day, or is not appreciable from day to day, but comes in the shape of breakage or other accidental or occasional occurrences, and as to which there may be a statement from year to year. Now, the way in which that would practically be met under this Act of Parliament is this: Whether the depreciation were small or great, and the consequent reinstatement small or great, it would all, in the long run, supposing the concern to be a going concern, be met justly and fairly under this Act, when the money was actually expended; because the words of the 3rd rule, under the 1st case of schedule D are, "Nor for any sum expended for the supply of repairs or alterations of any implements, utensils, or articles employed for the purpose of such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, beyond the sum usually expended for such purposes." Therefore, where machines are employed which require new parts to be supplied every week, or every month, or at the end of a year, or when a breakage occurs and causes a large outlay to repair it, all that expense and outlay comes in in the average of three years, however large the amount may be. In that way perfect justice would be done between the parties, and the deductions which the company now claim would, in the long run, be allowed them. But it may be said that, supposing it is not a going concern, and there is a sale, then there would be a very great depreciation; but that depreciation does not affect any question arising under this Act of Parliament. A depreciation always takes place when a concern is sold, not as a going concern, but as one that has failed, or for some reason or other has stopped. The only question for our consideration is, whether this estimated amount, laid aside from year to year, or written off for the depreciation of buildings, fixed plant, and machinery, comes within the words of the section. I think it quite clear that it does not, and that therefore the commissioners in this case were wrong, and that consequently our judgment should be for the Crown.

HUDDESTON, B.—I am of the same opinion. It is quite clear on reading this case that this sum of 1509*l.* is a sum which any prudent person would no doubt put by or lay aside for the purpose of meeting what may be called the expenses of renewal. The articles of association clearly contemplate that it should be carried into the capital account, and that the company might make use of the money, but if they did so it would be in the capital account, appearing on one side as drawn or expended on the capital account; and it is quite clear that it would be treated for all purposes of bookkeeping, and for all usual purposes, as capital. The Scotch case, which has been referred to, clearly adopts that view, because, of the two sums, 5000*l.* was to have supplied the buildings necessary for the new pit, which would be capital, and 4000*l.* was there, as here, written off for the depreciation, and the Scotch court thought that that clearly would be capital. Then, if that be so, it clearly comes within the 3rd rule, and cannot be taken into account. And that 3rd rule is rendered still more imperative by the 159th section of the Act, which says that no deduction shall be made other than those expressly enumerated in the Act. This sum of 1509*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.*, therefore, ought not to be allowed, and the company will have to pay income tax upon 5,151*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.*, which is the sum which they enter as profits—namely, 8642*l.*, plus the amount (1509*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.*) which they claim to deduct, and which they otherwise have deducted. I therefore think that the judgment of the commissioners cannot be upheld, and that our judgment must be for the Crown.

Pinder.—Will your Lordships in this case give some directions with regard to costs?

KELLY, C.B.—I think that we can say nothing about costs in a case of this kind.

March 14 and 21, May 29, and July 11, 1876.

(Present: the Right Hons. the LORD CHANCELLOR (Cairns), LORD HATHERLEY, LORD PENZANCE, SIR BARNES PEACOCK, and SIR MONTAGUE SMITH.)

MARSTERS v. DURST.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF ARCHES.

Ecclesiastical law—Ornaments of the church—Moveable cross—Retable.

A moveable cross of wood placed on a "retable," or wooden ledge, fixed to the wall at the back of the Communion Table, and close above it, so as to appear at a short distance to be one entire table, with the intention that it should remain there permanently, is forbidden by law.

Judgment of the court below reversed.

Westerton v. Liddell (Moore's Special Report) and Liddell v. Beal (14 Moo. P. C. 1; 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 218) explained and followed.

THE appellant in this case, Saddleton Marsters, was the parishioners' churchwarden of the parish of St. Margaret's, in the borough of King's Lynn, in the diocese of Norwich.

The respondent, the Rev. John Durst, was the vicar of the parish.

On or about the 27th May 1875, the respondent of his own motion, without any faculty, and without the consent of the appellant, placed, or caused to be placed on a retable immediately behind and above the Communion Table of the church, a moveable cross made of wood, which was so placed there as to appear to form one of the ornaments of the Communion Table.

The appellant, in his capacity of churchwarden, subsequently removed the cross as having been placed on the retable without lawful authority, and as not being one of the church ornaments prescribed or allowed by law.

The respondent thereupon instituted criminal proceedings in the Court of Arches against the appellant, and filed articles against him for having so removed the cross, and prayed not only that he should be admonished for removing the cross, but further that he should be admonished to restore the same to the retable.

The appellant filed a responsive allegation, wherein he admitted that he had removed the said cross, and in so far as he might have offended against ecclesiastical law therein submitted to the judgment of the court, but prayed the court not to require him to restore it to its former position, alleging in Article 4th as follows:

"That the defendant objects to an order being made as prayed by the promoter for the restoration of the said cross so removed by the defendant as in the fourth article alleged on the following grounds:

"(1) That the said cross, which is removed and made of wood, was on or about the 27th May 1875 introduced into the parish church by the promoter, and placed by him or under his authority, where it remained until removed by the defendant, on a shelf or retable at the back of and immediately above the Communion Table in the said church, without a faculty or other lawful authority.

"(2) That the said moveable wooden cross, before the same was removed by the defendant, was placed on the said shelf or retable, which is fixed immediately behind and above the Communion Table of the said church, and was so placed as to appear to form one of the ornaments of the Communion Table that such moveable cross, by reason of its not being one of the ornaments of the church prescribed in the rubrics or subservient in or subsidiary to the performance of the services of the church, is not a lawful church ornament, and cannot lawfully be replaced on the said retable.

"(3) That the restoration of the said moveable wooden cross on the retable would offend the conscientious feelings of a large number of the parishioners of the said parish who are members of the old Church of England."

The respondent objected to the admission of the 4th and 6th Articles of the Responsive Allegation.

Sir Robert Phillimore, the late Dean of the Arches, on the 20th Oct. 1875, by his interlocutory order or decree, rejected the 4th and 6th Articles of the Responsive Allegation with costs (L. Rep. 1 P. & D. 123).

The case came on for hearing in March last, but, as it appeared that there was no dispute as to the facts, their Lordships ordered them to be stated in the form of a special case.

May 29.—J. F. Stephen, Q.C. and Dr. Tristram, for the appellant, contended that this was an attempt to evade the law as laid down in the cases of Westerton v. Liddell (Moore's Spec. Rep.) and Liddell v. Beal (3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 218; 14 Moo. P. C. 1). The cross was not a mere architectural decoration, as it was moveable, and was therefore illegal, as not being an "ornament" prescribed by the rubric, or subservient in, or subsidiary to the performance of the services of the church:

Martin v. Macknochie, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 508; L. Rep. 3 P. C. 365; Elphinstone v. Purchas, 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 446; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 66.

A. J. Stephens, Q.C. and W. G. F. Phillimore, for the respondent, argued that to pronounce this cross illegal would be to interfere with the main principles of the decisions in Westerton v. Liddell and Liddell v. Beal, which were practically indistinguishable from this case. A distinction is to be drawn between things used in the services and things "inert," or not actively used. The "ornaments rubric" does not apply to furniture such as this cross, its legality consists in its inertness. They also referred to Phillipotts v. Boyd (32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 73; L. Rep. 6 P. C. 435), and the case of the Rev. Parkes Smith, decided by the Bishop of Exeter in 1847, and reported in Stephen's Laws of the Clergy, vol. 2, p. 1083.

J. F. Stephen, Q.C. in reply. Cur. adv. vult.

July 11.—THEIR LORDSHIPS gave judgment as follows: This is a criminal suit promoted in the Court of Arches against the appellant, who is one of the churchwardens of the parish of St. Margaret, in the borough of King's Lynn, for having removed from the church, without a faculty, a certain moveable cross of wood which had been placed on a ledge called a "retable," at the back of and above the Communion Table. The respondent is the vicar of the parish, and the cross was placed there by his authority, but without the sanction of a faculty. In the court below exception was taken to certain passages in the responsive allegation filed by the appellant, and they were ordered to be struck out. The present appeal is in form an appeal from that order, but on the case being opened it appeared to the parties that, as the facts were not really in dispute, it would save both expense and delay if they agreed to a statement of fact in the form of a special case, and took the decision of the Court of Appeal upon the merits of the case. Their Lordships consented to that course being pursued, and the case has been fully argued upon the special case so stated. The question which their Lordships are thus called upon to decide is the single one of the legality of a cross of this description in the place which it occupied when the appellant removed it from the church. The special case states that the cross is above three feet in height; that it is a moveable one; that it was placed by the respondent's orders on a structure of wood called a "retable," consisting of a wooden ledge at the back of the Communion Table, having a front of wood about eight inches deep, coming down to within five-sixteenths of an inch of the surface of the Communion Table, and that this structure is fixed to the wall by nails. A photograph is appended to the special case, from which, and the statements in this case, it is plain that the Communion Table and the "retable" would at a very short distance bear the appearance of one entire table or structure. It is further stated that the cross was placed on this ledge with "the intention that it should remain there permanently." On the part of the respondent it was contended that the cross was a moveable one, and constituted part of the church furniture; that it was not one of the "ornamental instruments" used in the church services; and that it fell within the category of things "inert," which were mere architectural decorations. On the part of the appellant it was contended, amongst other things, that the case fell within the principle of the well-known decision in the cases of Liddell v. Westerton (Moore's Special Rep.) and Liddell v. Beal (14 Moo. P. C. 1); and as their Lordships are of that opinion, it will not be necessary to go again into the subject at large, or do more on the present occasion than point out what it was that those cases really decided, and give reasons for the conclusion that the present case cannot in principle be distinguished from them. The two cases in question concerned the church of St. Paul and the chapel of St. Barnabas. In both instances there had been placed on the Communion Table a cross, and in both instances these crosses were held to be illegal. It is important, therefore, to consider what the character of these crosses was, and on what grounds they were ordered to be removed. In the Chapel of Ease of St. Barnabas the things complained of were first a rood-screen and a cross thereon, which cross was held to be lawful; and secondly, "a stone table or altar with a metal cross attached thereto," and this cross was held to be unlawful. The cross complained of in the Church of St. Paul was attached to the Communion Table, and is thus described in the judgment at page 2:—"Their Lordships understand that this table, described as an altar or Communion Table, is made of wood, and is not attached to the platform, but merely stands upon it; that it is placed at the east end of the church, or the chancel, according to the ordinary usage as to Communion Tables; that at the end nearest the wall there is a narrow ledge raised above the rest of the table; that upon this ledge, which is termed 'super-altare,' stand the two gilded candlesticks, which are moveable, and between them the wooden cross, which is let into and fixed in the super-altare so as to form part of what is thus described as the altar or communion table." It will be observed that this description closely tallies with the description as given in the special case of the Communion Table in the present case. There is here, as there, a moveable table, and a ledge of wood raised above the table at the back of it, and on this ledge two candlesticks, and a cross between them. The differences are that in St. Paul's Church the ledge of wood was called a "super-altare," while in this case it is called a "retable;" in St. Paul's Church the ledge stood upon the table, while in this case it is fixed to the wall and does not quite touch the table, being separated by about a quarter of an inch from it; and finally, that in Saint Paul's Church the cross was "let into and fixed" in the ledge, while in the present case it was not fixed, but placed on the ledge, "with the intention that it should remain there permanently." It is upon these differences of structure that the respondent relies, and he points particular attention to a passage in the judgment relating to the cross in St. Paul's Church, which is as follows: "Next with respect to the wooden cross attached to the Communion Table at St. Paul's. Their Lordships have already declared their opinion that the Communion Table intended by the canon was a table in the ordinary sense of the word, flat and moveable, capable of being covered with a cloth, at which or around which the communicants might be placed in order to partake of the Lord's Supper; and the question is whether the existence of a cross attached to the table is consistent either with the spirit or with the letter of those regulations. Their Lordships are clearly of opinion that it is not; and they must recommend that upon this point also the decree complained of should be affirmed." It is argued by the respondent that their Lordships must have intended to have condemned only crosses which were "fixed" to a ledge standing on the Communion Table or to the Communion Table itself, and that the two circumstances in the present case, of the ledge being a quarter of an inch above the table, and the cross not fixed in the ledge but moveable, are sufficient to take it out of the principle of that judgment. Their Lordships are unable to accept or approve so narrow and limited a view of the conclusion arrived at in those important cases. It is hardly to be conceived that a distinction should have been intended to be drawn between a cross "attached" to the table (or the ledge above the table) and a cross occupying a "permanent" position upon it; and still less that the lawfulness or unlawfulness of the cross should be declared to reside in such a distinction. Upon such a view of the law further refinements would be inevitable; for, on the one hand, a cross might be "let into and fixed" in the "retable" in such a manner as to be easily removed if and when desired, and therefore practically moveable; and, on the other hand, it might be ponderous, not easily moved, and intended to remain permanently in its place, and yet not actually "fixed" in the sense of being fastened to the ledge or table on which it stands. To hold that such refined differences as these constitute the distinction between what is lawful and what forbidden by the law would be to give every importance to matters which are trivial and incidental, to the exclusion of those which are substantial and of serious import. To any stranger entering the church, the present structure is not perceptibly different from that which was presented to the eye in the Church of St. Paul. The flat table, the narrow ledge rising above it, the candlestick at either end of this ledge, and the cross in the middle, constitute the apparent structure in both cases. It would be only by a minute inspection, instituted close at hand, that any difference would be revealed between them. For those who attend the services in this church, therefore, these differences do not practically exist, and whatever objection attended the Communion Table with its cross in the case of St. Paul's Church is equally present here. When the judgment in the above cases is carefully considered, it is very apparent what that objection was; and why the crosses on the altar or the Communion Table in both cases were declared unlawful. Speaking of the altar in St. Barnabas, their Lordships said, "the question was, whether the structure was a Communion Table within the meaning of the law," and with respect to St. Paul's, "whether the existence of a cross attached to the table is consistent either with the letter or the spirit" of the regulations made by law. To answer these questions their Lordships inquired at length into the character and appearance of the Roman Catholic altar as it existed before the Reformation—the doctrines respecting the Holy Communion which that altar was designed to subserve, and to which it was intended to conform—the change in these doctrines which was effected by the Reformation, and the consequent substitution of the plain flat moveable table of wood for the fixed altar with its super-altare, its crucifix, and candlesticks at either end. It was upon a careful review of these facts and considerations, and not upon any refined distinction as to the mode in which the cross was connected with the table, that their Lordships, construing the legal regulations bearing on the subject, came to the conclusion that a Communion Table such as that in the Church of St. Paul, was not warranted by those regulated by those regulations; and their decision, therefore, applies to and governs the present case, in which the structure complained of is, their Lordships think, in no substantial or essential feature distinguishable from it. Some additional light is thrown on the meaning and intention of the judgment above discussed by the subsequent proceedings in one of the cases (Liddell v. Beal) to which that judgment gave rise. It was thought by Mr. Beal that the monition of the court for the removal of the cross in the Chapel of St. Barnabas had not been complied with by removing the cross from the altar and placing it on the sill of the great eastern window of the church, immediately above the Communion Table, though at a distance of five feet from it, and he instituted proceedings complaining of this as an evasion. Their Lordships thought differently, and expressed themselves as follows: "Now there was formerly a cross which stood upon the stone table, and was in a sense at least affixed to it, which was objected to, and, as it appears, properly objected to. The stone table has been altogether removed, and with it the cross, but the cross has been placed in another part of the church, not in any sense upon the table which has been substituted for the stone table, nor in any sense in communication, or contact, or connection with it. It remains in the church as an ornament of the church . . . and does not conflict with the order contained in this monition." It will here be observed that no stress is laid on the fact that the cross was no longer alleged to be "fixed," which, if the respondent's view of the principal decision were correct, would at once have determined the question; but the retention of the cross in its new position is justified upon the ground that it was not "in any sense upon the table, nor in any sense in communication, or contact, or connection with it." It is plain, therefore, that, in the decision of the principal case, it was not to the cross itself that any objection was made, nor to the particular means or fastenings by which it was retained in its place, but to its connection with the Communion Table; and if, instead of removing the cross to a place several feet above the table, and quite unconnected with it, Mr. Liddell had simply made the cross a moveable one, and fixed a retable to the wall (such as in the present case) for it to stand upon, it is inconsistent with the language just quoted to suppose that their Lordships would have held the monition to have been complied with. Their Lordships are therefore of opinion that the cross in the position which it occupied while in the church is forbidden by law; and they will advise her Majesty that the present suit should be dismissed; but, as both parties have been in the wrong in acting without a faculty, without costs.

COURT OF APPEAL.

SITTINGS AT WESTMINSTER.

Tuesday, May 9, 1876.

(Before JESSE, M.R., KELLY, C.B., MELLISH, L.J., and POLLOCK, B.)RHODES AND ANOTHER v. AIREDALE DRAINAGE COMMISSIONERS.Arbitration—Lands Clauses Act 1845—Power of umpire to state special case—Compensation——Evidence of damage—Common Law Procedure Act 1854, s. 5.

By the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, s. 5, an arbitrator upon any compulsory reference under the Act, or upon any reference by consent of parties, where the submission is or may be made a rule or order of any of the Superior Courts of law or equity at Westminster, may state his award in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court. K. was appointed an umpire in an arbitration under the Lands Clauses Act 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), by which it is provided (sect. 25) that the appointment of an arbitrator by each party respectively "shall be deemed a submission to arbitration on the part of the party by whom the same shall be made," and that (sect. 36) "the submission to any such arbitration may be made a rule or order of any of the Superior Courts of law or equity at Westminster." Previous to K. being made an umpire, each party had appointed an arbitrator.

Held, reversing the decision of the court below (see 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 59), that K. had power to state a special case for the opinion of a Superior Court, inasmuch as the arbitration was within the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, s. 5, as to arbitrations by consent.

By the Airedale Drainage Act (24 & 25 Vict. c. 160) the defendants were authorised to execute certain drainage works, and it was provided that full compensation should from time to time after the passing of this Act, but not beyond twenty years from and after the completion of the cuts, embankments, and works, by this Act authorised, be made by the defendants to the owners, lessees, and occupiers of certain land, &c., for the time being, sustaining any damage by reason, or in any way consequential upon, the exercise of any of the powers of this Act, and that in case of dispute as to the amount of such compensation, the same should be settled by arbitration in the manner provided for the settling of questions of compensation by arbitration in the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845.

The plaintiffs, who were occupiers of certain land, included in the provisions of the Airedale Drainage Act, claimed compensation for damage sustained by floods occasioned by the defendants' works. The matter was referred to K., as umpire, who found by his award that the defendants had altered certain tributaries of the river, had formed new cuts or channels, had removed shoals from the river formed therein by gravel soil and other materials, and also a weir, which latter, however, in no way affected the damage that was occusioned. K. also stated that there was no sufficient evidence before him to enable him to determine whether the works, exclusive of the removal of the shoals and weir, caused the lands to be more damaged than they otherwise would have been.

K. awarded to the plaintiffs 110*l.*, who brought an action to recover it.

Held (reversing the decision of the court below), that the action was not maintainable, inasmuch as the compensation was awarded for damage caused by the removal of shoals, which were merely casual obstructions, and did not come within the provisions of the Act.

The word "damage" in the local Act includes any such damage as would have been actionable but for the passing of the Act.

Semble, where shoals have in course of time become part of the natural bed of a river, any damage caused by their removal would be the subject of compensation, such damage being actionable damage.

THIS was an action upon the award of an umpire appointed under the Airedale Drainage Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 160), which incorporated the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts 1845 and 1860. The umpire (Mr. Kemplay) awarded to the plaintiffs the sum of 110*l.*, to recover which the action was brought. The first plea denied the validity of the award under the Airedale Drainage Act. The second plea set out the award of the umpire as follows: "If I have no power to state my award in the form of a special case for the opinion of the Superior Court, of which the submission to arbitration of the matters so referred as aforesaid may be made a rule, then I award and judge that the claimants, as occupiers of Morley Hall Farm, have sustained damages, by reason of and consequential upon the exercise by the commissioners of the powers of the Drainage Act, to the amount of 110*l.*, and are entitled to be paid compensation for the same to that amount; but if I have power to state my award in the form of a special case for the opinion of such superior court as aforesaid, then I hereby state my award of and concerning the matters so referred as aforesaid in the form of a special case for the opinion of such Superior Court, as follows, that is to say: Morley Hall Farm is a farm of 150 acres, adjoining the river Aire, and situate about one mile and a half below the lowest of the works executed by the commissioners under the powers of the Drainage Act as hereinafter stated. The claimants were occupiers of the farm as tenants to William Ferrand, Esq., in and during the years 1866, 1867, 1868, and 1869, and as such occupiers sustained damages from certain specified floodings of the said farm, which occurred in these years in consequence of floods in the said river. The claim for compensation so referred to arbitration as aforesaid was in respect of the damages so sustained by the claimants as aforesaid. All the said floodings occurred after works authorised by the Drainage Act had been executed by the commissioners under the powers of that Act. All the said works were above the said farm, and were executed at different points of the said river within a district beginning at a point about one mile and a half above the said farm, and extending up the said river for a distance (reckoned along the whole course of the river) of nearly fourteen miles. For the purposes of this case the said works may be divided into four clauses, first, the division and alteration of tributaries of the said river whereby the said tributaries were made to flow into the said river differently from what they previously did and otherwise would have done; secondly, the formation of several cuts or channels for the said river at different points of the district last aforesaid, whereby the course of the said river was shortened nearly a mile and three quarters; thirdly, the removal from the said river of shoals formed therein by gravel soil and other materials, which from time to time had been brought down by tributaries of the said river and deposited in the said river near the confluences therewith of the said tributaries; and, fourthly, the removal of a weir, belonging to a mill about a mile and a half above the said farm, being the lowest work in the said river executed by the commissioners under the powers of the Drainage Act. None of the said works executed by the commissioners as aforesaid were executed by them in or upon land or other property of the said William Ferrand, Esq., or the claimants. All the said works had been executed and were in operation before and at the time of the occurrence of the said floodings of Morley Hall Farm, in respect of which the said claim for compensation arose, except the first of the said works, with the exception of one of the said cuts. Before the passing of the Drainage Act and the execution by the commissioners of any of the said works, Morley Hall Farm was more or less liable to be flooded by flood waters coming down the said river. The effect of making all the said cuts was to bring down the flood waters of the said river to Morley Hall Farm about twenty-six minutes earlier than they otherwise would have reached that farm, and the effect of making all the said cuts, except the said cut which was not in operation till after the first of the said floodings, was to bring down the flood waters of the said river to Morley Hall Farm about eleven minutes earlier than they otherwise would have reached that farm. From the evidence before me, I find that the claimants, as occupiers of the said farm, sustained damages on the occasion of the aforesaid floodings by reason of and consequential upon the execution by the commissioners of all the said works which were in operation at the respective times of the said floodings, to the amount of 110*l.* and that the damages so sustained by them would have been substantially the same if the said weir had not been removed. There was no sufficient evidence before me to enable me to determine either one way or the other, whether the said works, exclusive of the removal of the said shoals and weir as aforesaid, caused the said farm on the occasions of the said floodings, to be flooded to greater extents or for longer periods of time, or to be more damaged than it otherwise would have been."(a)

Third plea. That the sum awarded by the umpire included damages in respect of matters beyond his jurisdiction.

Fourth plea. That the plaintiffs had not sustained any such damage by reason of or consequential upon the circumstances of any of the powers of the Act, as entitled the plaintiffs to any compensation under its provisions or otherwise.

(a) This plea was demurred to on the ground that the umpire had no power to state a special case, and the demurrer was allowed: (See Rhodes v. Airedale Drainage Commissioners, 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 59; L. Rep. 9 C. P. 508; 43 L. J. 323 C. P.)

It is unnecessary for the purpose of this report to set out the remaining pleas.

At the trial before Lord Coleridge, C.J., at the sittings in London after Michaelmas Term 1874, the plaintiffs simply put in the award of the umpire, and closed their case, and it was agreed that the umpire who was called should be taken as representing in the witness box the statements made in the special case appended to the award. No further evidence of damage was given by the plaintiffs. At the trial the verdict was entered for the plaintiffs for the amount of the award, leave being reserved to the defendants to move to enter a nonsuit or verdict for the defendants on the following grounds: That the plaintiffs gave no evidence of any damage for which they were entitled to compensation; that the award proved in evidence was not final, or such an award as stated in the declaration; that the award given in evidence shows on its face that the umpire gave compensation for matters on which he had no jurisdiction; and that the third plea was proved. The court had power to draw inferences of fact. The Common Pleas Division (Lord Coleridge, C.J., Archibald, J., and Amphlett, B.) were divided on the question whether the word "damage" was confined to damage which would have been actionable but for the Act, but were unanimously of opinion that it sufficiently appeared from the statements of the umpire in the award that the damage was properly the subject of compensation. Accordingly they gave judgment in favour of the plaintiff.

From this judgment the defendant appealed, which also involved an appeal from the decision reported in 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 59.

Herschell, Q.C. and K. E. Digby for the defendants.—The action fails on two grounds. First, the decision of the court below on the demurrer was wrong. The umpire has power to state a special case, and if that be so there is no such award as is alleged in the declaration. The Common Law Procedure Act 1854, sect. 5, provides "that it shall be lawful for the arbitrator upon any compulsory reference under this Act, and upon any reference by consent of parties, where the submission is or may be made a rule or order of any of the superior courts of law or equity at Westminster, if he shall think fit, and if it is not provided to the contrary, to state his award as to the whole or any part thereof, in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court, and when an action is referred, judgment, if so ordered, may be entered, according to the opinion of the court." This is a "reference by consent" within the meaning of that enactment. Here an arbitrator was appointed on both sides, and the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 (8 & 9 Vict., c. 18, ss. 1, 25), expressly says that "every appointment of an arbitrator shall be deemed a submission to arbitration on the part of the party by whom the cause shall be made." And by sect. 36, "the submission to any such arbitration may be made a rule of any of the superior courts on the application of either of the parties." Therefore by the effect of those actions this arbitration is a "reference by consent" of parties where the submission is or may be made a rule or order of any of the superior courts of law or equity at Westminster," within sect. 5 of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854. The authority on which this case was decided in the court below (See

RHODES AND ANOTHER v. AIREDALE DRAINAGE COMMISSIONERS.

[CT. OF APP.]

31 L. T. Reports N. S. 59) was that of Re Newbold and the Metropolitan Railway Company (14 C. B., N.S., 405), as appears from the judgment of Lord Coleridge (sup.). In that case it is true Willes, J., appears to have entertained the opinion that an umpire appointed under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 had no power to state a special case; but it was a mere obiter dictum on the part of that learned judge, and, indeed, the exact contrary has been decided by Re Dare Valley Railway Company (L. Rep. 4 Ch. 554), where the Lords Justices affirmed the judgment of James, V.C. This case was not brought to the notice of the Court of Common Pleas, or they would have doubtless acted upon it. In Es parte Harper (L. Rep. 18 Eq. 589) Jessel, M. R., expressed a similar opinion; and, again, in Re Harper (L. Rep. 20 Eq. 39; 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 214), after his attention had been called to Newbold and The Metropolitan Railway Company (ubi sup.), though the Dare Valley Railway Company case (ubi sup.) was not cited before him. Then, secondly, the action fails on the merits, because there is no such damage as will support the award. By the Airedale Drainage Act (24 & 25 Vict. c. 160, s. 25:

Full compensation shall from time to time, after the passing of this Act, but not beyond twenty years from and after the completion of the cuts, embankments, and works by the Act authorised, be made by the commissioners out of the rates to be levied under this Act to the owners, lessees, and occupiers for the time being sustaining any damage by reason of or in any way consequential upon the exercise of any of the powers of this Act, of the lands and hereditaments of Wm. Ferrand, Esq., situate in the parish of Bingley, in the West Riding of the county of York, or any part or parts thereof respectively; and in case of dispute as to the amount of compensation, the same shall be settled by arbitration in the manner provided for the settling of questions of compensation by arbitration in the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845.

The word "damage" must, as pointed out by Amplett, B., in his judgment (a) be action-

(a) The following are the observations of Amplett B., on the construction to be put on the word "damage," together with the cases cited, which are referred to by Jessel, M.R., in his judgment (see post). "The first question which I think it will be convenient to consider in this case is whether the damage for which compensation can be claimed under sect. 45 of the Drainage Act, is confined to what we may call actionable damage, that is to say, damage in respect of acts for which an action might have been brought if the Drainage Act had not been passed. Now it could not be, and was not, in fact, denied on the part of the plaintiffs, that by a long series of cases, of which I need only mention the Caledonian Railway Company v. Ogilby (2 Macq. 229), it is perfectly settled that the right to compensation under sect. 68 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, is limited to actionable damage. It is true that the language of the 68th section of the Lands Clauses Act, which speaks of lands 'being injuriously affected,' is slightly more favourable to the limited construction; but the courts have adopted the same construction in analogous cases, where the language used was practically identical with that of the clause we are considering. New River Company v. Johnson (2 E. & E. 455; 29 L. J. 73, M.C.) under the Waterworks Act (10 & 11 Vict. c. 12), where the words were 'that in the exercise of the powers conferred by the Act, the undertakers shall do as little damage as can be, and shall make full compensation to all parties interested for all damage sustained by them, through the exercise of such powers' (Hall v. The Mayor, &c., of Bristol, 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 572; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 322), under the Public Health Act (11 & 12 Vict. c. 39), where the words were, 'that full compensation shall be made to all persons sustaining any damage by reason of the exercise of any of the powers of this Act.'

able damage to come within the statute; and, as regards this point, it is submitted that the learned Baron's observations on that part of the case are correct, and are supported by the authorities referred to in his judgment. There was here no evidence of any actionable damage. The court below has put an erroneous construction on the award. A riparian owner is entitled to remove shoals from a river, and there is nothing in the award to show that there has been any interference with the bed of the river.

Manisty, Q.C., and L. Cave, Q.C. (Bidder, Q.C., with them) for the plaintiffs.—No notice of appeal has been given on the first point, but it is admitted that Re Dare Valley Railway Company (ubi sup.), is an authority to show that the umpire had power to state a special case. The substantial question is as to the right of the plaintiff to recover damages. The award is prima facie evidence that the plaintiff has sustained damage that is actionable. [JESSEL, M. R.—The umpire's award is evidence of the amount of damage but not of the facts contained in the award.] The umpire has found that the damage was caused by the removal of shoals, by which he meant shoals which had formed a part of the natural bed of the river. Lastly, it is contended that actionable damage is not necessary under the special Act. They cited the Caledonian Railway Company v. Ogilby (2 Mac. Sc. Ap. 229), and the Duke of Buccleuch v. The Metropolitan Board of Works (L. Rep. 3 Ex., 306; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 906; 37 L. J. 177, Ex.)

I cannot but think, under the circumstances, that it would be very undesirable on light grounds to disturb this unanimity of decision upon a point constantly arising in practice, and which, with the single example of Lord Westbury, in Rickett v. The Metropolitan Railway Company (12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 75; L. Rep. 2 H. L. 201; 36 L. J. 205, Q. B.), has been approved of on general grounds by almost all the judges who had taken part in such decisions. But it was argued on the part of the plaintiffs that the Legislature must have used the word 'damage' in a more extended sense in the 45th section, since otherwise that section would have given the owners and occupiers of the land mentioned therein no further protection than they would be entitled to under the Lands Clauses Acts. I think, however, there are two answers to that argument: first, having regard to the decision in Rea v. The Directors of the Bristol Dock Company (12 East, 429), and the language of Lords Cranworth and St. Leonards in the Caledonian Railway Company v. Ogilby (ubi sup.), I think it would be an arguable question (and that is sufficient for this purpose), whether persons who have rights in respect of a public road or a public river, the same in principle, but different in degree from other people, could claim compensation under the Lands Clauses Act for damage either to one or the other which was authorised by Act of Parliament; and, secondly, the compensation given by the 45th clause of the Drainage Act is quite different from that given by the Lands Clauses Act. In the latter case compensation is given once for all; whereas in the former case it is to be given 'from time to time'; the reason for which no doubt was, that as the only damage that could accrue to the lower lands from the improved drainage of the upper would be at flood times, it would be impossible, or at least difficult to estimate the damage except when the floods happened. These reasons appear to me satisfactorily to account for the introduction of the special claim, without supposing that the Legislature intended to enlarge the subject-matter of compensation. Indeed, looking at the object of the Act, which was for the more effectual drainage of a large tract of country, which is expressly stated to be, as it manifestly was, for the public benefit, it is difficult to suppose that the Legislature intended that the commissioners in the execution of their duties should be hampered by claims for compensation in respect of acts which the riparian proprietors had a common law right to do with impunity; and if the Legislature had any such intention it is strange that they should have used language which had already at that time acquired by judicial decision a more limited sense. In my judgment, therefore, the first point ought to be decided, if it should be necessary, in favour of the defendants."

JESSEL, M.R.—This is an appeal from the Common Pleas Division involving not only the decision in this case, but also a decision of the Court of Common Pleas on demurrer some time ago. In accordance with the power conferred on us by the Judicature Acts, it will be better to decide the question raised by the demurrer as if it were now before us upon appeal; and it is the more desirable because the same question is raised by the demurrer as by this appeal, so that it is impossible to deal with the one without dealing also with the other. Now the question on demurrer was in substance this, whether under the powers of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, an arbitrator has power to state a special case for the opinion of a superior court. The Court of Common Pleas held that he had not. It is said that no such power is conferred under the Common Law Procedure Act 1854. The present question doubtless turns first on the construction of the Act, and, secondly, what has been done with reference to the construction put on the Act. No doubt under the words of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, sect. 5, by which, if at all, the power is given, there is some difficulty, as it refers apparently only to arbitrations by direction of a court or judge, or by consent. But on the other hand it certainly would be remarkable that a large class of arbitrations should have been omitted; and if we can consistently do so we ought, I think, to bring these submissions within the purview of the enactment. I have already given my views on the subject in Harper's case (ubi sup.), and will not again repeat them. It is much to be regretted that the Court of Common Pleas in deciding this case were unaware of the Dare Valley case (ubi sup.), where the Chancery Court of Appeal confirmed the decision of James, V.C., that an arbitration under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, was within the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, sect. 5, as to arbitrations by consent. Against that decision we have really nothing but the decision of the Court of Common Pleas; therefore, as an authority, we ought to decide against the latter court, and follow the judgment of a co-ordinate court given in the Dare Valley case (ubi sup.), which last decision I was in ignorance of when Harper's case (ubi sup.) was before me. I do not intend to say that we are always bound to follow the decision of a co-ordinate court; still there must be strong reasons for disregarding it, and no such reasons, so far as I can see, exist here. The next point is one of great importance, viz., whether, having regard to the terms of the local Act, the damage for which a plaintiff is entitled to recover is for actionable damage only, or includes all loss whether actionable or not. Now the words of this particular section are really undistinguishable from the words of other sections, the construction of which has been established by a long chain of decisions. When I come to look at clauses 44 and 45, I find that they are what are termed landowners' clauses, that is to say, clauses put in by opposing landowners for their protection; and if the landowners could have induced the Legislature to give larger powers of compensation they would naturally (knowing as they did, the decisions on the subject) have taken care to make the intention of clauses in their own favour clear. I will refer only to two of the decisions which are referred to by Amphlett, B., in the court below (The New River Company v. Johnson, 2 E. & E. 445; 29 L. J. 93, M. C.; and Hall v. The Mayor, &c., of Bristol, 36 L. J. 110, C. P.; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 322; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 572). In The New River Company v. Johnson (ubi sup.), which arose under the Waterworks Clauses Act (10 & 11 Vict. c. 17) the words were "that in the exercise of the powers conferred by the Act the undertakers shall do as little damage as can be, and shall make full compensation to all parties interested for all damage sustained by them through the exercise of such powers." In Hall v. The Mayor &c., of Bristol (ubi sup.) which was decided under the Public Health Act, the words were: "that full compensation shall be made to all persons sustaining any damage by reason of the exercise of any of the powers of this Act." In both these cases it was definitely decided that the right to compensation was limited to actionable damage, and that being so the question has been fairly decided, and I should have no doubt at all on the subject were it not that two of the learned judges in the court below appear to have arrived at an opposite conclusion. It is said, why then are these words inserted at all? I think there are two answers, one that the time is enlarged, the other that too much effect must not be given to mere repetitions. Next if the damage must be actionable, is there any such damage? No dispute arises as to the law. Riparian proprietors are entitled to remove casual obstructions as distinguished from the natural bed of the river. The only dispute is as to the construction of the award, and as regards that, I differ from the construction put on the award by all the judges, and am of opinion that that for which the arbitrator intended to award compensation, was damage caused by the removal of shoals. Now is that actionable damage? It was not disputed that riparian proprietors not only may, but are under a liability to remove such shoals; if, therefore, I am right as to the construction of the award, there is no actionable damage. The judgment of the Common Pleas must therefore be reversed. As regards costs, the costs in the court below and in this court will follow the suit; but as to the demurrer we think there ought to be no costs.

KELLY, C.B.—I am of the same opinion. The case comes before us in rather a complicated form. The action is on an award under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845. The case proceeded to trial, and a verdict was eventually entered for the plaintiffs for 110*l.*, the amount of the award, but leave was reserved to the defendants to move to enter a nonsuit or verdict for them. The question whether the judgment was right depends on whether the award is valid. That throws us back to the question whether the arbitrator had jurisdiction to make the award, and that again throws us back on the decision of the Court of Common Pleas upon the demurrer to the second plea. No appeal has been brought from that decision, but we deem it expedient, under the powers which we possess under the Judicature Acts, to consider whether or not the demurrer should be allowed. That question turns upon sect. 5 of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854. I may observe that, apart from the decisions, the arbitration seems to me to be, by the effect of sect. 25 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, an arbitration by consent, the claimants and the commissioners having each appointed an arbitrator, instead of the commissioners having exposed themselves to an appointment by the claimant singly; and the appointment of an arbitrator being, by the terms of sect. 25, a submission to arbitration on the part of the party by whom the cause is made. I should say, therefore, apart from the decisions, the arbitration was within sect. 5 of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, and this view is confirmed by Re Dare Valley Railway (ubi sup.) This at once disposes of the first decision of the court below, which we are compelled to overrule. The question is still left open whether the demurrer having been set aside and overruled, the Court of Common Pleas were right in the judgment given on the special case; and we think it right, in order to avoid future litigation, to give our decision upon the special case. The question raised by the special case renders it necessary for us to look at the language of the award, and to see whether the plaintiff is entitled to judgment for the sum of 110*l.* That depends entirely on the nature of the damage which the plaintiff has sustained. Now by a long series of decisions it has been clearly established that the claim must be limited to damage which, but for the power conferred by the Act of Parliament, would be actionable. Is the damage done here actionable? It appears from the special case that the damage may have arisen from four different causes. [His Lordship referred to the special case already set out.] If the finding of the arbitrator had been that the damage resulted from all three causes, then, inasmuch as two of them would be actionable, were it not for the Act, the claimant would be entitled to recover. But if, on the other hand, it turns out that the cause of injury is confined to one species of damage only, namely, the removal from the river of the shoals, then the question will arise whether damage so occasioned is actionable. All that the arbitrator says is that damage was caused "by the removal from the river of shoals formed therein by gravel, soil, and other materials, which from time to time had been brought down by tributaries of the said river, near the confluence therewith of the tributaries." We all agree that if the bed of the river had been disturbed, it would have been actionable; but does the finding of the umpire amount to such a statement? I am clearly of opinion that no conclusion of this kind can be drawn. If the arbitrator had meant us to infer that the bed of the river had been disturbed, or that the shoals had become part of the river itself, why did he not expressly say so? Instead of that he has made use of language which, to my mind, is quite unambiguous. Then, lastly, was the damage caused solely by the removal of the shoals, or partly by the removal of such shoals and partly by other causes? I leave the weir altogether out of consideration, because no damage was caused by its removal. Now, the language of the award is to my mind clear as to how the damage was occasioned. The umpire has found that there was no sufficient evidence before him to enable him to determine one way or the other whether the said works, exclusive of the removal of the shoals, caused the farm on the occasion of the floodings to be flooded to a greater extent or for a longer period of time, or to be more damaged than it otherwise would have been. What is the meaning of that? Why, that there is no sufficient evidence to enable him to determine whether the damage was occasioned otherwise than by the removal of the shoals; in other words, it amounts to an allegation that the removal of the shoals alone caused the injury, and that there was no evidence to satisfy him that any other cause or causes contributed. It must, therefore, be taken that the damage was solely caused by the removal of the shoals; and the law is well established that a riparian owner may remove shoals from a navigable river, so long as he takes care not injuriously to affect the navigation, without being liable to an action. I therefore come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs are not entitled to the compensation which has been awarded to them by the umpire.

MELLISH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. With reference to the question whether an arbitrator, under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, has power to state a special case, I should, if there had been no decisions, have thought it open to some doubt, but considering the authorities, there can be no doubt at all on the subject. The point was first raised before James, L.J., when Vice-Chancellor; his decision was that the arbitrator had such a power, and was affirmed, on appeal, by the Lords Justices. We, therefore, should not be justified in overruling it now. Had the decision in Re Dare Valley Company (ubi sup.) been brought to the notice of the Court of Common Pleas, I feel no doubt their decision on the demurrer would have been different. The arbitrator, therefore, having power to state a special case, I agree with Mr. Herschell that the defendants are entitled to have a verdict entered for them on the plea of no such award. But Mr. Herschell and Mr. Manisty both thought it proper that we should go on to consider the merits under the powers conferred on us by the Judicature Acts. The first question that arises is, whether, according to the construction of sect. 45 of the Aire-dale Drainage Act, the plaintiff is entitled to compensation for acts done whether actionable or not. My opinion is, that he is only entitled for acts done by causes which are actionable. The argument for the plaintiffs was based upon the difference of sect. 45 from sect. 43. I therefore took the opportunity of reading sect. 44. I find that that is a clause relating to Riddles-down landowners, and in the main agreeing with sect. 45, but limited to actionable damage, the words being, "whether the lands injuriously affected be within or without" a certain area, the words "injuriously affected" being the very words which in sect. 68 of the Lands Clauses Act have been considered decisive of the question whether damage without legal injury can be considered the subject of compensation. I think it clear therefore that the plaintiff can only recover for damage which but for the Act would have been actionable. Then comes the question raised by the award, whether the removal of shoals is actionable? With all deference to the court below I have no doubt it is not. In course of time shoals may no doubt become part of the bed of a river, in which case it would be actionable to remove them; but so long as they continue in the shape of shoals they may clearly be removed. Such removal, therefore, not being actionable, has there been any damage in respect of any other matters?

WRIGHT v. DAVIES.

[Ct. of App.]

The umpire says, as to that, that there is no sufficient evidence to find one way or the other. That being so the judgment of the Common Pleas Division must be reversed.

POLLOCK, B.—As regards the first point, had the matter been res nova. I should have liked to have had it further argued; but the decision in Re Dare Valley Railway Company, (ubi sup.) is binding, and the convenience of that decision is shown by the case of the Duke of Buccleuch v. Metropolitan Board of Works (ubi sup.) As to the other point I agree with the rest of the court. Judgment reversed.

WRIGHT (clerk) v. DAVIES (clerk).

Ecclesiastical dilapidations—Statute 34 & 35 Vict. c. 43—Exchange of livings—Mutual releases—Simoniack contract.

After the passing of the Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Act of 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 43) an agreement was entered into by the plaintiff and defendant for the exchange of the livings they then held, and one term of such agreement was that neither party should make any claim upon the other for dilapidations.

At the time the agreement was made it was stated by the defendant to the plaintiff that the necessary repairs would be about equal in amount for each of the benefices. This, however, proved otherwise, but there was no allegation of fraud.

It was now sought to set aside the agreement as being against public policy and in its nature simoniack.

Held (affirming the decision of the Common Pleas Division), that the agreement was not in contravention of the Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Act of 1871, also that the term in the agreement as to dilapidations was merely ancillary to the contract for the exchange, and that the contract, therefore, was not simoniack or invalid.

THIS case came before the court upon appeal from the Common Pleas Division.

The defendant was incumbent of Gisburn, in the county of York and the plaintiff was vicar of the parish of St. Mary's, in the county of Huntingdon, and subsequent to the passing of the Act of 34 & 35 Vict. c. 43, they mutually agreed to exchange livings. In 1874 the plaintiff found that the amount of dilapidations for the parish of Gisburn was 247*l.* 19*s.* 6*d.*, and for this amount he sought to make the defendant liable.

To a declaration to that effect the defendant pleaded the terms of the agreement for exchange of livings entered into with plaintiff.

To this plea the plaintiff in his replication said: That the repairs necessary for the parish of St. Mary's amounted to the sum of 32*l.* 10*s.*, and the plaintiff further says that at the time of making the said alleged agreement and exchange the defendant represented and stated to the plaintiff that the repairs of the buildings of his the defendant's said benefice of Gisburn were merely nominal, or equal in amount to the repairs of the plaintiff's said benefice of St. Mary's, and the plaintiff further says that such agreement was made by the plaintiff on the faith and belief that such representation of the defendant was true and correct and not otherwise; whereas, in fact and in truth, the repairs of the defendant's said benefice of Gisburn amounted to the sum of 247*l.* 19*s.* 6*d.*, as the defendant knew or ought to have known, and such statement and misrepresentation and such alleged agreement was and is an evasion of and in contravention of the said Act.

This replication was demurred to by the defendant, and such demurrer was argued on the 20th Jan. 1876, and upheld by the court (Lord Coleridge, C.J., Brett and Denman, JJ.).

Against this judgment plaintiff now appealed. (The facts of the case and the judgment below will be found fully reported ante, p. 106, 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 858).

Baylis, Q.C. (O. Crompton with him) for the appellant.—The plea in this case is bad and the replication good. The decision in the case of Goldham v. Edwards (16 C. B. 437; 25 L. T. Rep. O. S. 198; 24 L. J. 189, C. P.; 17 C. B. 141, Ex. Ch.) was prior to the Act of 1871. The plea in this case is copied from that one, but the law is now different. [JESSEL, M.R.—If you rely upon misrepresentation in equity it is an allegation of fraud which is sufficient to avoid the contract, or it is nothing at all. This is a contract which cannot be rescinded; it has no relation to equity.] It is only stated as an answer to the plea. The law before the passing of this Act was that an action on the case, and therefore one for damages, could be brought against the late incumbent or his executors, but debts would take priority over damages. But now this is changed into an action for debt against the late incumbent or his representatives. There were also two other methods of proceeding, by deprivation and by sequestration. [JESSEL, M.R.—Under the old law the new incumbent was liable to be sequestrated or deprived of his living, whether he recovered from the old incumbent or not.] Yes, and the Act was to amend this; whereas this agreement would put the parties into the position they would have been in prior to the Act, and it is, therefore, in contravention of the Act. The primary intention of the Act was to protect the benefice and secure the repair of the buildings. The preamble clearly shows that the position of the incumbent is merely that of a trustee for the living; if he receives any money he has to pay it over within a given time to the governors of Queen Anne's bounty; he cannot release the old incumbent in any way. [MELLISH, L.J.—The real question is whether the new incumbent is a trustee of the action or not; if he is, he could never compromise an action of this kind.] It is contended he is. [JESSEL, M.R.—Then he could never accept 10*s.* in the pound though he may be certain he could not get more. The Act does not say he is to be a trustee of the action, it merely says that if he recovers the money he must pay it over; he must pay the money himself, but the Act does not say he shall recover it from the old incumbent. To say "if you get money it shall be trust money" is different to saying "you shall be a trustee to get the money."] Sect. 39 creates the trust. The 47th section would be rendered a dead letter by an agreement such as this; under sects. 40 and 60 the new incumbent is made liable if the old incumbent does not pay;

WRIGHT v. DAVIES.

but this is a new liability only coming into operation after six months. [MELLISH, L.J.—So long as the new incumbent pays, it matters to no one save himself who has provided the money.] I now proceed to the replication that the agreement was simoniacal. [JESSEL, M.R.—If there was any simony it was upon your side. To take a living plus a benefit is not simony, which is what you are complaining of. How can it be simoniacal to say, "I will take a living but won't pay." You allege that you gave about 200*l.* to get your living, which may be simony, but that cannot make the other presentation simoniacal.] In Downes v. Craig (9 M. & W. 166) Lord Abinger appears to suggest that an arrangement of this kind would be simoniacal. On both these grounds, therefore, the judgment of the court below should be reversed.

Gully and Crump, for the respondent, were not called upon.

JESSEL, M.R.—This is an appeal from the Common Pleas Division as to the effect to be given to an agreement entered into between plaintiff and defendant. The questions raised are two. It appears that an agreement was entered into by the parties for an exchange of livings, one term of which was "that no payment of any kind on either side should be made for dilapidations." Now it does not appear what the respective values of the livings were, but it is said that the defendant represented that the dilapidations for his benefice of Gisburn were merely nominal, or about the same in amount as for the plaintiff's benefice of St. Mary's, but there is no allegation in the pleadings that this agreement was made corruptly, nor is there anything to show that this arrangement as to dilapidations was anything but merely subsidiary to the contract for the actual exchange, and not itself the motive for the exchange. The plaintiff now finds that he has to pay 250*l.*, whereas the defendant was only to pay 30*l.*, whereupon he says, "I can recover the larger sum from you (the defendant), because my bargain to pay that sum for you is illegal, as it is against the policy of the Act of 1871. I was the bare trustee of the action for the Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty; I could not, therefore, release you from the action, so you are as liable as if no agreement had been made by us." Secondly, it is said that the bargain is a simoniacal one, and that therefore the plaintiff can avoid as much of it as is illegal without avoiding the whole. On the first point it is only necessary for us to consider the true meaning of the Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Act of 1871. Before that Act was passed there was an action for damages for the amount of the dilapidations, and it might have happened that the new incumbent might have recovered the whole amount and put it into his own pocket, and in that way the living might have wholly lost it. The new Act enables the bishop to have the dilapidations surveyed and to point out how the necessary repairs are to be made, and it also enables the new incumbent to bring an action for debt for the amount stated by the surveyor in his report against the old incumbent or his representatives. But when the new incumbent recovers the money he is to pay it over to Queen Anne's Bounty, and whether he recovers it or not, he is still liable to pay the amount within six months, and also to do the repairs, though when done he can get the money back; and even though the amount of repairs might exceed that stated in the surveyor's report, he would be still liable. If he neglected to do the work, then the Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty might do it themselves. The result is that an easy remedy has been provided by the Legislature for insuring the necessary repairs, and the remedies, though themselves simplified, are not changed in substance. The 36th and 37th sections of the Act do not make the new incumbent a trustee of the action, but of the proceeds he may receive from the old incumbent, which is a totally different thing. A trustee of an action cannot release the debtor of a cestui que trust from the action; the person released would be still liable; but the question between the trustee releasing and the party released would be quite a different one. Such an interpretation of this Act would also very much interfere with the new incumbent making any compromise with the old one; he could only do it by an appeal to the court, which would be a most undesirable state of affairs. The words of the Act are plain; sect. 36 runs, "The sum stated in the order as the cost of the repairs shall be a debt due from the late incumbent, his executors or administrators, to the new incumbent, and shall be recoverable as such at law or in equity." The sum is to be a debt, and therefore the creditor can release it. The 37th section says, "The new incumbent shall, as and when he shall recover the said sum, forthwith pay the amount recovered to the governors; and if and whenever he shall recover any further part of the said sum he shall, in like manner, forthwith pay to the governors the further part so recovered." Now, I am of opinion it would have been much better if the same words had been used in the second clause of this section as in the first, for I am satisfied they mean the same thing, i.e., that "if" and "whenever" mean the same as "as" and "when" in the first clause; neither of these sections says the new incumbent "shall sue," they lay no obligation upon him to recover the money. They make him trustee of the money he has received, and do no more. By the 40th section the new incumbent is bound to pay the balance to the governors, whether he gets it or not. Again, by the 42nd section the new incumbent is bound to have the repairs executed within eighteen months. Then the 47th section, which has been referred to in the course of the argument, depends entirely upon a final certificate having been given; if the new incumbent cannot get that certificate sect. 47 will not apply to him. As to the second point, it is not alleged in the pleadings that the contract is simoniacal; to make it so you must allege that the inducement for the exchange was the payment of money or money's worth, but there is nothing of the kind here, the arrangement as to the repairs is merely ancillary to the contract for exchange, and neither party looked upon it as an inducement or motive. Plaintiff certainly did not for he thought the dilapidations were about equal in amount, and still, even supposing the defendant had known of the difference, he would have been receiving and not giving a consideration. The expression that he "ought to have known" is so vague that it may mean anything; it may mean that he ought to have got a surveyor to make a long and careful examination for which he may have had even to take down part of the buildings, but it surely cannot mean that as a clergyman he ought to have known. The words are too vague and too general. A simoniacal agreement is a corrupt one and a corrupt one of a very bad kind. I do not think we can listen to a suggestion of anything of the kind upon these pleas. The appeal must be dismissed.

KELLY, C.B.—This action arises from an exchange of livings, one of the terms of the bargain being that plaintiff should not call upon defendant to execute any repairs or make good any dilapidations. After this agreement had been entered into, with the assent of the respective patrons and bishops, an order was made specifying the amount of repairs necessary, which was between 200*l.* and 300*l.*, and this action is brought to recover that amount from the defendant. The latter says that the plaintiff is precluded from bringing his action by the above agreement. The case cited (ubi sup.) is decisive to show that such an action could not have been maintained prior to the late Act, but it is argued that now the case is otherwise, and that such an agreement as the above is against public policy, and it would be so if it had a direct tendency to violate the provisions of an Act of Parliament. But the effect of the new Act is merely that the new incumbent may maintain an action for debt against the old incumbent, and then there are a series of provisions as to what he is to do with the money he recovers. The Act also contemplates the possibility of this money not being recovered, and then the new incumbent is himself liable; that is done for the benefit of the parish. If the money is not recovered the law is not defeated and nullified, for the new incumbent may be compelled to do the repairs, and that is all the Act requires. In case he fails to do them he remains liable for the rest of his life; so there can be nothing against the policy of the law in releasing the old incumbent, when by the 43rd section the right against the new incumbent can be enforced by sequestration. A very clear and sound distinction has been taken by the Master of the Rolls—namely, that he is not trustee for the action, but only for any money he may have recovered from the old incumbent. If the new incumbent receives money he must pay it over; if he does not he remains liable himself, and in either case the law is satisfied. As to the second point that the contract is void for simony or fraud, the answer is clear, in either case the law requires that the charge should be precisely and expressly stated; here there is no express allegation of simony or fraud, and we cannot infer it from obscure language such as this. The judgment of the court below must be affirmed.

APPEAL FROM EXCHEQUER DIVISION.

(Before JAMES and MELLISH, L.JJ., BAGGALLAY, J.A. and QUAIN, J.)

WOOLER AND WIFE v. KNOTT.

Landlord and tenant—Lease of public-house—Tenant's covenant not to do any act "to affect the licence"—Construction—Conviction of tenant by justices for offences against the Licensing Acts—Convictions not recorded on licence—Breach of covenant—Forfeiture—Licensing Acts 1872 and 1874 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94, and 37 & 38 Vict. c. 49, s. 13).

After the Licensing Act of 1874 came into operation the defendant became lessee of a public-house belonging to the plaintiffs, and by the lease (containing the usual clause of forfeiture for breach of covenant), the defendant covenanted "not to do, omit, or permit or suffer to be done or omitted, any act, matter, or thing whatsoever that can or may affect, lessen, or make void either or any of the licences for the time being granted to the said public-house." Defendant was convicted before the justices of having committed, on the same day, two offences against the Licensing Acts, but the justices directed, under sect. 13 of the Act of 1874, that neither of the convictions should be recorded on the defendant's licence.

Held (affirming the decision of the Court of Exchequer below), that the licence was not "affected" within the meaning of the covenant in the lease by such convictions, and consequently that there had been no breach of covenant, and no forfeiture.

THIS was the plaintiff's appeal from a decision of the Exchequer Division (Kelly, C.B. and Huddleston, B.) allowing a demurrer of the defendant to the plaintiff's statement of claim in an action of ejectment for breach of covenant.

The case below is fully reported in 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 362, where all the facts are set out. They sufficiently appear, however, in the headnote above. By the Licensing Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict., c. 49), s. 13:

Where any licensed person is convicted of any offence against the principal Act (1873), which by such Act was to have been, or might have been endorsed upon the licence, or of any offence against this Act, the court before whom the offender is brought shall cause the register of licences, in which the licence of the offender is entered, or a copy of the entries therein relating to the licence of the offender, certified in manner prescribed by sect. 58 of the principal Act, to be produced to the court before passing sentence, and after inspecting the entries therein in relation to the licence of the offender, or such copy thereof as aforesaid, the court shall declare as part of its sentence whether it will or will not cause the conviction for such offence to be recorded on the licence of the offender, and if it decides that such record is to be made the same shall be made, &c.

Morgan Howard, Q.C. and Willis for the plaintiffs.—An act affecting the licence was complete, and the covenant in the lease was broken directly anything was done, which could be the ground of a conviction which might be recorded on the licence. Under the Act of 1872 every conviction was endorsed, and there was no discretion left in the justices as to whether they would or would not endorse a conviction on the licence. Directly an act, which might lead to a conviction, was done, the lessee had done all that she could do to endanger the licence. The act itself is the thing to look at, and not what the justices may do in dealing with it. [JAMES, L.J.—I grant that; but three indorsements are necessary to forfeit the licence, and can you say that an act or acts that will cause one or two indorsements—and are therefore, in some sense, on the road to the forfeiture of the licence—can be said to "affect" the licence in a sense involving forfeiture of the lease?] Then it is submitted that, by the operation of other sections of the Act of 1872, the licence has been "affected." Sect. 36 of that Act says a register shall be kept in which things affecting the licence shall be entered; and (sect. 55, sub-s. 3) that convictions shall be entered on the register. [MELLISH, L.J.—The words are "such conviction."

CT. OF APP.]

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. CORPORATION OF SUNDERLAND.

[CT. OF APP.]

That means a conviction that has been indorsed on the licence.] [JAMES, L.J.—Sect. 56 shows that repetition is the offence Parliament had in view.] The licence is a form of property, and the value of it to the landlord would be affected by a conviction. [JAMES, L.J.—The lease does not say "affecting the value of the licence;" you are really reading it as if the covenant were that nothing should be done against the licensing laws. [It can scarcely be denied that the prospects of renewal are worse than they were; and, if so, how can it be disputed that the licence is "affected?" The very object of this covenant was to protect the renewal of the licence—it is for the benefit of the landlord. [MELLISH, L.J.—But the words are "the licence for the time being," and a licence never lasts longer than a year.] Suppose the action of ejectment had been brought the same day, it could not have been said that the landlord must wait till it is seen what the justices will do.

Cave, Q.C. and Heath, for the defendant, were not called upon.

JAMES, L.J.—I am of opinion that the decision of the court below was right and must be affirmed. It is argued here as if this covenant was equivalent to a covenant that no offence against the Licensing Acts should be committed. If that had been the intention it would have been very easy to say so; but that has not been said. The words are, nothing shall be done "that can or may affect, lessen, or make void either or any of the licences for the time being." An act, repetition of which, under certain circumstances, if followed by certain other acts, might "affect" the licence, is not itself an act "affecting" the licence. It is not to be presumed that the person will do the further acts and offences. It is not enough that it is possible or probable that the other acts will be done. An act which may affect the minds of the justices on a future occasion, as when they have to consider whether they shall renew the licence or not, cannot be said to be an act "affecting" the licence.

MELLISH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. If the justices had ordered these two convictions to be recorded on the licence, then, I think, the licence would have been affected, for then its renewal would have been greatly endangered. As to whether one conviction recorded would have been enough I am in doubt, and will say nothing; but if none is recorded, I am clearly of opinion that the licence is not affected, so that a forfeiture must follow. I think the covenant does not relate to affecting the chance of renewal, but the existing licence.

BAGGALLAY, J.A. — Nothing would have been easier than to have made a forfeiture clause extending to all offences against the Licensing Acts. But that has not been done; and it is impossible to put such a construction on these words, occurring as they do, in a forfeiture clause, and, therefore, demanding a construction favourable to the lessee.

QUAIN, J. — These acts, and the conviction following upon them, do not affect the licence. They may affect the character of the tenant, but they do not affect the property of the landlord through the licence. That is as good as ever it was. If there had been any endorsement on the licence then, no doubt, a serious question would have arisen, but there has been none, and the licence is as good as if there had been no convictions. The covenant does not relate to the chance of renewal, but to the existing licence.

Judgment below confirmed. Appeal dismissed.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. CORPORATION OF SUNDERLAND.

Powers of municipal corporations—Public walks and pleasure grounds—Council chamber and offices—Museum, library, and conservatory—Public Health Act (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63), s. 74.

Land was vested in a corporation in trust and to the intent that the same might be used only as and for public walks or pleasure grounds for the use of the inhabitants of the borough. The land having been laid out as a public park, the corporation proposed to erect on part of it a council chamber and offices and a museum, library, and conservatory. An information at the relation of some inhabitants and ratepayers prayed that the corporation might be restrained from appropriating any portion of the park as a site for the erection of any town buildings, or of any building which was not needed for or incidental to the maintenance of the park as a public pleasure ground.

Held (affirming the decree of V. O. Malins) that the case turned on the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, s. 74; and that the erection of the council-room and offices was unlawful; that a portion of the land might be appropriated to the erection of a museum and conservatory, and (varying the decree of the Vice-Chancellor) that the erection of a free library as well as a museum and conservatory, was allowable as tending to promote the convenient use of the grounds.

THIS was an appeal by the defendants from a decree of Vice-Chancellor Bacon, raising the question whether a corporation could appropriate as a site for the erection of a council chamber and offices, and of a public library, museum, and conservatory, any part of a public park and recreation ground which had been vested in them in trust to be used as and for public walks or pleasure grounds for the use of the inhabitants of the borough. In the year 1844 a scheme was got up for making a park and recreation ground on Building-hill in Sunderland, and on an application by the corporation and certain inhabitants of Sunderland to the Treasury for a grant in aid, they were informed by their Lordships that they approved of the proposed scheme and were prepared to make a grant of 750*l.* for the purpose on the usual conditions, viz., "that the money will be issued if the ground when purchased is legally and permanently saved as a place of recreation for the people." The grant having been duly made, a piece of land containing fifteen acres was purchased in 1852, and in the purchase deed the corporation covenanted that the land "shall be used only as and for public walks or pleasure grounds for the use of the inhabitants of the borough of Sunderland, and that no messuage or other buildings shall hereafter be erected thereon other than the walls, or seats, or summer houses, or any building or buildings for a museum, or other public purpose of a like nature, or for the abode of the parties attendant upon and connected with such walks, pleasure grounds, and buildings, but no part of the said lands and hereditaments shall be used as a cemetery, or burial ground, nor shall any school, penitentiary, hospital, or lunatic asylum, or the like, be built on any part thereof." This land was laid out and completed as a park accordingly and became known as "the Sunderland park." In 1863 the North-Eastern Railway Company offered to sell to the corporation three sites contiguous to the park, containing together about ten and a half acres, for 10,000*l*. The corporation being the local board of health in Sunderland deemed it desirable to purchase this land as an addition to the park, and in April 1863 made a formal application to the Home Secretary for his approval of a proposal "to purchase the ground and to maintain, lay out, and plant it as public walks and pleasure grounds, as an addition to and extension of the present park in accordance with the 74th section of the Public Health Act 1848." This application was made under the Borough of Sunderland Act 1851, with which was incorporated the Public Health Act 1848, the 74th section of which latter Act authorised local boards of health, with the approval of the general board, to provide public walks and pleasure grounds. In Aug. 1863 the Home Secretary returned an answer which, after referring to the application and the report of an inspector on the subject, continued: "Now, therefore, I, having made inquiry into the application, do hereby under my hand sanction the purchase, by the said corporation as acting as such local board of health, of land as described in the aforesaid application and report for the extension of the existing Sunderland park under the powers and authority of the Public Health Act 1848, incorporated in the Borough of Sunderland Act 1851; and I do hereby further sanction their borrowing at interest the sum of 11,000*l*. to defray the cost of such purchase and laying out the said land for the aforesaid purpose, on the credit of the Sunderland district rates." The land was purchased accordingly and conveyed by a deed of April 1864 which declared that the land was to be used only for public walks and pleasure grounds. Shortly afterwards the newly purchased grounds, with the exception of about a quarter of an acre at their north-western extremity, were laid out as pleasure grounds and thrown into the original park. The land was purchased and laid out by means of 11,000*l*. borrowed upon the security of the general district rates. In 1875 the corporation determined to employ this quarter of an acre as a site for the erection of town buildings, including accommodation for a museum and library and public offices, and on the 8th April in that year they issued an advertisement for plans, specifications, and estimates for the erection on this land of a council chamber and offices, museum, and library.

In May 1875 an information was filed at the relation of three inhabitants and ratepayers of Sunderland, praying that the corporation might be restrained from appropriating any portion or portions of the park as sites or a site for the erection of any town buildings or for any erection or buildings which was not needed for or incidental to the maintenance of the said park as public walks or pleasure grounds.

At the hearing in the court below it was admitted that part of the plan of the corporation was to erect a winter garden or conservatory, and to establish a school of art as well as a library. The Vice-Chancellor, in his judgment, after stating the facts, continued: It is plain that these lands were vested in this corporation for a public purpose. It has been argued over and over again that a discretion was given to the corporation. But more than ten years ago this land was granted to be used "only as and for public walks or pleasure grounds for the use of the inhabitants of the borough," and that trust has been executed by the corporation ever since. Acts of Parliament have been referred to, which give very extensive powers to corporations. They give, amongst other things, powers to build offices; but they do not give powers to build offices upon other peoples' land or to take other peoples' land for that purpose. Now, these lands have been made into a park, which is intended only for the recreation and healthful exercise of the people of Sunderland. It has been argued that these statutes may, by a circuitry, be brought round to give to the corporation power of constructing buildings for other purposes, provided such purposes are not inconsistent with public use and benefit. But I am of opinion that buildings which are intended for purposes not connected with public walks or pleasure grounds are plainly unlawful. As to the museum and conservatory, it is a totally different thing. I think the building of a museum is entirely within the original trust. Such a building may be erected on any suitable spot within the discretion of the defendants. This the corporation are able to do; but they are not able to transport their municipal offices to the park from some other portion of the town of Sunderland. There will be an injunction, therefore, to restrain the defendants from erecting any municipal or other building in the park, except a museum or conservatory. I am also against the defendants in the matter of the erection of a library and school of art. The corporation must pay the costs of the suit."

A decree having accordingly been made restraining the corporation from appropriating any part of the park as a site for the erection of any town buildings, or any erection or building which erection or building should not be needed for or incidental to the maintenance of the said park as public walks or pleasure grounds, other than a museum or conservatory, and from applying any rates to such prohibited purposes, the corporation appealed.

Sir H. Jackson, Q.C. and Owen, for the appellants.—The question was simply one of law—whether this piece of land was or was not affected with a trust which prevented its being employed by the corporation in the manner proposed? They denied there was any dedication of the land in trust for the purposes of a park only; and contended that whatever dedication there might have been was subject to the discretion of the corporation, and that the proposed buildings were not inconsistent with the purposes of a park. The effect of the Treasury minute of 1844 was to give a discretion to the corporation, who were acting for the public benefit, and were, in fact, no other than a committee of the ratepayers generally. The land was to be used as a place of recreation for the people, but the manner of such recreation was left to the decision of the ratepayers. They would not contend that express authority was to be found for the proposition that land vested in a corporation for the purpose of a public park might be used for building a town hall; but they contended that corporations generally were empowered by statute to do by circuitry what the Sunderland corporation were proposing to do, and therefore that the court would not interfere with their doing it directly. By the 35th section of the Public Health Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63) the local board must provide and maintain necessary offices, and by the 35th section of the Labouring Classes Lodging Houses Act 1851 (14 & 15 Vict. c. 34), the council or the local board might appropriate for the purposes of the Act, in the borough or district, any lands vested in them respectively. The 33rd section of the Literary and Scientific Institutions Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 112) defined the institutions to which the Act applied, and included institutions for the promotion of science, literature, and the fine arts, libraries, and public museums. The Public Libraries Act of 1855 also authorised the application of a part of the land as a site for a public library. They, therefore, submitted that this land might be treated in the way proposed.

Kay, Q.C. and Caldecott in support of the decision of the Vice-Chancellor.—The words of sect. 18 of the Public Libraries Act 1855 could not be construed so as to include a council chamber and offices. They did not object to the erection of a conservatory, but a museum and library were clearly not within sect. 74 of the Public Health Act on which the case must turn. The object of that Act was to provide an open air place of enjoyment and recreation for the people and no building except one incidental to a garden ought to be allowed. If buildings had been intended they would have been mentioned in the Act.

JAMES, L.J.—As regards the first point decided by the Vice-Chancellor, I am of opinion that the order is clearly right, the corporation having no more authority to use any of this land as the site of a town hall than to use it for erecting shops. The original park was appropriated as "a place of recreation," and, according to the Act under which the land now in question was acquired, it must be used "as public walks or pleasure grounds." These words are not to be construed too narrowly. It is admitted by the information that some buildings are allowable, and the prayer is, as it seems to me, quite correct. The corporation is in the position of a trustee, and the question is whether, in building a museum and library, it is improperly executing the trust. The primary object of the trust is to provide a place of enjoyment and recreation; nothing is improper which conduces to that object, and we ought not to quarrel with anything which the corporation in a reasonable exercise of their discretion consider conducive to it. It is admitted that the erection of a conservatory is allowable, and it is an erection which you would expect as a matter of course to find in first rate pleasure grounds. The erection of a free museum containing botanical specimens and other curiosities appears also to be unobjectionable. A library into which people may turn if the weather becomes unfavourable also seems allowable if bonâ fide intended for the use of persons frequenting the grounds, as it will tend to promote the convenient use of the grounds. I think, therefore, that the exception in the order ought to be extended, so that the erection of a free library may not be prohibited.

MELLISH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is whether the corporation is guilty of a breach of trust in employing any part of this ground for purposes other than those mentioned in the information. I am of opinion that the ground was purchased for the purposes of the Public Health Act, s. 74, and can only be applied for such purposes as are authorised by that Act. I am of opinion, therefore, that no part of it can be used as the site of a town hall and offices. Can, then, any part of it be applied as a site for a museum, library, and conservatory? If the corporation were to acquire land for those purposes only, I think that such a purchase would not be within the Act; but public walks and pleasure grounds having been laid out on a piece of land containing twenty-five acres, it is proposed to apply a quarter of an acre for the erection of those buildings. The question then arises whether this application of a small portion of the ground is not reasonably incidental to the main object, and whether it will not improve the grounds in their character of public walks and pleasure grounds. I am of opinion that it will, and may induce more persons to frequent the grounds. I think that we ought not to put a narrow and strict construction upon the words, but that we ought to see whether the trustees, in what they are proposing to do, are bonâ fide carrying out the object of the trust.

BAGGALLAY, J.A.—I am of the same opinion. The land purchased from the railway company is vested in the corporation for the purposes mentioned in the 74th section of the Public Health Act 1848, and the corporation has power to use it in any way which will effectuate those purposes. The purposes of the section are that the land should be used for public walks and pleasure grounds, and I should much regret to be obliged to hold that applying a small portion of it for a museum, library, and conservatory, was inconsistent with this purpose. I cannot conceive anything more likely to conduce to the enjoyment of the walks and pleasure grounds than the having these erections attached to them, and I agree with the Lords Justices that the order should be varied to the extent mentioned. But we only remove the prohibition as to using the land for the site of these buildings; we say nothing as to the funds out of which the expenses of their erection are to be paid. The decree as varied would restrain the defendants from appropriating any portion of the park as a site for the erection of any town buildings, or for any erection or building which should not be needful for or incidental to the maintenance or use of the park as public walks or pleasure grounds, the injunction not to extend to a free library, museum, or conservatory, open for the use, convenience, and recreation of the persons frequenting such walks and pleasure grounds.

ELLIS v. THE LOCAL BOARD OF BROMLEY.

[CT. OF APP.]

Saturday, April 29, 1876.

(Before JAMES and MELLISH, L.JJ. and BAGGALLAY, J.A.)

ELLIS v. THE LOCAL BOARD OF BROMLEY.

Enclosure Act—Right to dig gravel from existing pit—Lateral extension of pit—Mode of working gravel pit—Destruction of surface.

By a private Act of Parliament, passed in 1764, for the purpose of extinguishing the right of common over certain commonable lands in the parish of Bromley, it was enacted that it should be lawful for the surveyors of highways of the parish at all times thereafter to cut, dig, gather, take, and carry away any quantity of gravel, or other materials for repairing roads, out of and from any pit or pits then in the possession of the lessee of the lands subject to the rights of common, to be made use of for and towards the making, laying out, or repairing any highway or road lying and being within the said parish, without paying anything for the same; and the surveyors were thereby required to fence in the said pits, and to repair the said fences as occasion should require.

One of the pits mentioned in the Act was situated in a field containing upwards of nine acres. This field had become vested in the plaintiff, who filed a bill to restrain the local board, in whom the powers of the surveyors had become vested, from extending the area of the pit in a lateral direction, and from digging gravel so as to injure the surface of the field. There was no evidence as to the condition of the pit at the date of the passing of the Act, but it was proved that in 1826 the extent of the pit was one and a half acres, that it had been enlarged to two acres in 1862, and that since that time it had been further enlarged, such enlargement being made by destroying the surface and digging out the gravel.

Held (reversing the decision of Jessel, M.R.), that the Act gave power to get the gravel in the ordinary mode of working a gravel pit, and that, as the evidence showed that this gravel pit had been usually worked by extending its area, the defendants were entitled to continue working the pit in that way, although the surface was thereby destroyed.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of the Master of the Rolls.

By a private Act of Parliament passed in 1764 (4 Geo. 3), entitled "An Act for extinguishing the rights of common in, over, and upon certain commonable lands and grounds within the manor and parish of Bromley, in the county of Kent," after reciting that there were within the manor and parish of Bromley certain commonable lands and meadow grounds, whereon the freeholders and inhabitants of the said parish had right of common and pasture from the 10th Oct. to the 5th April in every year; that the Lord Bishop of Rochester was, in right of his bishopric, lord of the manor, and that William Scott was, by virtue of a lease granted by the said bishop, possessed of all the said commonable lands and meadow grounds; and that the said lands and grounds in their then situation, were incapable of improvement, and it would be advantageous to the said William Scott, and to all persons having right of common or common of pasture in, over, and upon the said lands and grounds, if the said right of common or common of pasture was extinguished, and a proper recompense and satisfaction was made to the said persons for their right of common or common of pasture thereon; it was enacted that from and after the 24th June 1764, all rights of common or common of pasture in, over, and upon the said commonable lands and meadow grounds, should cease, determine, and be for ever extinguished; and that the yearly rent of 40l. should be issuing and going out of all the said commonable lands and meadow grounds, to be payable and paid by the said William Scott, and all and every other person and persons who should or might be possessed thereof, to the churchwardens or overseers of the poor of the said parish of Bromley for the time being, in lieu and satisfaction of, and full compensation for, such rights of common. And the Act contained the following enactment: "That from and after the 24th day of June 1764, it shall and may be lawful to and for the surveyor or surveyors of the highways of and for the said parish of Bromley for the time being, from time to time and at all times thereafter, to cut, dig, gather, take, and carry away, or cause to be cut, dug, gathered, taken, and carried away, any quantity or quantities of gravel, or other materials for repairing of roads, out of and from any pit or pits now in the possession of the said William Scott, and lying and being within the said parish, to be made use of by him or them, or as he or they shall direct, for and towards the making, laying out, or repairing any highways or road lying and being within the said parish, without paying anything for the same; and such surveyor or surveyors is and are hereby required effectually to fence in the said pits, and to repair the said fences, as occasion shall require, or cause the same to be done, in such manner as to prevent any mischief or accident happening therein."

One of the pits mentioned in the Act was situated in a field containing upwards of nine acres, and called the Great Page Heath Field, over the whole of which a stratum of gravel thirty feet thick extended.

By an award made in 1826 under the provisions of the Bromley Enclosure Act of 1821, this field and the gravel pit therein were allotted by way of exchange to one Wells, of whom the plaintiffs in the present suit were the successors in title.

The plaintiffs filed their bill against the Local Board of Bromley, in whom the rights and duties of surveyors of highways for the parish of Bromley had become vested under the provisions of the Local Government Act 1858, which were adopted by the parish in 1867.

The bill prayed that the defendants, their servants, workmen, and agents, might be restrained from further extending the area of the said gravel pit in Great Page Heath Field in a lateral direction, and from digging, cutting, gathering, taking, or carrying away any gravel or other materials for repairing of roads from or out of the said pit in such manner as to break up, destroy, or injure the surface of any part of the adjoining lands belonging to the plaintiffs.

There was no evidence as to the condition of the gravel pits at the date of the passing of the Act of 1764, but a comparison of the award of 1826 with the Ordnance survey in 1862 showed that the area of this pit had been extended from 1a. 2r. 12p. in 1826 to 2a. 0r. 9p. in 1862.

The effect of the evidence as to usage is sufficiently stated in the judgments of Jessel, M.R. and Mellish, L.J., infra.

The cause came on for hearing before the Master of the Rolls on the 21st Feb., when, after a protracted argument, his Lordship, without calling for a reply, delivered the following judgment: This case has been argued in such a manner and by such eminent counsel, that I cannot help suspecting that what is very plain is very difficult to understand. Had it not been for the argument, I should have thought it very clear indeed. A pit means a hole; and when I say so, I have before me the only general Act of Parliament which had been passed relating to supervisors of highways taking gravel or materials for road-making from gravel pits. I allude to the Act of the 5 Eliz. c. 13, which gives power to the supervisors of highways to get stone out of open quarries, and, if there are not open quarries, to dig for gravel and other materials on the lands next to the highways, not being houses, gardens, orchards, or meadows. Then it says: "It shall not be lawful to any such supervisor or supervisors by virtue of this Act to cause any rubbish to be digged out of any quarry or quarries, but only shall extend to such rubbish as shall be found there ready digged by the owner or owners of the said quarry or quarries, or otherwise by his or their licence and commandment; (2) nor shall not extend or give authority to any supervisor or supervisors to dig or cause to be digged any gravel, sand, or cinders in the house, garden, orchard, or meadow of any person or persons; nor that it shall be lawful by this Act to any such supervisor or supervisors to cause any more pits to be digged for gravel in any several and enclosed ground than one only; and that the same pit or hole so digged for gravel as is aforesaid shall not in any way be in breadth or length above ten yards over at the most: (4) and that every such supervisor as shall cause any such pit to be made and digged for gravel, sand, or cinders as is above said, shall within one month next after any such digging or pit made, cause the same to be filled and stopped up with earth, at the costs and charges of the parishioners." If not, he shall pay five marks to the owner. Here I have an Act of Parliament in pari materia, and it describes a pit as being a hole. That is my understanding of the word "pit." Then we have the particular Act of Parliament in question in the present suit, which is an Act of Parliament passed in 1764. It recites that the Bishop of Rochester, in right of his see, or as rector of the parish, is entitled to the manor; that in that manor there is a large quantity of Lammas land; that one William Scott is lessee under the bishop—no doubt he was lessee of the manor, although he is called lessee of the land;—that the freeholders have a right of common over the land from October to April in every year, and that it is very desirable to get rid of the right to common; and it enacts that the right of common shall cease, and that a rent of 40*l.* a year shall be paid to the parishioners in compensation for the loss of the right of common, which makes the whole a fee simple in the bishop, subject to the lease to Scott. And then it enacts: [His Lordship read the clause above set out, giving the surveyors power to get gravel from the pits, &c., and continued:] Now, as the law then stood under the Act of Elizabeth which I have mentioned, this being land in the neighbourhood of a road, the surveyor had a right to dig for gravel. It was not an orchard, or a house, or a garden, or a meadow, and he had a right to dig for the gravel subject to restrictions: he could only dig for a month, and he was to pay five marks if he did not fill in the pit or hole next after the expiration of one month. That was his position. Now what the Act of 1764 says is this: Instead of being limited to a month, he is to dig as long as he likes, that is, as long as the gravel will last, and, instead of paying for it, he is to take it for any period he likes without paying anything for it. Instead of being limited to making a hole ten yards across in each way, he is to take it out of any of the pits now in the possession of William Scott. That is all. Now I was gravely asked to say that this power to take gravel out of Scott's pits empowered the surveyors, if the gravel failed in the pit, because they had dug down to the bottom, to dig laterally in the neighbouring land which adjoins it, and to take gravel at their will and pleasure, without any limit, from the sides of the pit. And they actually say that the only possible limit is the extent of the field, which happens to be 9½ acres, or thereabouts. All I can say is that, if I understand language, there is no foundation for any such contention. The right to take gravel or other materials out of a hole means to take it out of a hole, and not to make the hole larger by taking it out of the neighbouring land, so that, although it may contain a part of the old hole, it is a new one. The Act empowers them to take gravel out of the hole then in the possession of William Scott; but the hole they have formed was not in his possession, but is another hole. It appears to me that there is no doubt and no ambiguity in the Act of Parliament. But the Act does not stop there, for it goes on in this way: "And such surveyor or surveyors is and are hereby required effectually to fence in the said pits"—to fence in the pits in the possession of William Scott. If I put a fence round a hole at the top of it, when it is fenced in the hole is defined, and there is no doubt what the extent of the hole is. There is no power to take down that fence—which is the theory of the other side—and make a new fence; it is quite true that they are "to repair the said fences as occasion shall require, or cause the same to be done in such manner as to prevent any mischief." What is the mischief? It is to prevent animals and people from falling down into the pit: that is what the fencing is for. It does appear to me that that requires the surveyor before he digs anything to fence in the pit; he is not to dig until he has fenced in "the said pits now in the possession of William Scott." I must say, to me it is remarkably plain. But I have sometimes thought things very plain on points of construction, and I have found other judges differ from me, and it may be so in this case; but I do think it plain beyond any controversy, as far as I am concerned, that the right to dig gravel out of a hole in William Scott's possession does not mean out of any hole which the people who have a right to take gravel may choose to make. Then I was asked to assume that the gravel was all worked out of the hole when the power was given. I must say that is too absurd. I cannot assume anything of the kind. No doubt there was plenty of gravel. The stratum of gravel was thirty feet thick, and even now it is not worked out, although it is not so good or so easy to work lower down, and it may be more expensive to get it. As I understand, there are several feet of gravel at the lowest part of the hole remaining unworked, and no doubt there was a great deal there at the time of the passing of the Act of Parliament. To my astonishment—and it is not the least marvellous part of the case—there is a prescription pleaded, that under the Prescription Act the surveyor of highways has a right to take the gravel out of the enlarged hole. Mr. Bagshawe said that there was an ambiguity in the Act of Parliament, and that, therefore, evidence of usage was admissible to explain it. I do not see the ambiguity; and, in the second place, I have no evidence of contemporaneous usage. The evidence only goes back to just before 1830; and, as I understand it, what has happened has been this. The owners of the soil have themselves worked the gravel, and in working it have enlarged the hole, and all that has ever been done has been, as far as I can see, for the surveyors of highways to take some gravel out of this enlarged hole. The right to enlarge it independently does not seem to have been claimed. Then it is said that the surveyors must have gravel to repair the roads. The answer is that they cannot have it longer than it exists. The owner may work out all his gravel at once if he pleases. It cannot be said that it will last one year, or ten years, or fifty years. The surveyors are limited: they can only take what is necessary for repairing and maintaining the roads. The owner's right is unlimited, and therefore the surveyor's right may be of a very temporary character, and of little value. Then it is said that they have in fact enjoyed this right without dispute. What does that mean? If they have done this without right, that will not give them a right by prescription. It is not an unknown thing for surveyors of highways to act in this way. They take gravel from commons or waste places without anybody interfering. The whole right comes to this, that they have done it without being remonstrated with. There was no attempt, and there could be no attempt, to carry this usage back to 1764. The fact that they have done this for 30 years does not show that they had any consent to do it before. This is not a case where usage from time immemorial is presumed for usage for a period of 20 or 30 years, for this could not be from time immemorial. As to contemporaneous practice, there is no evidence. It appears that the theory of interpreting an ambiguous document by contemporaneous practice does not apply when you have no evidence of contemporaneous practice. This practice may have existed in 1827 or 1828, but I cannot help observing that there is no old inhabitant called to carry the practice back further. As far as I can see, the defendants have no case whatever, for I think their right does not go beyond the Act of Parliament, and the Act of Parliament restricts their right to the particular pit or pits in possession of William Scott. I have one more observation to make. It has been said that this pit has been worked ever since 1764. There is no proof of that. I can see from the Act of Parliament that there were several pits, I do not know how many, in the possession of William Scott at the time the Act passed. The words of the Act are, "out of or from any pit or pits," which seems to me to show that there were more than two; the word is not "either," but "any," pit or pits. It is known that there were two, and it looks as if there were more than two; but I cannot tell whether the other pit or pits have not been worked, and perhaps they did not have recourse to this pit until comparatively lately—30 or 40 or 50 years ago. What is the limit to the claim here? In this case it is the 9½ acres of which the field consists. But what is to happen to the other pits? I have no evidence about the boundary of the other pits on the enclosed lands. It is not sufficient to say, We can suggest a boundary for this pit, because this happens to be a field of 9½ acres. What do you say to the other pits? Where are your boundaries there? As I said before, the case appears to me plain, therefore I shall grant an injunction.

ELLIS v. THE LOCAL BOARD OF BROMLEY.

[CT. OF APP.]

From this decision the defendants appealed.

Bagshawe, Q.C. and Speed, for the appellants.—The words of the Act empowering us to take the gravel are very wide and do not restrict us in any way, except that we can only use what we take for making or repairing highways or roads within the parish. The words are "cut, dig, gather, take, and carry away;" and they clearly authorise us to take the gravel in a lateral direction. The evidence shows that we are only working the pit in the way in which it has been worked as far back as living memory extends; and Waterpark v. Fennell (7 H. of L. Cas. 650) shows that, if there is any ambiguity in the words of the Act, evidence of usage is admissible to explain them.

Davey, Q.C. and O. P. Ilbert for the plaintiffs.—The defendants claim a right to destroy the surface of our land, and they must prove an express grant of such a right. In Bell v. Wilson (14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 115; L. Rep. 1 Ch. 303), where a conveyance reserved to the grantor all mines and minerals, it was held that the term "minerals" included freestone, but that the grantor had liberty only to get the freestone by underground mining, and not by working in an open quarry; and yet the conveyance reserved to the grantor very full liberty to "dig, bore, work, lead, and carry away" the minerals; and there was evidence that the usage of the country was to work freestone by open quarry. Therefore that is a strong case in our favour. In Wakefield v. The Duke of Buccleuch (23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 102; L. Rep. 4 E. & L. 377) the House of Lords held that the lord of the manor had power to let down the surface on making compensation; but it was only because the conveyance there contained a provision as to compensation for destruction of the surface that the House of Lords held there was a right to let down the surface. In Heat v. Gill (27 L. T. Rep. 291; L. Rep. 7 Ch. 699) Mellish, L. J., in delivering the judgment of the court, said with reference to Wakefield v. The Duke of Buccleuch: "I think that no one can read the judgment without coming to the conclusion that, if the provision as to compensation had not been there, the House of Lords, notwithstanding the strength of the other words, would in all probability have come to a different conclusion." That is also strongly in our favour; but the words of the Act which require the surveyors "to fence in the said pits and to repair the said fences as occasion shall require" conclusively show that it was intended that the area of the pits should not be enlarged beyond their limits at the time of the passing of the Act. [JAMES, L.J.—That does not seem so to me, for the words "as occasion shall require" may apply to the fencing as well as to the repairing of the fences.]

F. Stevens, for a defendant in the same interest as the appellants, took no part in the argument.

Without calling for a reply,

JAMES, L.J. said: With all proper deference to the opinion of the Master of the Rolls, I confess I do not agree with his decision. The gravel pits which are the subject of this appeal are expressly referred to in the Act of Parliament which was passed in 1764 for the purpose of extinguishing the right of common over commonable lands within the manor of Bromley. When this Act was passed, gravel had been dug from parts of the manor for the repair of the roads and for other purposes. The terms of the Act referring to these pits are as follows: "From and after the 24th day of June 1764, it shall be lawful for the surveyor or surveyors of the highways of the said parish of Bromley for the time being, from time to time and at all times thereafter, to cut, dig, gather, take, and carry away any quantity or quantities of gravel or other materials for the repairing of roads out of and from any pit or pits now in the possession of the said William Scott, and lying and being within the said parish, to be made use of by him or them, or as he or they shall direct, for and towards the making, laying out, or repairing any highway or road lying and being within the said parish, without paying anything for the same; and such surveyor or surveyors is and are hereby required effectually to fence in the said pits and to repair the said fences as occasion shall require, or cause the same to be done in such manner as to prevent any mischief or accident happening therein." That is, they are to be at liberty to get out of and from any of the pits gravel or other materials. That really seems to be the true meaning of the section of the Act which says that they may cut, dig, gather, take, and carry away gravel. To "cut" implies something more than digging out of a hole. The Master of the Rolls seems to have been of opinion that a pit must be something in the nature of a hole in the ground which can be worked by means of a shaft or well; that they must go down by the shaft and work out the gravel, or whatever it may be, by mining operations. In my opinion it is not working by a shaft or well that is intended to be referred to here by the word "cut." If you turn the words used into Latin-English, the meaning of the Act is plain enough, and that is that they are to be at liberty to excavate gravel or other materials out of and from an existing excavation. It is, of course, utterly impossible to take gravel from an existing excavation without either deepening it or enlarging it laterally. I am not aware of any principle of our law, or of anything arising out of the natural fitness of things, which would require the gravel to be taken from the north, or south, or east, or west side of the pits, or to be taken vertically or laterally. It appears to me that what was intended by the Act of Parliament was that the pits should be worked or excavated in the ordinary and reasonable manner in which they had, at the time the Act was passed, been done. The persons who have given evidence on the part of the defendants have given evidence showing that the usual mode of working such pits is by a roadway being made into the pit, for a cart to go down and gather up and take away the gravel. In the ordinary course of such operations, carried on for a number of years, the pit is necessarily either deepened or extended laterally. There is nothing, either in the bill or in the evidence, to show that anything has been done by the defendants otherwise than they were entitled to do according to the ordinary mode of user of a gravel pit. Reference was made by counsel to those cases which show that, in mining or excavating minerals and things of that kind, the persons who do so must leave a support to the surface. That, however, has application only to mining properties, and not to gravel pits, which must ordinarily be entirely open from the top to the bottom. I am, therefore, of opinion that the defendants have done nothing but that which they were authorised to do by the Act of Parliament.

MELLISH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that the whole question in dispute really turns upon this. What is the meaning of the words of the Act which say that "it shall be lawful for the surveyor or surveyors of the highways of the said parish of Bromley for the time being from time to time and at all times thereafter, to cut, dig, gather, take and carry away any quantity or quantities of gravel or other materials for the repairing of roads out of and from" certain pits? Upon these words the question arises, What is the meaning of cutting, digging, and taking away gravel? My understanding of the working of a gravel pit is that the gravel may be taken either from the bottom or from the sides of the pit. Gravel taken from the sides of the pit is just as much gravel taken from the pit as gravel taken from the bottom of it. I think it is impossible to draw any distinction between the one mode of taking it and the other. The Master of the Rolls, in my opinion, put too narrow a meaning upon the word "pit." What is the natural and ordinary meaning of a gravel pit? I take it to be this, that it merely means an excavation from which gravel may be got. Whether the gravel is taken from the pit laterally or vertically, it is still a gravel pit within the meaning of the Act. It was said in the course of the argument that no express power was given by the Act to take gravel from the surface. But, even if no express power be given to take away the surface of the soil under which the gravel is, yet it was said, on the other side, if a right to take that gravel is granted, that is as strong as a power to take the surface, and I quite agree with that. If the right were given to take the gravel which was in the pit, and which extended absolutely, as I understand, up to the top of the ground, except in so far as it was covered by a mere surface of mould, it necessarily follows that the right of affecting the surface of the soil, in so far as necessary, was also given. Then, with regard to the evidence as to the mode of user, if it had been found that in working this gravel pit for a series of years after the passing of the Act, say up to the year 1860, the gravel has always been worked without enlarging the area of the pit, but that then in and from 1860, because the roads in the parish of Bromley had largely increased, and more gravel was consequently required, the surveyors of the parish, or the defendants, had begun to enlarge the area, then an argument might arise as to whether the mode in which it is now worked by the defendants is different from that in which it was worked in 1764. That sort of argument, however, is met by the evidence which has been given on the part of the defendants, which certainly goes to show that, so far back as living memory extends, the gravel of the pit has always been got in the same manner as it is now—namely, by digging and by enlarging the area. That is proved by what is called the evidence of the oldest inhabitant. If evidence is given, say, by a man who says he is seventy years of age, and that he has always lived in the parish, that gravel has always within his memory been got from the pit in the mode in which it has been got since, say the year 1860, by the defendants, such evidence points to the conclusion that the mode in which the gravel has been got since 1860 is the same as the mode in which it was got by the owner previous to the passing of the Act, and afterwards by the surveyors. I think that the evidence shows that the gravel pits were not worked in any different manner in 1860 from that in which they had been worked at any time previously, and my opinion is that the defendants have a right to take the gravel in the ordinary way, even if doing so does enlarge the area of the pit. I think the limit, and the only limit, is as to the means in which gravel is ordinarily got. For instance, I do not think they could, if the gravel were exhausted at one part of a pit, by tunnelling or mining go through a hundred yards of earth to get to the gravel which was known to be under a different part of the surface. My opinion, therefore, is that, so far as they can get it, and until they come to the end of the gravel, they may work it in the ordinary way.

BAGGALLAY, J.A.—In my opinion it has not been established that the Bromley Local Board have acted in excess of their powers which are derived under the Act of 1764. What was the purpose for which the power of taking gravel from the pits was conferred? Not only to enable the surveyors of the parish of Bromley to repair the then existing highways and roads, but also to make new highways and roads in the parish. Since the passing of the Act the roads and the highways in and about Bromley have been largely increased, and now amount to a length of twenty-seven miles in the aggregate. By the terms of the Act I think it was to be a perpetual right to take the gravel for this purpose for all the time during which the gravel would last; otherwise the Act would have stated to what extent it was intended that the gravel should be taken. The next thing to consider is what is the effect of the right conferred by the Act of Parliament. It is true that the pits referred to were situated on land which was Lammas land, over which there were common rights. I think, however, that the words of the Act giving the power of digging gravel from the pits which were then in existence, show that it was intended to confer the right to take gravel sufficient for the purposes indicated by the Act, and that this appears by the words "cut" and "dig." These words not only give the right to carry the pits lower down, in order to get the gravel which was there, but also to take gravel from the pit's side, and by so cutting the gravel at the side to enlarge the area of the pits. But, of course, this was a right which was to be exercised in a proper and reasonable, and not in an oppressive, manner. There is no suggestion that what the defendants have been doing has not been done in a fair manner, assuming of course that they have the right to extend the area of the pits.

An argument has been raised upon the terms of the clause in the Act with reference to fencing the pits. It has been contended that the provision in the Act requiring the surveyors to effectually fence in the pits and repair the fences as occasion should require, in such a manner as to prevent any mischief or accident happening, pointed to a fencing in of the pits as they existed at the date when the Act was passed; that the repairs were confined to the fences which had been put up in the first instance, and that those words therefore precluded the enlargement of the pits. But I read the words of the Act of Parliament as requiring this fencing to be done as occasion should require, these words equally applying to new fencing to be thereafter put up, as to keeping in repair the fences already existing; that is, that the new fencing was to be kept in repair exactly as the previous fencing was. It has been suggested, also, that the construction of the words of this clause of the Act for which the defendants, the surveyors, contend, has the effect of placing an unreasonable burden upon this small piece of land, and that in process of time, if the surveyors' contention were right, three acres out of the nine acres of land in respect of which this question has arisen might be taken up for the purpose of supplying gravel for the repair of the roads in the parish. But when this right of taking gravel was conferred it must be borne in mind that the portion of land in which the pit is situated was not nine, but 300 acres or land. The bill must, therefore, be dismissed with costs.

Appeal accordingly allowed.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. THE MUTUAL TONTINE WESTMINSTER CHAMBERS ASSOCIATION (LIMITED). (a)

Inhabited house duty—Buildings let out in flats—Assessment—Valuation list—48 Geo. 3, c. 55, schedule B, rr. 4, 6, 14—The Valuation (Metropolis) Act 1869—32 & 33 Vict. c. 67, ss. 45, 76.

The defendant association are the owners of the Westminster Chambers, consisting of seven blocks of buildings, having seven principal entrances. Each block internally is structurally divided into different tenements or suites of rooms, which are let and occupied separately as offices or residences. Each suite of rooms contains within itself the usual conveniences of a house, and has an outer door opening on to a common staircase. There is no communication between the different suites except by this staircase. The outer door of each block is kept locked at night, and a porter, appointed by the defendants, and who lives in a distinct set of rooms in the basement of each block, has the care of, and access to, by means of a duplicate key, the suites of rooms therein, and acts as servant (free of charge) to the occupiers of the suites, under regulations made by the association. The Commissioners, under the Westminster Improvement Act 1853, of whom the defendant association are assignees of the seven blocks, have power to demise or sell any set of apartments separately. None of the suites of rooms have been sold, but the greater number have been demised for terms of years under agreements containing the following (amongst other) terms: The lessors are to pay all rates, &c. The lessees are to repair—not to commit waste, not to alter the arrangement of the premises, and not to underlet or assign, the lessors to have power to enter and view the interior of the premises, and a power of re-entry on non-payment of rent within twenty-one days after it becomes due, and for breach of covenant.

In the valuation list, prepared under the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 67, each suite of rooms was treated as a separate hereditament, and valued as such. In assessing the property for the inhabited house duty, the seven blocks were treated as seven inhabited houses, and the duty was assessed upon the defendants as occupiers thereof under rule 6 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, schedule B, in the sum of 548l. 17s., that sum representing the aggregate amount of the values in the valuation list before mentioned, of the suites of rooms (117 in number) comprised in the seven blocks.

Held (affirming the judgment of a majority of the Court of Exchequer below), First, that the seven blocks of buildings were properly assessed to the inhabited house duty as seven separate inhabited houses, in the occupation of the defendant association itself. Secondly, that the value upon which this assessment was made was properly represented by the sum of the values, inserted in the valuation list for the time being in force under the Valuation Act (Metropolis) 1869, of the 117 separate tenements comprised in the seven blocks.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Exchequer upon a case stated for their opinion as to the proper mode of charging on the defendant association house duty under the facts stated in this case. The Court of Exchequer (Bramwell and Cleasby, BB., Kelly, C.B. dissenting) upheld the assessment made on the defendants, and from this decision they now appealed.

The case in the court below will be found fully reported ante vol. 9, p. 574; 33 L. T. Rep., N.S. 180.

The facts are sufficiently set out in the head note to this report, and in the judgments. The material sections and rules of Acts of Parliament referred to in argument are set out in extenso in the judgment (post) of Jessel, M.R.

Manisty, Q.C. and Poland, for the defendant association.—The seven buildings are not properly assessed as seven dwelling-houses belonging to the association as occupiers. They should have been assessed as 117 separate dwelling-houses in the occupation of the tenants. These suites of rooms are similar to chambers in one of the Inns of Court, which by rule 4 of Schedule B to 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, are subject to duty as inhabited houses, and the occupiers charged. [JESSEL, M.R.—That is a special provision inserted in the Act for the protection of particular objects. It does not do away with the other general provisions of the statute, if those are plain.] For the purposes of rating, voting, or settlement, actual occupation constitutes a separate dwelling-house. These suites are in fact separately occupied. [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—It does not follow that they are inhabited houses for the purpose of being charged with house duty.] Under the statute 43 Eliz.,

c. 2, which is the foundation of local taxation, it has been a universal construction that an occupier of a severed portion of a house is an occupier of a "house" within the meaning of the statute. Then, by 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, the Legislature intended to put the charge upon occupiers in respect to imperial in the same way as had been done in respect to local taxation. The Queen's Bench in The Mutual Tontine Westminster Chambers Association (Limited) v. St. George's Union Assessment Committee (25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 696; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 90), have held that these very sets of rooms were "houses" for the purpose of being rated to the poor. It is submitted that they are also "houses" for the purposes of the inhabited house duty. [JESSEL, M. R.—Sect. 4 and rule 6 of 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, refer to a "tenement" and a "tenement in a house." How does a tenement in a house differ from these suites of rooms? I do not see any structural difference between one of these blocks and an ordinary dwelling-house.] Rule 6 means that the occupier of rooms let out separately is not rateable, not being the occupier of the house, and that the landlord is rateable. That being so, rule 14 becomes necessary to apply to a case like the present. These are "distinct properties" within the meaning of the rule; as to the construction which has been put upon the word "house," there is Evans v. Finch, (Cro. Rep. Car. 473), where it was held that chambers in the Temple were domus mansionalis of the occupier, and that burglary could be committed by breaking into them. In Reg. v. Inhabitants of Usworth (5 A. & E. 261), where one rented and occupied the middle floor of a house, it was held that the premises he so rented were "a separate and distinct dwelling-house" within the 5 Geo. 4, c. 57, for the purposes of settlement, and in Henrette v. Booth (15 C. B. 500), it was held that the occupation of "part of a house" might confer a right to vote for a borough under 2 Will. 4, c. 45, s. 27, if there was independent occupation and actual severance from the rest of the house. Secondly, under sect. 45 of the recent Valuation (Metropolis) Act, the valuation list made under that Act is to be conclusive evidence both of the gross and rateable value of the several hereditaments included therein, and of the fact that everything required to be inserted therein has been inserted. Then the 76th section says that where (amongst other things) for the purposes of the Acts relating to house duty, it is necessary to make a separate valuation of any hereditament by reason of its not having been separately valued in any valuation list, then the value of such hereditament is to be ascertained in the same manner as if the Act had not passed. In the valuation list for the poor rate each of these 117 sets of rooms has been valued as a separate hereditament, and the seven blocks of buildings are now assessed for house duty at the aggregate values of the 117 separate hereditaments. There has been no valuation of each block as "houses," and if they were so held to be, each block should be valued as a separate hereditament apart from the Valuation (Metropolis) Act. It is not a fair valuation as it stands. The decision in the Mutual Tontine, &c. Society v. St. George's Union Assessment Committee (ubi sup.) is simply that the owners of each flat are occupiers to be rated as such for the poor rate, not that the aggregate value of all the 117 flats is to be taken to be the value for all purposes of the blocks as houses.

CT. OF APP.] ATTORNEY-GEN. v. MUTUAL TONTINE WESTMINSTER CHAMBERS ASSOCIATION. [CT. OF APP.]

The Solicitor-General (with him Pinder), for the Crown, was not called upon.

JESSEL, M.R.—This is an appeal from a judgment of a majority of the judges in the Court of Exchequer, deciding what is the true construction of the statute 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, as to the mode of charging duty upon inhabited houses. There is also involved the construction of the recent Valuation Act for the metropolis. The contention for the appellants is that certain flats or suites of apartments ought to be treated as separate houses, and valued and rated as such. The circumstances are peculiar. There are seven blocks of buildings, divided into flats, and built by the appellants, the Westminster Chambers Association. They differ, no doubt slightly in construction from an ordinary dwelling house, for although they are externally exactly the same, internally they are divided in this way: Each set of apartments has one door opening on to a common staircase, and each suite of apartments is, as it were, self contained with all the necessary conveniences to enable persons to inhabit it as a place of business, but with these exceptions, and with the exception of its size, each block does not differ from an ordinary London building. The first point is, how would you, in ordinary language, describe one of these blocks? Without doubt or question you would call it a house. In either its legal or common sense there is no doubt about the meaning of the word "house," and it has not been contended either here or in the court below that either in its legal or ordinary sense the word house would not sufficiently describe one of these blocks. Now the rule is, that in construing a legal instrument, whether it is an Act of Parliament or not, it is the duty of the court to give every term used in the instrument its ordinary and legal meaning, unless there is something either in the contract, or in the nature of the subject matter of the instrument, to compel the court to alter that meaning. Therefore, it is for those who say that a term used in a particular Act or instrument ought not to be received in its ordinary or legal acceptation to show something bringing it within one of these grounds of exception. Now, so far from finding anything in the Act of Parliament we are considering to alter the ordinary and legal meaning of the word "house," I find a great deal to confirm my opinion that the word is there used in its ordinary sense. It was argued for the appellants that in construing other Acts of Parliament, and other legal instruments, the courts, with another context, and with a different subject matter, had attached a different meaning to the word "house," and had held that a separate occupation of a portion of a house, perhaps two rooms, might constitute a "house" within the meaning of those other Acts of Parliament or instruments; but it appears to me that, unless you show something in the instrument we have to construe now relating to or connected with those other instruments, you cannot construe "house" in this Act by reference to the construction which has been put on the word in other Acts. The argument was also weak on another ground. The authorities referred to only show that in some cases a portion of a "house" may be described as a house; but no authority was produced, nor does any exist to show that an entire building could not properly be described as a house, although a portion of it might also fulfil that description. The two propositions are not inconsistent; a part of a house is constantly described as a "house." In this Act of Parliament we find not only a dwelling-house, which is the main thing, but we find a "coach-house," and a "wash-house" and a "warehouse" and a "counting-house," all of which are, and have been considered by the framers of this Act of Parliament, not separate buildings, but portions of buildings, and to be treated as portions of a dwelling-house for the purposes of this Act. Therefore you may have the word "house" properly used, first of all, as describing the whole of a dwelling-house; and, secondly, some or one of its parts; and because you can describe part of the building as a "house," it does not follow that you may not describe properly the whole as a "house" also. There is another instance, familiar at all events to lawyers—each Inn of Court is called, as we all know, a "house," yet it includes a great many separate buildings and a great many separate houses. Take, again, the Charterhouse, which is still called the Charterhouse, although it includes many separate houses. The main fact, therefore, that a separate portion of a building may be called a "house," does not show anything for or against the aggregate or entire building being called so too. A good illustration of that is afforded by the old case cited for the appellants (Evans v. Finch, ubi sup.). There a man was indicted for having broken into domum mansionalem Hugonis Audley, and I suppose the question was, whether Audley's chambers in the Temple were correctly described as his dwelling-house, and it was decided that the description was correct. Nobody decided and nobody suggested that the premises might not have been as well described as a house in a Court of the Inner Temple. It was not suggested that the total number of the sets of chambers in the Inn might not have been described as a house. That was not the point; the only point was, whether the one set of chambers was sufficiently described, and it is quite plain that the other point was not thought of as arguable, because Audley's chambers are talked of as part of a house. They say, "but that divers persons were in the hall and in other places of the house." Whether that meant the hall of the Inner Temple, or the hall of the building which comprised the set of chambers, is uncertain, but they had described the chambers as the dwelling-house of Audley, and the only point was, whether they satisfied that description. That being so, it does not appear that the point suggested there has any direct bearing on the point we have to decide. The two Acts of Parliament referred to were, first, the well-known statute of Elizabeth relating, it must be remembered, to the rating of occupiers in respect of the rating, not only of "houses," but of "houses and land," the word land being a word of wide meaning in English law, and including not only any house, but any building which may stand on the land. The questions which have been decided, therefore, under that statute have been, whether or not there was a separate occupation. How far the land being in juxtaposition with the house influenced the judges in their decisions upon that statute, and how the fact of mere occupancy being the test point also influenced them, it is immaterial to inquire. It is enough to say that there you had a different subject-matter and a different context.

CT. OF APP.] ATTORNEY-GEN. v. MUTUAL TONTINE WESTMINSTER CHAMBERS ASSOCIATION. [CT. OF APP.]

A similar observation applies to the cases cited on the construction of the Settlement and Voting Acts. There a totally different set of words were used, words relating to severance and occupancy, and these words again received a different construction in reference to a different subject-matter and a different context. I now come to the real point we have to decide; what is the meaning of the word "house" in the statute before us, and is there any reason for altering the general meaning of the word with respect to this statute and these particular buildings? It may be that there is. It might be found that the Legislature had described these particular buildings in a different way, but the only legislative definition we can find relating to one of these buildings describes it as a "house." That definition is not wanted; because, as I said before, you must construe the word in its ordinary and legal meaning, even without the legislative direction. These buildings are described in the Westminster Improvement Act, which is of course as much an Act of Parliament as any other, and about which there is this additional remark to be made, that the Act of Parliament being one promoted by the appellants' own association, it contains their own description of their own property, and it is a description which, therefore, cannot very well be refused by the appellants. The description is this: It is enacted "that where any house built on land of the commissioners shall be occupied or intended to be occupied by different persons in distinct sets of apartments, the commissioners, their successors, or assigns, may, if they shall think fit so to do, demise or sell any set of apartments separately from the rest of the said house." Nothing can, therefore, be plainer than that, as regards these particular buildings, the Legislature has described each of them as a "house." It has described the apartments as part of the house which may be sold away separately from the rest of the house, and the commissioners themselves have so described the property in question, showing that they took the same view as to the meaning of the word applied to these buildings as I am disposed to do on the general principles of construction. Next, is there anything in the Act of Geo. 3 to cut down the meaning of these words? It seems to me to be all the other way. The first rule says that the duty shall "be charged annually on the occupier or occupiers for the time being of every such dwelling-house" in a certain way. The second is "every coach-house, stable, wash-house, laundry, wood-house, bake-house, dairy, and all other offices, &c., belonging to and occupied with any dwelling-house shall, in charging the said duties, be valued together with such dwelling-house, &c." Then several houses are mentioned which might be separate, and if held separately and occupied separately, then might be separately valued, but they are charged, according to the legal meaning of the words, "together with the dwelling-house." Then there is, at the end of r. 21, a restriction showing that the framers of the Act knew the meaning of the words: "Provided no more than one acre of such gardens and pleasure-grounds shall in any case be so valued;" a "house" in law including any land which is so found. Then there is this, "all shops and warehouses which are attached to the dwelling-house, or have any communication therewith, shall, in charging such duties, be valued together with the dwelling-house." Certain exceptions follow, and the next rule (4) is "every chamber or apartment in any of the Inns of Court," &c., being severally in the tenure or occupation of any person or persons, shall be charged thereto as an entire house, and on the respective occupiers thereof." I do not think that bears very strongly either way; if it has any bearing at all, I think it tends to show that chambers, being expressly excepted, would not have been otherwise so charged. But the important rule in this case is rule 6: "Where any house shall be let in different stories, tenements, lodgings, or landings, and shall be inhabited by two or more persons or families, the same shall nevertheless be subject to, and shall in like manner be charged to the said duties, as if such house or tenement was inhabited by one person or family only, and the landlord or owner shall be deemed the occupier of such dwelling-house, and shall be charged to the said duties." Then there is a provision that in case he does not reside within the limits of the collector, the occupier shall be charged, and if the house or any part of it is actually let out in "different stories," the tenants are to deduct the duty from their rents. Now it is contended that these blocks of buildings are not, in the language of the Act, "let out in different stories, tenements, lodgings, or landings;" but I think that no words in the English language could better describe the case of these buildings. They are actually let out in "different stories." They are let out in "different tenements," and they are certainly let out to "two or more persons or families." It exactly bears out my view that each block is a large house let out in the way described in the Act. It is said to be a hardship so to construe the Act; without expressing an opinion upon that—and I have no right to do so—it is what the Legislature has directed to be done in the case put, where the house is let in different stories. If one story only is let out of a number, it is expressly enacted that payment is to be made for the whole house, even although five-sixths of it is uninhabited. Nothing can be plainer than that this is so, and it cannot be any greater hardship where the house is one house in every sense of the term, and is let in separate tenements, as is the case here. The hardship, if any, is the same in both cases, and it is plain that the Legislature intended, for fiscal reasons, that in some cases, although five-sixths of the house might be uninhabited, yet the whole tax should be paid. That, I think, is an answer to the suggestion of hardship made in argument. It is necessary to read the next rule (7) for another reason. The rule is, "No dwelling-house or other such premises as aforesaid, shall be estimated or rated at any less annual value than the rent or value at which the same premises stand charged in the last rate made on or before the time of making the assessment for the relief of the poor in the same parish or place." Then the 14th rule says, "Where any dwelling-house shall be divided into separate tenements, being distinct properties, every such tenement shall be subject to the same duties as if the same was an entire house, which duty shall be paid by the occupiers thereof respectively." It was argued in the court below that this rule applied to the present case, although it was not so argued to day, and I give the appellants the benefit of a repetition of the argument for whatever it may be worth. The meaning of rule 14 is, I think, very plain indeed. It says, "different tenements being distinct properties," and it therefore contemplates the possibility of there being tenements which are not distinct properties. Then the question is, Is one of these blocks a dwelling-house divided into "different tenements being distinct properties?" because, if it is, it should be otherwise rated. What is the meaning of "distinct properties?" Here again you apply the ordinary rule of construction. Distinct properties are the properties of different owners, but in the case before us it is plain that there are not different owners. There is only one landlord for every one of the tenements, and only one tenant below him for each of the tenements. The landlord lets directly to the tenant below him. What would have been the case if a tenement had been sold I offer no opinion upon, nor do I say what would have happened if there had been a demise of one of them, because then the intermediate tenant might in a sense be said to be the intermediate owner. This, however, is not the case here. This is a single letting. It is plainly within the 6th rule, because it is plainly a letting in "different tenements." It is not within the 14th rule, because in no sense can these flats or suites of apartments be said to be distinct properties—there being but one landlord throughout. There is another suggestion as to "distinct properties," which I cannot quite follow. It has been suggested that the word "property" may be used, not in its ordinary sense as showing ownership, but as describing the structural character of the buildings. I do not think that can be the true meaning of the word, but if it were, looking at the words "divided" and "distinct," I should say that these tenements were not within the 14th rule. First of all, I cannot find that the houses were divided internally in the way of structural division, nor do I see that the properties are distinct in the sense of any physical severance which everyone could see. I am therefore of opinion, taking the Act of Parliament and these rules together, and for the reasons I have given, that these seven buildings are properly described and charged as houses within the stat. 48 Geo. 3, c. 55. Then comes the second question. The tenements have been rated to the relief of the poor under the Valuation (Metropolis) Act as separate tenements. The separate value is set upon each, so that there are 117 annual values; and now comes the question, how are you to estimate the value for the purpose of the house tax? That must depend upon the Valuation Act, and the object and meaning of that Act is plain; it is to make one assessment for local taxation as far as possible. Therefore, that being the object aimed at by the Legislature, you are not to go out of your way to defeat that object. The words of sect. 45 are, "The valuation list for the time being in force shall be deemed to have been duly made in accordance with this Act, and the Acts incorporated therewith, and shall, for all or any of the purposes in this section mentioned, be conclusive evidence of the gross value and of the rateable value of the several hereditaments included therein, and of the fact that all hereditaments required to be inserted therein have been so inserted." So that if the valuation stood upon that section alone it would be conclusive. The valuation list is to be conclusive for the purpose of the house, not only of the value, but of the fact that everything required to be inserted therein has been inserted therein. Then the 76th section says, "Where, for the purposes of the Acts relating to the duty on inhabited houses, &c., it is necessary to make a separate valuation of any hereditament by reason of its not being separately valued in any valuation list, the value of such hereditament shall be ascertained in the same manner as if this Act had not passed." It is said that under those words, inasmuch as you have to value the house, and the house itself as such is not valued, though each tenement comprising the house is valued, that it is necessary to make a separate valuation of the house as one hereditament which is not separately valued in the valuation list. Of course, one answer to that would be that the words "separately valued" mean that when you cannot otherwise ascertain its separate value you must do so from the valuation list, by adding up the value of all the tenements. That seems to have been the view adopted by Mr. Justice Blackburn, that it is for this purpose to be separately valued, because, without going beyond the list, you can ascertain the total separate valuation of the hereditament. That is one answer, but there is another pointed out by the Lord Chief Justice, which to my mind is quite conclusive. Rule 7 of the 48 Geo. 3 c. 55 is that "No dwelling-house or other such premises as aforesaid" shall be valued at less than the poor-rate value. Now the poor-rate value of this house is the total value of all the tenements, and that has been decided by the Queen's Bench. The meaning of the 7th rule, then, is that whatever value you put on the house for the purpose of this Act, it shall not be less than the poor-rate value; and it is admitted by the appellants that the poor-rate value is not too little. They complain, on the contrary, that it is too much. It is not, therefore, necessary to make the separate valuation for the purpose of the house duty, because, having the poor-rate value ascertained, that must be sufficient to enable you to assess the house tax, which is all that you are required to do. I am of opinion, therefore, on both points, that the decision of the majority of the judges in the court below was right, and must be affirmed.

LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—This case has been so fully discussed by the Master of the Rolls that I have little to add to his judgment. I will simply say that the point is substantially whether a house being let in different flats, stories, or suites, the 6th rule of Schedule B, of 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, does or does not apply to the subject-matter of the rating. The question appears to me to be conclusively answered by reference to sect. 69 of the Act by which the appellant society were created, and under which they hold their premises, because that section enables them to do certain things with a "house" erected on their land, and occupied or intended to be occupied, in different sets of apartments by different persons. The appellants, therefore, have an Act of Parliament under which they erect what the Act itself calls a house occupied by different persons in distinct sets of apartments. That Act was passed in 1853, and the question is, are we to construe the words there in any different sense from those used in 1808 (Geo. 3, c. 55), "house let in different stories, tenements, lodgings, or landings?" The words, though certainly not quite identical, are as nearly so as words can well be, and I think that where the construction of the appellants' Act is plainly that in referring to houses occupied by different persons in distinct sets of apartments the very subject matter of the rating is meant, we cannot torture words in the Act of 1808, and make them mean something entirely different from what they mean in the Act of 1853, which is the Act under which these blocks of buildings were erected. The Master of the Rolls has clearly put what seems to me the right answer to the second point, and I have nothing to add upon it. I will just say, however, that the case quoted from Croke's Reports (ubi sup.) does not appear to me to have any bearing one way or the other on the present case. It only decides that the offence of burglary can be committed in chambers in the Temple, and I do not see how in any way it decides what is a "dwelling house" for the purposes of this case.

POLLOCK, B.—Giving every effect to the appellants' argument, I cannot come to any other conclusion than that the decision of the court below was right and must be affirmed. I was impressed with Mr. Manisty's argument that where there is a series of statutes in pari materia, it is extremely desirable to give them the same construction as far as possible, but in this argument I think two points have been overlooked. In the first place I am not certain that the statutes are in pari materia in the sense that the Legislature may not have intended to make the incidence of taxation fall differently with regard to one imperial tax than with regard to another. But I think it is erroneous, when a series of Acts of Parliament have been passed, to necessarily apply the same construction of language to both the earlier and the later Act. I believe the true rule of construing Acts of Parliament to be that which the Master of the Rolls has stated to-day, and which was first laid down by Mr. Justice Burton, in Ireland, and has repeatedly been spoken of with commendation. Therefore, in dealing with the first Act of Geo. 3, and taking into account the knowledge the Legislature then possessed, I find the word "house" first used in the enacting part of sect. 1, where the words are, "and upon inhabited houses as set forth in the schedule to this Act." Now, no one at that time could have had any doubt what an "inhabited house" meant generally. Then, taking rule 6, upon which this case almost entirely turns, the words are, "Where any house shall be let in different stories, tenements, lodgings, or landings, and shall be inhabited by one or more persons or families." These seem to me to be the proper and fit words in which to describe a house let as this one is let, and the same language is imported into the appellants' own Act. I have nothing to add upon the second point. Rule 7 appears to me to exactly meet the present case.

MACKETT v. THE COMMISSIONERS OF HERNE BAY.

Private Act of Parliament—Dedication of lands for purposes of—Proposed roads, streets, and squares—Adverse possession—Statute of Limitations—Injunction.

In 1830 A. projected the formation of a seaside town, to be built on his lands, and a plan was prepared which showed the sites of various streets, roads, and squares, proposed to be made and formed on such lands. In June 1833 a private Act of Parliament was obtained by which the lands described on the plan were made a distinct parish for the purposes of the Act, and by which commissioners were appointed in whom were vested all roads, streets, and ways, then made and used by the public, or thereafter to be made and adopted by the commissioners as public ways under the Act. The Act also conferred plenary powers on the commissioners with regard to the paving, lighting, draining, and repairing, of such streets, roads, and ways.

In Feb. 1833 A. had sold and conveyed to B., who was one of the principal promoters of the Act, and one of the First Commissioners appointed thereunder, several of the plots of land described on the plan and on which were delineated the sites of certain of the proposed roads, streets, and squares. Previously and subsequently to the Act numerous houses had been built, and some of the roads, streets, and ways shown on the plan had been wholly or partially formed, and had been adopted by the commissioners, but no houses were at any time erected on the lands conveyed to B., and the same (including such parts as comprised the sites of the proposed roads, streets, and squares) were from 1833 to 1867 uninterruptedly held and enjoyed and cultivated as arable and pasture lands by B. and his lessees.

In 1868 the commissioners gave B.'s devisees notice of their intention to take possession of the sites of the proposed streets, roads, and squares shown on the plan, and in 1871 they proceeded to mark, grip up, and stump out such sites on the ground that the same had been dedicated to the purposes of the Act by the promoters of the Act, and that they were acting within their statutory powers. On bill being filed to restrain the commissioners from so doing, Held, that although there might have been a dedication of their lands by the promoters of the Act, such dedication was not complete until the intended streets and roads had been used and adopted by the public; and that, there having been no such use and adoption for upwards of forty years, the proposed sites were not within the statutory powers of the commissioners, and an injunction granted accordingly.

Held, also, that the powers of the commissioners were only to be exercised in respect of roads which were made or which should be made consequent on the erection of buildings to which such roads would be applicable and useful, but that no rights, statutory or other, could be acquired so as to prevent the exercise of the powers given by the Act to require and compel the formation of roads and streets whenever and wherever the state of circumstances requiring such roads and streets should come into existence.

In the year 1830 Sir Henry Oxenden, who was the owner of an estate of considerable extent at Herne, in the county of Kent, considered that a part of his estate was suitable for the formation of a seaside watering place, and accordingly procured a plan to be made by a local surveyor of a portion of the estate which he severed from two of his farms, the one called Underdown Farm and the other Sea-street or Ashbee's Farm, and which he offered for sale in lots. The plan so made had described upon it streets, roads, and squares, a plantation, a parade, a terrace, and a pier, none of which then existed, as indicated on the plan, but which were put upon the plan for the purpose of showing to purchasers the use which might be made of the lands.

In and prior to the month of Feb. 1833 Sir H. Oxenden sold and conveyed to one John Brough and others in fee several of the plots of lands described upon the plan. Some of these plots of land comprised the sites of certain of the proposed roads, streets, and squares shown on the plan, and called Oxenden-square, Hanover-square, Brunswick-square, King's-road, Clarence-street, Montague-street, &c.

In the month of June 1833 a private Act of Parliament, 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 105, was obtained, by which the lands comprised in and described by the above plan were formed into a district parish for the purposes of the Act, under and by the name of "The Town of Herne Bay." The preamble of the Act was as follows: "Whereas a certain portion of the parish of Herne, near or adjoining to the pier at Herne Bay, in the county of Kent, hath of late years increased in houses and other buildings, and may become a place of considerable resort, and many houses and buildings are now being erected there, and it would tend greatly to the accommodation, safety, and convenience, not only of the inhabitants of such portion of the said parish but of all persons resorting to and passing through the same, if the roads, streets, ways, lanes, and other public passages and places now formed and made, and hereafter to be formed and made, within the said portion of the said parish were properly paved, lighted, cleansed, watched, and improved, and all nuisances, annoyances, encroachments, projections, and obstructions therein removed and prevented, and if an efficient police were established therein; and whereas it would greatly facilitate the purposes aforesaid if the said portion of the said parish were separated for such purposes from the remainder of the said parish, but the above purposes cannot be effected without the aid and authority of Parliament; and whereas a map or plan has been made of the said portion of the said parish so intended to be separated for the purpose of more clearly ascertaining the boundaries of the same, which map or plan has been deposited in the Parliament office and a duplicate thereof has also been deposited with the parish clerk of Herne aforesaid, which said boundaries are on the map or plan described by a dotted line," be it enacted, &c.

By the 3rd section of the Act certain named persons and their successors were appointed commissioners for the purposes of the Act to be a body politic and corporate, under the name of "The Commissioners for Improving the Town of Herne Bay," and by that name to have perpetual succession and a common seal.

The material sections of the Act were—

Sect. 27.—That all the present roads, streets, ways, lanes, and other passages and places now used by the public within the said town, and all carriage or footways or passages which shall hereafter be made or adopted by the commissioners as public ways or passages under or by virtue of this Act, and the pavements, flagstones, curbstones, stones, gravel, and other materials belonging thereto respectively, and also all lamps, lamp-irons, lampposts, watchboxes, watchhouses, and other houses and buildings hereafter to be erected or fixed up or purchased by virtue of this Act . . . shall belong to and be the property of, and the same are hereby vested in the said commissioners. . . .

Sect. 28.—That it shall be lawful for the said commissioners, and they are hereby authorised and empowered to open, form, set out, and make a new and commodious road not exceeding in width 40ft. . . . which said road when made shall be, and the same is hereby vested in the said commissioners, and from time to time to cause the said road, and all the present roads, streets, ways, lanes, and other passages and places now used by the public, and all future roads, streets, ways, lanes, and other passages and places which shall be adopted by the said commissioners under this Act within the said town or any part thereof, as well as the carriage as footways to be repaired, made, formed, amended, paved, flagged, or otherwise sustained, and the same, and the pavements, flagging, and other materials thereof to be taken up and relaid, and with such materials and with such drains, gutters, sinks, or watercourses . . . as the said commissioners shall think fit. . . .

Sect. 30.—That no person shall at any time make or cause to be made any alteration in any paved, pitched, or stoned public foot or carriage way, before, behind, or at the side of his house, building, ground, or land without the consent or licence in writing of the said commissioners first had and obtained.

Sect. 33.—That it shall be lawful for the said commissioners, and they are hereby required to cause all such parts of the roads, streets, ways, lanes, and other public passages, and places within the said town which are now in the estimation of the said commissioners sufficiently built upon but not finished, paved, flagged or otherwise put in good order and condition, and all such roads, streets, ways, lanes, and other public passages and places as are now making or may hereafter be made within the said town or any part thereof, although fully built upon, to be made, paved, flagged, repaired, and cleansed with such gutters, sinks, common or main sewers, drains, or watercourses, and with such materials and in such manner as the said commissioners shall deem meet and necessary. . . .

Sect. 36.—That if the said commissioners shall cause any road, street, way, lane, and other public passage and place within the said town to be paved, flagged, or otherwise put into good order or condition, or make any such gutter, sink, common or main sewer, or watercourse, under, through, along, above, below, or about the same road, street, way, lane, and other public passage and place, before the said road, street, way, lane, and other public passage and place are made and built upon, then and in every such case the owner or occupier of any ground abutting or adjoining to any such road, street, way, lane, or other public passage and place not built upon or attached to any house or building, shall not be liable to pay any part of the expenses and charges of such paving, flagging, or making any such road, street, &c., until such ground shall be built upon or attached to some house or building, when and not before such owner or occupier of such house or building shall be liable to pay such and the same expenses and charges, to be recoverable in manner provided.

Sect. 37 empowered the commissioners to adopt any new road, street, &c., within the town of Herne Bay, all such roads, streets, &c., so adopted, to be thenceforth deemed and taken to all intents and purposes as public highways.

MACKETT v. THE COMMISSIONERS OF HERNE BAY.

[CHAN. DIV.]

Sects. 86 and 87 empowered the commissioners to purchase lands within the town of Herne Bay for the purposes of the Act, but not without the consent of the owners thereof.

Sect. 96 enacted that every person (occupier, owner, or mortgagee), in possession of any hereditaments which should be purchased or taken for the purposes of the Act, should deliver up possession of such premises to the commissioners upon having six calendar months' notice from the commissioners to quit the same.

Sect. 109 empowered the commissioners to raise, from time to time, the moneys necessary to defray the expenses of carrying the several powers and purposes of the Act into execution by levying a rate, to be called "The Repairing, Lighting, and Watching Rate."

This Act was passed with a view to carry out the wishes of Sir H. Oxenden, and a large number of the inhabitants and landowners within the new district of the "Town of Herne Bay," and to provide that the "Town of Herne Bay" should be laid out and built upon in accordance with the plan. After the passing of the Act numerous plots of land were divided and set out with reference to such plan, and were sold and built upon.

No houses, however, were at any time erected on any part of the lands which had been conveyed to J. Brough, nor were any of the proposed roads, streets, and squares ever formed or laid out on such lands; but the same lands, which previously and at the time of the passing of the Act had been used as arable and pasture lands, continued to be occupied and cultivated in the same manner with the adjoining lands, and were exclusively held and enjoyed uninterruptedly and as of right by John Brough and his undertenants and lessees until the year 1867.

In February 1867 John Brough died, having by his will devised his real estates upon trust for Sarah Mackett, the wife of George Mackett, for life, with remainder to John Mackett in fee.

In March 1868 the commissioners held some meetings, and discussed the question of taking possession or of marking out the boundaries of the sites of Hanover and Oxenden-squares, and certain of the proposed streets and roads, including King's-road, Clarence-street, and Montague-street, and accordingly caused the following printed notice to be served upon George Mackett and others:

"I am requested by the Herne Bay Pavement Commissioners to inform you that boundary posts will be put down marking out the various streets, ways, lanes, squares, and public passages belonging to the said commissioners within the town of Herne Bay, according to the map or plan of the town deposited in the Parliament Office 28th June 1833; and further take notice that you are hereby required to remove all obstruction from the said streets, ways, lanes, squares, and public passages now occupied by you on or before 29th Sept. 1868, nor are you to cultivate any of the said street, ways, lanes, squares, and public passages after the above date."

In pursuance of this notice the commissioners caused to be gripped up and stumped out a part of the lands belonging to the devisees of John Brough, and which formed the western extremity of the proposed site of King's-road, and which was then in the possession and cultivation of their tenants. Thereupon the solicitors for the devisees and trustees of John Brough's estate caused the following notice to be served on the commissioners:—

To the Commissioners for improving the Town of Herne Bay.

Gentlemen,—It having been intimated to us as solicitors for the trustees and devisees of the real estate of John Brough, late of Herne Bay, in the county of Kent, Esquire, deceased, that you, the above-named commissioners, have entered upon certain land of the said deceased at Herne Bay aforesaid for the purpose of stumping out or making a certain pretended street called King-street, Herne Bay, in the county of Kent, the land of which pretended street forms part of the real estate of the said John Brough, deceased, and such entry having been made by you without any authority from the said trustees or devisees. We hereby give you notice on their behalf to refrain from entering upon the said land or upon any other land at Herne Bay aforesaid, the property of the said John Brough, deceased, now the property of his said trustees and devisees, and that in the event of any further entry being made by you upon the said lands, after this notice you will be considered as trespassers, and such proceedings will be taken against you as the circumstances may require and our clients be advised. We further give you notice that a suit (Mackett v. Mackett) is now pending in the Court of Chancery for the administration of the real estate of the said John Brough, deceased.—Dated this 16th day of February, 1869.

Nothing further was done by the commissioners until the month of Oct. 1871, when they resolved "to take possession of the roads and squares as shown upon the plan of the town on which the Act of Parliament was obtained," and Mr. T. W. Collard, a surveyor, was appointed to mark out the boundaries of the roads and squares according to the plan.

On the 11th Dec. 1871, the solicitors of the trustees and devisees under John Brough's will, hearing of the contemplated action of the commissioners, served them with the following notice:

We beg to call your attention to the previous letters herein, and to inform you that we cannot allow any trespass to be committed by the commissioners or their servants upon lands belonging to this estate, and that, if any such trespass be committed, we shall take such proceedings against the parties as may be necessary for the protection of our clients' interests in the property, and hold the commissioners responsible for all damages and costs.

On the 20th Dec. 1871, and following days, T. W. Collard and other persons, acting under the direction and with the authority of the commissioners, entered upon the lands of J. Brough, which formed the sites of the proposed streets, roads, and squares called Hanover-square, Oxenden-square, King's-road, Clarence-street, Montague-street, and John-street, and gripped up a considerable quantity of the land at the sides of such alleged streets, roads, and squares, broke down and carried away the fences placed on the same lands wherever they intersected the alleged sites of such proposed streets, roads, and squares, and damaged and destroyed the growing crops there, and otherwise acted as if they were absolutely entitled to such lands.

In the meantime the suit of Mackett v. Mackett had abated by reason of the death of parties, but was revived as soon as practicable, and ultimately, in July 1872, leave was obtained to commence the present suit.

The plaintiffs charged that the commissioners had no power to take or purchase compulsorily the lands in question, or to acquire any rights or control over the same unless and until the same were duly formed, laid out and dedicated as roads, streets, and squares, and were adopted as such by the commissioners, which the same had never been; that the commissioners had no right or power to compel or require the making or formation of any of the proposed roads, streets, or squares, or to interfere with or control the sites of the same until the same were laid out or constructed by the owners, and were actually adopted by the commissioners pursuant to the Act; that the sites and the proposed roads, streets, and squares had been comprised in the conveyances to J. Brough, and, having been held and enjoyed uninterruptedly by him and his lessees for more than thirty years adversely to the rights of the commissioners and all other persons, had become absolutely vested in him at the time of his death; and the plaintiffs prayed for a declaration that the commissioners had no right, title, estate, or interest under the Act, or otherwise over the lands being the sites of the proposed streets, roads, and squares, except so far as the same had been duly laid out and formed by the owners of the soil, and had been adopted by the commissioners in accordance with the provisions of the Act; for an injunction to restrain the commissioners from entering upon, gripping up, marking out, or in any way taking possession of, or interfering with, the sites of the said proposed roads, streets, and squares; and for damages.

The commissioners by their answer stated that John Brough was a solicitor, and a resident of considerable local influence in the town of Herne Bay, previously to and at the time of the passing of the Private Act, of which he was one of the principal promoters; that the Act could not have been passed without good evidence having been afforded to the Houses of Parliament that the promoters thereof had dedicated such of their lands as were described in the deposited plan for the purposes of the Act; that an instrument of dedication was in fact executed by the landowners, promoters, and supporters of the Act, but such deed was believed to have been burnt in the fire by which the Houses of Parliament were consumed in the year 1834; that J. Brough, Sir H. Oxenden, and others, by their conduct as such promoters precluded themselves and their successors from afterwards disputing the dedication of their estates, so far as necessary for the purpose of the Act; that the sites of the proposed roads, streets, and squares claimed by the plaintiffs were either never vested in J. Brough, or were vested in him subject to all the statutory provisions in the Act; that J. Brough was one of the first-named commissioners under the Act, for more than thirty years took an active and principal part in all their proceedings, that he was from time to time re-elected, and was frequently chairman of, and nearly always present at the meetings of the Commissioners, and that he never assented or pretended that he had any right or title to hold his lands so as in any manner to interfere with the provisions of the Act. The Commissioners also alleged that shortly after the passing of the Act all the roads, streets, and squares delineated on the plan were actually marked or laid out, and the position thereof defined by boundary marks; that many of the roads, streets, and squares were unmade at the date of the passing of the Act, and that many had since been made and had become highways; that to allow the claim of the plaintiffs would be to render the future building of the town according to the plan impracticable, and would also intercept, rent off roads and communications, and destroy easements which had been relied on by many purchasers of land, and on the faith of which many houses had been built and many plots of land had been sold; that the sites of the proposed roads, streets, and squares were in fact dedicated and adopted as such by them, and that they had full power to do so, and that the same were vested in them for the purposes of the Act; and that none of such sites had been used, occupied, or enjoyed in the manner contended for on behalf of the plaintiffs and their predecessors in title, but only upon sufferance of the commissioners and under circumstances, which precluded the acquisition of any adverse statutory title, and that such possession and occupation had always been subject to the rights of the commissioners and of the public to such sites under the Act and to the extent thereby provided. The commissioners also relied on sect. 138 of the Act, which enacted that no action or suit should be commenced or prosecuted against any person for anything done in pursuance or under the authority of the Act after the expiration of three calendar months next after the fact committed or the cause of action has ceased or determined.

The other material facts and the arguments are sufficiently noticed in the judgment.

THE VICE CHANCELLOR.—The plaintiffs, who claim to be owners of the several parcels of lands particularly mentioned in the pleadings, and which are situate at Herne Bay, in Kent, complain that the defendants, who are the "Commissioners for improving the town of Herne Bay," and who are appointed under a local Act of Parliament of 3 & 4 Will. 4 (1833), c. 105, did, in the month of December 1872, enter upon the plaintiff's lands, that the defendants gripped up and carried away a considerable quantity of the soil, broke down and carried away the fences, damaged and destroyed the growing crops, and acted as if the defendants were absolutely entitled to the lands, and as if the plaintiff had no right or interest therein, and further, that the defendants did these things under the pretence that they were authorised by the statute I have mentioned. The plaintiffs thereupon prayed for a declaration that the defendants are not entitled, either under the statute or otherwise, to enter upon any part of the plaintiff's lands, being the proposed sites of certain streets, roads, or ways, except so far as any public street, road, or way has been duly made and laid out and adopted by the commissioners in accordance with the provisions of the Act, and for an injunction restraining the defendants from entering upon or taking possession or interfering with the lands claimed by the plaintiffs, and that the defendants may be ordered to pay to the plaintiffs such damages as the court shall assess, together with the costs of the suit. The defendants admit that the several acts complained by the plaintiffs were done by the order of the commissioners, and they justify such acts upon two grounds: first, that the plaintiffs have no title to the lands in question, and, secondly, that if they had, whatever has been done by the commissioners has been done in exercise of the powers conferred upon them by the statute. These issues would seem to be in their nature by no means complicated or difficult, the facts relating to them being once ascertained; nevertheless, many days and much paper have been occupied by the statements of the evidence, and by the long cross-examination of witnesses on both sides, and by the arguments of counsel, embracing an immense quantity of details, a very large proportion of which have been by no means necessary for the decision of the questions submitted to the court; but inasmuch as the defence is mainly rested upon those details, and upon the objections which have been raised upon them by the defendants, it is necessary that they should be considered to some extent. [His Lordship then referred to the circumstances which gave rise to the passing of the private Act of Parliament and to the title of John Brough to the lands in question, and continued.] In the description of the parcels in the several conveyances to J. Brough, it is clear that the vendor and also the purchaser had in contemplation that roads were intended to be or might be made. No express mention of or reference to Sir H. Oxenden's then existing plan is made, but the land conveyed is mentioned as abutting upon or being bounded by roads "intended to be made," or "agreed to be made"—the phraseology is different in the several deeds—but in no instance is any mention made of an actually existing road. The purport and meaning of these expressions are obvious when the then construction of the land and what must be considered to have been the intention of the parties dealing for the sale and purchase of plot of "building land" is borne in mind. Nothing is reserved or excepted by the vendor, but he carefully stipulates that "if and when" any road shall be made he shall not be under any liability as to its maintenance or repair. Upon the words I have referred to, the defendants have argued that there was a complete dedication by Sir H. Oxenden of so much of his land as would form the roads upon which the land he conveyed to the several purchasers abutted. But although this may well be, so as to prevent any claim by him or his successors, I am of opinion that to make the dedication complete to the extent and for the purposes of the defendant's contention, there must also be evidence of the use and adoption by the public of the intended roads, and that after the lapse of forty years, during which there has been no such use and adoption, the lands in question in this suit are, within the statutory powers conferred on the defendants, not as existing roads, but liable to be made roads, and if when the prescribed conditions shall be found to have been complied with by which alone they can be brought into existence as public roads. The evidence establishes the fact that from the periods of the several conveyances I have mentioned, the several lands claimed by the plaintiffs have been in actual and undisturbed possession of the several purchasers, and especially of the late J. Brough, from the time when his title accrued; that he was the ostensible and reputed owner; that the lands were cultivated as arable and pasture land; that, as to the land comprising what is called Hanover-square, it was effectually fenced in, and the exclusive possession of it was preserved; and that, although it is proved that some persons occasionally made a way for themselves across the land, they could only effect this by getting through or over the gates and fences which the owner had put up for the protection of his property. The like proof is given of the possession and cultivation of the land forming part of what on the plan is called Oxenden-square, and which extends up to the King's-road; and, although upon one occasion, in the year 1854, the commissioners put down posts which would prevent the passage by carts across a part of this land, the then tenant cut down one of the posts (his right to do so not being disputed) so as to preserve the free passage for his carts which he had up to that time enjoyed and used, and which use and enjoyment were continued until the commissioners asserted the right now complained of. At its southernmost end the land last mentioned abuts upon the grass pathway which runs on the northern side of Sea Street Farm. Along this, in the direction of King's-road, and at a distance of thirty or forty feet the commissioners caused a grip to be cut, but the tenants of this land continued to cultivate it in the usual manner and ploughed through the grip. King's-road appears to be in the same state as it was when the Act passed, except that recently some rubbish has been shot or laid there by the commissioners, and it was and is rough and unformed. Another of the parcels of land adjoins what is called on the map John-street, and this has been tilled and cultivated in like manner by the tenants of Mr. Brough. A part of John-street, extending from the sea to High-street, has been long formed and made under the Act, and is, not in question, but the extension of that street southward has always remained and still remains in grass with no road formed or made, or indicated in any other manner than that some trees have been planted along the sides, and that some posts were once set up across it—the only use of which would seem to be to prevent the passage of carriages, and which posts have since rotted away. At a part of this land where it adjoins what is called Clarence-street, on the deposited plan, several years ago a blacksmith's forge was erected, as it appears, with the consent of Mr. Brough, and the only suggestion that this was ever used by the public is that horses were brought to this shed to be shod; but it is clear that no road or roadway there was at any time formed. And during the whole period Brough and his tenants have been in the occupation, cultivation, and enjoyment of all the lands in question, without dispute or interference by any person or authority; and during the same period the poor's rate, the town rates, and the tithes, have been paid in respect of the ownership and occupation of the same lands. During the same period no act has been done or attempted by the authority of the commissioners from which it can be inferred that they claimed to be entitled to the roads in question, nor has any house been built, nor are any projected or begun upon any part of the lands abutting upon or bounding the intended roads, or for which it could answer any useful public purpose that roads should be made. Upon the first question, then, it appears to me that upon the evidence the plaintiffs have established a sufficiently clear title as owners of the land in question to lay a ground for their complaint against the defendants, who, upon a claim and colour of title, entered upon the plaintiff's lands, prostrated the fences, seized the crops, and committed acts of unquestionable damage. In so far as the evidence of the plaintiffs tends to establish a possessory title for more than twenty years, the defendants not only dispute it in fact, but they insist that such a title would be ineffectual against them—their powers conferred by the statute not being affected by any prescriptive adverse right. In this latter contention I think the defendants are justified; but then it becomes necessary to consider what is the nature and what the extent of their statutory authority. The defendants did at one time claim to be entitled in fee simple to the roads, but that claim was given up at the bar as untenable, and the question appears to depend upon the terms of the statute. In 1833 several plots of land, including those I have mentioned, had been sold and houses had been built, and it was then thought expedient to apply to Parliament for an Act separating the land comprised in the plan from the remainder of the parish of Herne. Accordingly an Act was obtained (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 105) which received the royal assent on the 28th June 1833. The preamble, which shows conclusively the grounds upon which and the purpose for which it was passed, is in these terms [his Lordship read it]. The map or plan there mentioned is identical in outline with the plan which had been made for Sir H. Oxenden, and appears to have been traced from the latter, and it shows that some, but not a great number of houses had then been built. The only purpose for which the plan mentioned in the statute is referred to is to point out the boundaries of the new district over which the provisions of the Act were to extend and apply, and which was thenceforth to be as it has ever since been and is called "the town of Herne Bay." The Act proceeds to appoint commissioners, and to confer upon them certain powers incident to their office. It is in the form which at the time of its passing was that universally adopted, and it does not differ in any substantial respect from the numerous other statutes for paving, lighting, and watching specified districts which had been passed before the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, and the other Consolidation Acts, by which, among other useful purposes, the needless repetition of provisions and clauses of universal and necessary application is avoided by reference to the terms of those statutes. The ground upon which the commissioners, the defendants, justify the acts complained of, and which they admit, is to be found in the provisions of this statute, and this must needs be so since it is clear beyond dispute that they can have no power or authority whatever, save what is conferred upon them by this statute. It becomes therefore necessary to consider what is the actual extent or limits of that power or authority. [His Lordship then read the material sections of the statute.] By the same statute the commissioners are empowered to make a new and commodious road from the southern extremity of Brunswick-street to the spot where Herne Common abuts upon the turnpike road from the town to Canterbury, and for this purpose the usual powers of compulsory purchase from the owners of lands are conferred upon the commissioners, but excepting as relates to this particular road, no powers whatever are conferred upon the commissioners enabling them to purchase or acquire any lands whatever. It is impossible to doubt that if it had been the intention of the promoters of the Bill to take powers to make roads generally they would have asked for such powers. It is equally impossible to infer that any such extensive powers are contained in, or to be implied from, the provisions of the Act. It has been suggested, in the course of the arguments for the defendants, that, inasmuch as the purpose and policy of the Act and its tendency are for the improvement of the town of Herne Bay, and for what has been called the development of the town, the Act ought to be construed in this sense, and ought to be read as conferring upon the commissioners such powers as will best tend to accomplish that purpose and policy. I do not, however, think that the statute can be read otherwise than according to its precise and plain expressions. The policy and purport are, in my judgment, very clear and explicit. The powers which it confers upon the commissioners, and the duties which it prescribes, are that the existing public roads and ways already formed shall be preserved for the use of the public, and that by degrees, and when and as often as other public passages, to be formed and made after the passing of the Act, shall be so made and formed they shall be properly paved, lighted, watched, and improved. To accomplish these objects, and to establish an efficient police, the commissioners are empowered to levy upon the inhabitants a rate called the "Repairing, Lighting, and Watching Rate," on the occupiers of all buildings and lands within the town, not exceeding 3s. in the pound, and when levied upon such land or houses as shall not be lighted or watched, or shall not abut upon any part of the roads or passages which shall be lighted or watched, a rate not exceeding 1s. in the pound. This distinction between the amounts of the rate to be levied must be borne in mind in construing the Act, for if the rate were to be single and uniform it would be competent to the commissioners to levy the rates indiscriminately upon the owners of all lands and houses within the town, whether they did or did not enjoy the advantages to be procured by the expenditure of the moneys which the commissioners are authorised to raise by means of the rates. That the construction I have mentioned as the true and only construction of the statute was put upon it by the commissioners themselves, is clear, from the manner in which they applied and dealt with it for many years after its operation commenced, as is evident by the extracts from the minutes of the proceedings set out in their answer. Not only do those minutes contain no exercise or assertion of right over any roads which had not been built upon or were adjacent to such roads, nor any staking out or authority over them, although the roads which had been made and publicly used were from time to time repaired by the commissioners, but in 1857 the commissioners appointed a committee consisting (among other persons) of two of the witnesses for the plaintiffs to find out all the public roads and ways, and to mark and stump the same to their proper width according to the Act of Parliament. What report was made upon this subject does not appear. That the question of the right of the commissioners over the roads had been raised is apparent from the minutes of the 4th Oct. 1858, in which it appears that it had been resolved to take counsel's opinion respecting the roads and squares of the town; but it would also seem that the question had been in some way disposed of since by a resolution of the 1st Nov. following. It was not only determined that counsel's opinion should not be taken, but that the question should not be re-opened without giving fourteen days' notice of a special meeting for that purpose; and there is no trace of the subject having been further discussed. Trees have been at various times planted in and about the town, but it seems that this was for the purpose of ornamenting and improving the appearance of the place, and not with a view of acquiring or asserting any right over any of the roads. But what is of greater importance in considering the manner in which the commissioners exercised their rights is that, with respect to a street leading from the south to the sea (called Beach-street on the deposited plan), the owner of the land at that end built upon it so as wholly to close the northern end; and that, as to another street (without a name on the plan) leading from William-street and part of the estate of Mr. Brough, a church has been built on the greater part of that site, and this without any claim or objection on the part of the commissioners. The expectations which may have been entertained at the passing of the Act have not been realised. Several houses have been since erected, but the larger part of the town remains unbuilt upon, and there are no buildings whatever abutting on any of the roads or ways claimed by the commissioners and the subject of this suit. [His Lordship then stated the facts which gave rise to the present suit, and proceeded.] The defendants, among other things, have insisted on the provisions of the statute 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 105, s. 138, prohibiting any action or suit for anything done in pursuance or under the authority of the Act after the expiration of three months next after the act committed or the cause of action has ceased. Considering the nature of this case, the title set up, and the claim made by the commissioners in the first instance, although that has now been partially disclaimed, and the effect of the protests and notices given on the part of the plaintiffs, I do not think they are barred of their suit, the main object of which is to obtain a declaration of right and to prevent the commissioners from interfering with that right, nor can I doubt that this court has jurisdiction to determine the questions which have been raised upon the record. It is not suggested by the defendants that they were induced to take the proceedings complained of for any public present purpose, or that the safety or convenience of the public or the inhabitants of the town required their interference, but, insisting that under the Act of Parliament the roads and streets were vested in the commissioners for the purposes of the Act, they submit that it was proper for them in the exercise of their public duty to prevent any persons from acquiring statutory rights over the roads, streets, and squares which had been and remain effectually dedicated to the purposes of the Act. It is, moreover, abundantly clear that no rights, statutory or other, can be acquired so as to prevent the exercise of the powers given by the Act to require and compel the formation of roads and streets whenever and wherever the state of circumstances requiring such roads and streets shall come into existence. The defendants would seem to have considered that the statute gave them plenary powers over all the roads and squares described upon the deposited plan; but the purpose for which and the terms in which the deposited plan are referred to are so clearly expressed in the statute as to show that the powers of the commissioners are only to be exercised in respect of roads which were made, or which should be made, consequent upon the erection of buildings to which such roads would be applicable and useful. And it has now been very conclusively decided that whatever representation may be made on a plan deposited and referred to in an Act of Parliament is of no effect, unless the representation is incorporated in the Act: (North British Railway Company v. Dodd, 12 Cl. & F. 722; Attorney General v. The Great Eastern Railway Company, 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 344; L. Rep. 6 H. L. 367.) Under these circumstances I am forced to the conclusion that the defendants have misconceived and misused their powers, and that they have unlawfully invaded and damaged the property of the plaintiffs. The decree, therefore, must be that the plaintiffs are entitled to a declaration in the terms of the first two paragraphs of the bill, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to be paid by the defendants the damages which the plaintiffs have sustained by the wrongful proceedings of the defendants, for which purpose an inquiry must be directed in the usual form, and that the defendants pay to the plaintiffs their costs of this suit.

Order accordingly.

Re PRYOR'S SETTLEMENT TRUSTS.

Lands Clauses Act—Settled lands taken by local board—Dividends of invested purchase money—Defective order for payment of—Subsequent order—Costs—Practice.

Where the purchase-money of settled lands taken by a local board was paid into court and invested, and the dividends, on the petition of the trustees of the settlement, ordered to be paid to them by name, or one of them, and both the trustees died, the court, on the petition of the new trustees for payment of the dividends to them, declined to order the local board to pay the costs of the second petition.

This was an application for payment of the dividends arising from a sum of 394*l.* 7*s.* Reduced 3*l.* per Cent. Annuities.

The annuities represented a sum of 366l. 5s., the purchase moneys of lands subject to the trusts of the marriage settlement of Mr. and Mrs. Pryor, which had been taken by the Bristol Local Board of Health for the purposes of their Act, with which was incorporated the Lands Clauses Act.

On the 11th June 1870, an order had been made on the application of the then trustees of the settlement, that the interest to accrue on the bank annuities should be paid "to them or one of them" until further order.

Both the trustees had since died, and new trustees had been appointed. The new trustees now applied that the dividends from time to time to accrue on the bank annuities might be paid to them or the survivor of them or other the trustees or trustee for the time being of the settlement.

Romer, for the petitioners, asked that the respondents might pay the costs of the application, and referred to Re Gos's Estate, 24 L. T. Rep. O. S. 152.

E. S. Ford, for the Bristol Local Board of Health, contended that as a defective order had been made on the first petition, the respondents ought not to be ordered to pay the costs of the present application. He cited

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—Assume that both parties are equally to blame in not seeing that a proper order was made on the first occasion, why should I make one pay the costs of this application more than the other? The petitioners are entitled to their order, but I can make no order as to costs.

HARRIS v. JAMES AND SENHOUSE.

Landlord and tenant—Nuisance—Necessary result of demise—Liability of landlord.

A landlord who lets premises for a fixed and definite purpose is liable for any nuisance that arises naturally and of necessity from the use of such premises as contemplated by the demise.

Rich v. Basterfield (9 L. T. Rep. 356; 4 C. B. 783) commented upon.

THIS case came before the court upon a demurrer to two paragraphs in the statement of claim.

It appeared that the defendant, William Senhouse, is the owner of a field called Kirkcross, in the parish of Brigham, in Cumberland, which is full of limestone, and has been let to the defendant, Ferdinand James, by the defendant, William Senhouse, for the purpose of being worked as a lime quarry, and upon this field Ferdinand James has erected limekilns for the purpose of burning limestone taken from the said field.

The 5th and 6th paragraphs of the statement of claim which were demurred to by the defendant, William Senhouse, were as follows.

5. The smoke and vapours arising from this kiln spread over the lands of the plaintiff, and have injured the herbage and lessened the value of the land. This injury is partly the natural and necessary result of limekilns being used in the said field called Kirkcross, and partly the result of the improper manner in which the kiln has been worked.

6. The said quarry is worked by means of blasting, and in the process of blasting quantities of dirt and stone are from time to time thrown on the plaintiff's lands, whereby it is unsafe for the plaintiff or his men to work on the said lands. This is partly the necessary result of working a quarry in the said field, and partly of the negligent and improper manner in which the quarry has been worked by the said defendant Ferdinand James.

Crompton, in support of the demurrer, argued that as Senhouse was only the reversioner, he could not be held liable for a nuisance, and cited Rich v. Basterfield (ubi sup.), the marginal note to which was as follows: "Although the owner of property may, as occupier, be responsible for injuries arising from acts done upon that property by persons who are there by his permission, though not strictly his agents or servants, such liability attaches only upon parties in actual possession." In giving judgment in that case, it seems clearly to have been considered that the landlord was only liable for any nuisance existing at the time of the demise. This judgment is cited in Gandy v. Jubber in the Exchequer Chamber (9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 801; 5 B. & S. 485), and in a judgment that was prepared by the judges but never delivered (9 B. & S. 15), where Rich and Basterfield is considered. The case of Rees v. Pedley (1 A. & E. 822) is there discussed, and Cresswell, J., in delivering judgment, p. 804, states his view of Lord Denman's judgment, then of that of Littledale, J., and he says that learned judge "seems to have rested his judgment on the principle that the landlord was not to let the land with the nuisance upon it; and he proceeds, 'here the periods are short, so that there has been a reletting, and that has taken place after the user of the buildings had created the nuisance. He, therefore, assumes that there was an existing nuisance at the time of the letting which had not afterwards been removed.' To his judgment on that ground we entirely assent." Then on p. 805, he proceeds, "If Rees v. Pedley is to be considered as a case in which the defendant was held liable because he had demised the buildings when the nuisance existed; or because he had relet them after the user of the buildings had created a nuisance, we think the judgment right. . . . But if it is to be taken as a decision that a landlord is responsible for the act of his tenant in creating a nuisance, by the manner in which he uses the premises demised, we think it goes beyond the principle to be found in any previously decided cases, and we cannot assent to it." The same view appears to have been taken by Blackburn, J., in the Court of Queen's Bench in Gandy v. Jubber (9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 801; 5 B. & S. 91), where he says, "It must be shown that there has been a demise or redemise of the land with the nuisance existing upon it; and the nuisance must be, if I may so term it, a normal one—not such, for instance, as a cellar with a flap, which may or may not be a nuisance." He then goes on to refer to Rich v. Basterfield (ubi sup.) [BLACKBURN, J.—That case appears to have been not quite correctly reported in Best and Smith, for I seem to speak of Rich v. Basterfield as being a sensible judgment, whereas for long before that time I was of opinion it was desperately refined.] It would seem a sound principle of law that the landlord should only be liable for a nuisance existing at the time of demise, otherwise he would be at the mercy of his tenant. Here he authorises the tenant to build limekilns, but he does not authorise him to commit a wrong against anyone else; no nuisance existed when the premises were let, and therefore the landlord can be in no wise liable.

MONKS AND OTHERS v. JACKSON AND OTHERS.

[C.P. Div.]

Bompas, contra, was not called upon.

BLACKBURN, J.—The question we have to decide is raised by the 5th paragraph of the statement of claim. Now, where one person authorises and requests a person to do certain things, he is liable for any consequences that arise therefrom. If the authority is given in a lease, the person who gives that authority is no less liable on that account. I do not think the lessor can be said to require everything the occupier may do; for example, if a man devises certain land on an agricultural lease, and requires that it should be cultivated in the best manner possible, and the tenant, exercising his discretion, brings on to the farm an enormous quantity of most odoriferous manure so as to create a nuisance to the neighbourhood, I don't think in a case of that kind that the landlord would be liable, because I do not think that he could be said in any way to request or authorise what had been done. So, too, in the case of a lease of building land, the lessee might so build as to obstruct a neighbour's lights, but the lessor would not be liable, for although he may have enabled the lessee so to build, he did not request him to do it. But in the case before us the lime field was let for the very purpose of burning lime. No doubt, for any mischief arising from a careless or negligent use of the field, the landlord would not be liable, but for any mischief that arises from the natural and necessary result of what the landlord authorised and required, or even authorised and did not require, I think the landlord must be held liable. In Rich v. Basterfield (ubi sup.) the Court of Common Pleas came to a conclusion of fact which, if true, justifies their decision. It was an action for alleged nuisance arising from a certain chimney, and it appeared that when the fires were lighted, as the tenant did light them, then the nuisance arose, but evidence was given that a previous tenant made the fires of coke, and when that was the case there was no nuisance, and in their judgment the court proceed to say, "It being quite possible for the tenant to occupy the shop without making fires, and quite optional on his part to make them or not, or to make them with certain times excepted, so as not to annoy the plaintiff, or in such a manner as not to create any quantity of smoke that could be deemed a nuisance, it seems impossible to say that the tenant was in any sense the servant or agent of the defendant in doing the acts complained of. The utmost that can be imputed to the defendant is that he enabled the tenant to make fires if he pleased." Assuming that that evidence was correct, the nuisance there was not the necessary result of the tenancy. But in this case there is a demise for the express purpose of burning lime, and the natural result of that burning lime is the nuisance complained of. On this point the demurrer cannot be upheld. As to the 6th paragraph, I do not think the landlord is responsible for what has been negligently and improperly done. If the demise of the quarry is on such terms that the tenant must work it by blasting, that should be stated. The plaintiff may amend that paragraph, and we give him leave so to do.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I have always looked upon the judgment in Rich v. Basterfield (ubi sup.) as one of great refinement. There the premises were let to be used as a coffee shop. I therefore think it must have been contemplated that the tenant should burn ordinary fuel, and that I think would have rendered the landlord liable. This case is different, however, for here the defendant lets land for the erection of limekilns, from which smoke must of necessity rise; so the act of the tenant is clearly that of the landlord.

Demurrer to 5th paragraph over-ruled. Leave given to plaintiff to amend 6th paragraph.

MONKS AND OTHERS v. JACKSON AND OTHERS.

Municipal election—Delivery of nomination paper—38 & 39 Vict. c. 40 s. 1 sub-sect. 3, 4—22 Vict. c. 35 s. 8.

The provision in the Municipal Elections Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 40 s. 1 sub-sect. 3), that nomination papers shall be delivered to the town clerk by the candidate himself, or his proposer or seconder, is imperative, not directory, and the paper must be delivered by the candidate, or proposer or seconder, personally.

Therefore, where petitioner's nomination paper was delivered by an agent,

Held, that an objection to the nomination paper was rightly allowed.

THE petitioners petitioned against the return of the respondents as councillors for the several wards of the borough of Wigan. By order of QUAIN, J., a special case was stated, which, so far as it is material to the point decided by the court, was as follows:

1. The municipal borough of Wigan, in the county of Lancaster, comprises wards as follows, that is to say, No. 1, or Scholes' Ward; No. 2, or St. George's Ward; No. 3, or Queen-street Ward; No. 4, or Swinley Ward; and No. 5, or All Saints' Ward. Each of the said wards is entitled at the ordinary municipal elections holden on the 1st Nov. in each year, to be represented by two councillors to be then elected by the duly qualified burgesses.

2. In 1875 the town clerk of the said borough, pursuant to the statute 38 & 39 Vict. c. 40, duly and in due time gave public notice that the last day for delivering nomination papers for the nomination of candidates at the then ensuing election of councillors, was Friday the 22nd Oct. 1875.

3. Upon the said 22nd of Oct. in due time nomination papers nominating the respective petitioners as candidates respectively for the respective wards in the said petition mentioned, were delivered to the said town clerk by one Thomas Scott, being then the agent of the said petitioners and their respective proposers and seconders, authorised by them in that behalf; but the said nomination papers were not otherwise delivered to the said clerk by the respective petitioners, or their proposers or seconders respectively.

4. The said town clerk forthwith, on the same day, sent notices to the petitioners that they had been nominated. . . .

7. The mayor of the said borough, under the said Act of Parliament in that behalf, appointed the 23rd day of Oct. aforesaid, between the hours of two and four of the clock in the afternoon, for the reception of any objections to nomination papers, and the said mayor attended . . . for the purpose of hearing and deciding upon any objections that might be made to any nomination paper. . . . The respondent, Peter Jackson, delivered to the said mayor an objection in writing to the nomination paper of the petitioner, Elisha Hodgkinson Monks. . . . The said mayor received the said objection, and proceeded to hear and adjudicate upon the same. . . .

8. Copies of the said objections in writing are annexed hereto, and are to be taken as part of this case. The numbers in the margin have been inserted for the purposes of this case.

9. The said mayor reduced to writing his decisions in the premises and copies of such written decisions are annexed hereto, and are to be taken as part of this case.

10. The said mayor afterwards duly, by public notice in that behalf, declared the respective respondents to have been respectively returned as councillors for the said borough, and the respondents have since acted, and claim to act, as such councillors. . . .

12. The court to have power to draw inferences of fact.

13. The petitioners are to be at liberty, on the argument of this case to contend that the mayor had no power to decide upon or to allow the said grounds of objection numbered 5, and that the respondents cannot on these petitions raise the question whether such objections are good.

The questions for the opinion of the court (so far as material here) were as follows:—

3. Whether the said decisions of the said mayor were erroneous and ought to be reversed.

4. Whether the respondents were respectively duly elected.

The court to make such order in the premises and in the matters of the said petition as to the court may seem right.

The objection of the respondent Peter Jackson to the nomination paper of the petitioner, Elisha Hodgkinson Monks, was made on several grounds, of which the following alone is here material:

5. That such paper writing was not delivered by the said Elisha Hodgkinson Monks himself, or his proposer or seconder, to the town clerk of the said borough seven days at least before the said day of election, excluding Sundays, and before five o'clock in the afternoon of Friday, the 22nd Oct. 1875, such last-mentioned day being the last day upon, and five o'clock in the afternoon of the same day being the time or hour before which, by law, such paper writing ought to have been delivered to the said town clerk at or for the said election."

The decision of the Mayor on this objection was as follows:

"I, the undersigned mayor of this borough, do hereby allow the objection of Mr. Peter Jackson to the nomination paper of Mr. Elisha Hodgkinson Monks for No. 1 or Scholes' Ward.

JAMES BURROWS, Mayor."

The following are the clauses on which the decision turned:

38 & 39 Vict. c. 40 (Municipal Elections Act 1875), s. 1, sub-sect. 8, "Every nomination paper subscribed as aforesaid shall be delivered by the candidate himself, or his proposer, or seconder, to the town clerk seven days at least before the day of election, and before five o'clock in the afternoon of the last day on which any such nomination paper may by law be delivered." . . .

Sub-sect. 4: Sect. 8 of the Act 23 Vict. c. 35, "so far as the same is now in force shall apply to nominations of councillors, auditors, and assessors duly made and allowed under this Act."

22 Vict. c. 35, s. 8: "At any election of councillors to be held for any borough or ward: (1) If the number of persons so nominated shall exceed the number to be elected, the councillors to be elected shall be elected from the persons so nominated, and from them only."

M'Intyre, Q.U. (Bigham and W. Hardy with him), for the petitioners.—It must be conceded that if the fifth objection to the nomination paper of the petitioner Monks can be sustained the petitioners cannot succeed. But it is not really an objection to a nomination paper, and therefore ought not to have come before the mayor, and cannot be entertained by the court on appeal from the mayor's decision. [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J., referred to Northcote v. Puleford (L. Rep. 10, C. P. 476; 44 L. J. 217, C. P.; 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 602).] The first clause of 38 & 39 Vict. c. 40, s. 1, sub-sect. 3, is directory only, not imperative. [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—Hovew v. Turner (ante, p. 58), shows that it is imperative.] The words, "shall be delivered by the candidate himself," &c., only means that the candidate or his proposer or seconder shall see that the paper is delivered, but they need not do so with their own hands; delivery by an authorised agent is sufficient. 35 & 36 Vict. c. 60, s. 15, sub-sect. 2, which allows the respondent to give evidence that the petitioner was not duly elected, only applies where the office is claimed by the petition, which is not the case here.

Herschell Q. C. (Ohandos Leigh and Geary with him), for the respondents.—By 38 & 39 Vict. c. 40 s. 1, sub-s. 4, 22 Vict. c. 35 s. 8, applies to these elections, and the words "so nominated," in that section, must mean nominated in the manner directed by 38 & 39 Vict. c. 40, s. 1, sub-s. 3. [He was stopped by the court.]

Lord COLERIDGE, C. J.—I am of opinion that our judgment ought to be for the respondents. Mr. M'Intyre has very fairly admitted that if one point is decided against him it becomes useless to discuss the others, because in that case the election of the respondents cannot be questioned. 38 & 39 Vict. c. 40, s. 1, sub-s. 3, directs that every nomination paper shall be delivered by the candidate himself or his proposer or seconder to the town clerk, seven days at least before the day of election, and before five o'clock in the afternoon of the last day on which any such nomination paper may by law be delivered. The petitioners were persons who complained of the way in which the election was conducted, because they were nominated as candidates, and yet they were prevented from going to the poll. It is true that they were not prevented by any objection to the delivery of a nomination paper; but still they have questioned the election, and we have to determine if the respondents are duly elected. Paragraph 3 of the case states that "upon the said 22nd day of Oct. in due time nomination papers nominating the respective petitioners as candidates respectively for the respective wards in the said petitions mentioned were delivered to the said town clerk by one Thomas Scott, being then the agent of the said petitioners and their respective proposers and seconders, authorised by them in that behalf, but the said nomination papers were not otherwise delivered to the said clerk by the respective petitioners or their proposers or seconders respectively." The case, therefore, shows that the petitioners were not duly nominated, and had no right to go to the poll, and if they had been elected their election must have been set aside. I am clearly of opinion that the first part of sub-sect. 3 of 38 & 39 Vict. c. 40, s. 1, is imperative, and not merely directory; and there is also the section to which Mr. Herschell very properly called attention, 22 Vict. c. 35, s. 8, incorporated by 38 and 39 Vict. c. 40, s. 1, sub-s. 4, by which, if the number of persons nominated exceed the number to be elected, the connoisseurs shall be elected from the persons so nominated, and from them only. Therefore, if these petitioners were not duly nominated it was the duty of the mayor to declare that they were not entitled to go to the poll. It appears on the face of the case that the petitioners were not duly nominated, and therefore there is no ground to question the election of the respondents, and our judgment must be for them.

C.P. Div.]

ALDRIDGE (pet.) v. HURST (resp.).

[C.P. Div.]

ARCHINALD, J.—I am thoroughly of the same opinion. The facts show that the petitioners were not entitled to go to the poll. 38 & 39 Vict. c. 40, s. 1, sub-s. 3, provides that "Every nomination paper subscribed as aforesaid shall be delivered by the candidate himself, or his proposer or seconder, to the town clerk," &c. How the statute could more clearly indicate that the candidate himself, or his proposer or seconder, must deliver the nomination paper I cannot conceive. It is clear that it was not intended that the paper should be delivered by an agent or any other person. This being so the petitioners were not qualified, and on this short ground I am of opinion that judgment should be for the respondents.

ALDRIDGE (pet.) v. HURST (resp.).

Parliamentary election petition—Amendment—Striking out—Claim to seat.

After the expiration of the twenty-one days after the return, within which, by 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125, s. 6, a Parliamentary election petition must be presented, the petition cannot be amended by striking out a paragraph which claims the seat for the petitioner.

MAG. CAS.—VOL. X

A PETITION had been presented by Major Aldridge against the return of Mr. Hurst as member of Parliament for the borough of Horsham, and claiming the seat for the petitioner. After the petition had been signed by the petitioner, an application was made on his behalf to Quain, J. for leave to amend the petition by striking out the paragraph which claimed the seat for the petitioner, and also certain other paragraphs relating to a scrutiny. The application was supported by an affidavit of the petitioner denying the existence of any collusion, and stating that the application was made bonâ fide, and was not the result of any corrupt arrangement; and that the petitioner was not apprehensive of any recriminatory charges being brought against him.

The learned judge declined to make an order permitting the amendment, but referred the matter to the court.

Feb. 5 and 7.—A. L. Smith for the petitioner.—After the expiration of the period of twenty-one days, within which, by the Parliamentary Elections Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 125), s. 6, the petition must be presented, it cannot be amended by adding any fresh matter, but it may be amended by striking out part: (Stevens v. Tillet, L. Rep. 6 U. P. 147; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 622.) The object of this application is only to save unnecessary costs, and the affidavit of the petitioner negatives all possibility of collusion, and no objection is made on behalf of the sureties. The affidavit also states that the petitioner is not apprehensive of recriminatory charges, and moreover, if the claim to the seat is abandoned, the reason for allowing recriminatory charges ceases to apply, for that reason is only to prevent improper persons getting seats in the House of Commons. There is no authority against the proposed amendment. In Maude v. Lowley (L. Rep. 9 C. P. 165) when the court refused to allow a municipal election petition to be amended, the amendment which it was desired to make was an addition to the petition as it already stood.

C. S. C. Bowen (F. H. Scott with him), for the respondent, opposed the application.—If the object is to save unnecessary costs, the petitioner can attain that object by abstaining from delivering the list of votes to be objected to, and heads of objection required by Rule 7 of the Rules of Michaelmas Term 1868. The part of the petition claiming the seat is in effect a separate petition, and the petitioner is not entitled to withdraw. He has laid himself open to recriminatory charges by claiming the seat, and the respondent may insist on his right to have an opportunity of bringing forward such charges. This was the law before the passing of the Parliamentary Elections Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 125).

Coventry case, 1 Peckwell, at p. 99;

Wareham case, 1 Wolferstan & Dew, at p. 95;

Clare County case, Wolferstan & Bristows, at p. 143.

By sect. 26 the old practice is to be observed as to cases not provided for by the Act or Rules. Formerly a petition could only be withdrawn according to the provisions of the statutes on the subject (Rogers on Elections, edition of 1865, p. 423), and since the jurisdiction to try petitions has been transferred to the Judges, a Judge at Chambers can have no power to waive the conditions imposed by the Legislature (31 & 32 Vict. c. 125, ss. 35, 36) and prescribed by the Rules of Michaelmas Term 1868, 45 to 49. Rule 44 does not give a judge more power than the court has. The respondent could not withdraw from the contest and resign his seat, for personal bribery might be charged, which would disqualify him from afterwards sitting; if he resigned the petition must still proceed, and the rule is the same in the case of a petitioner claiming the seat; for by 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125, s. 53, the respondent may give evidence "in the same manner as if he had presented a petition." Before the Act cases of bribery were inquired into notwithstanding withdrawal, Rogers on Elections, 424 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 102, s. 1). First Horsham case (1 P. R. & D., 107), and the law in this respect is not altered. See the New Windsor case (Judgments of Election Judges, 208-210; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 613). In the Taunton case, Waygood v. James (L. Rep. 4 C. P. 361; 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 202), the Judges assume throughout that the result of claiming the seat is to put in issue irrevocably the conduct of those who claim it. The decision in Maude v. Lowley (ubi sup.) is a strong authority against the proposed amendment. Lord Coleridge there says, "Mr. Tennant has also pointed out that after the expiration of the twenty-one days it would be too late for anyone else to present a fresh petition; and that to allow a petitioner to amend so as substantially to make the amended petition a fresh one would be conferring upon him a privilege which no other person could possess. That seems to me to dispose of the case." That reasoning is directly in point here, for what change could be more vital than a change in the prayer of the petition? In the Youghal case (1 O'M. & H. at p. 296), O'Brien, J. refused to allow an amendment, and expressed a doubt as to whether he had power to do so. Even if there is power to amend, this is not a case in which an amendment ought to be allowed.

C.P. Div.]

ALDRIDGE (pet.) v. HURST (resp.).

[C.P. Div.]

A. L. Smith in reply.—By 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125, s. 2, the court has the same powers as if the petition were an ordinary cause. This gives power to amend. In Pickering v. Startin (28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 111) amendments by which certain allegations were added to a municipal election petition were allowed to be made. That case was not cited in Maude v. Lowley (ubi sup.). In Yates v. Leach (L. Rep. 9 O. P. 605; 43 L. J. 377, C. P.; 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 790), Brett, J. expresses an opinion that the court has jurisdiction to strike out the name of a person who has been improperly made a respondent. The dictum of O'Brien, J. which has been referred to, is no authority against the power of amendment, for he only refused in the exercise of his discretion to allow an amendment under the circumstances of that case. It has not been suggested that there is no power to amend in any of the other cases, except Maude v. Lowley (ubi sup.). In the third Stroud Election Petition an order similar to that now asked for was made by Pigott, B. at Chambers. Sect. 35, as to withdrawal of a petition, only refers to withdrawal of the whole petition. It does not provide that the petition or any part of it shall not be withdrawn except as therein prescribed. A paragraph claiming the seat is not in effect a separate petition. The prayer is in the alternative—see the form given in Rule 5 of Michaelmas Term 1868, and the special forms in Leigh and Le Marchant's Election Law, pp. 161-166, 2nd edition. Only one security is given, which shows that it is only one petition. He also referred to GROVE, J.—We are all of opinion that the application must be refused, but as the case is one of great importance, we will give a judgment stating the reasons for our decision at a future time. The question of costs will be left to be dealt with by the Judge who tries the petition.

Feb. 11.—The judgment of the court (Grove, Archibald, and Lindley, JJ.) was delivered by GROVE, J.—In this case, which was that of a petition against the return of Mr. Hurst for the borough of Horsham, an application was made to Quain J., to amend the petition by striking out a part of the prayer, viz., that which claimed the seat for Major Aldridge, the petitioner, and certain other allegations applying to a scrutiny, which would be dependent on this claim. The question was referred by the learned judge to this court, and an affidavit by the petitioner was read, stating, among other things, that the application was made bonâ fide and without collusion, but as our judgment does not turn on the terms of this affidavit, we need not go fully into this. On the part of the petitioner it was urged that sect. 2 of the Parliamentary Elections Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 125) invests this court, subject to the provisions of the Act, with the same powers, jurisdiction, and authority with reference to an election petition and the proceedings thereon as it would have if such petition were an ordinary cause within its jurisdiction. It was also stated that an order such as that now asked had been made by Pigott, B. though the case appears to have been scarcely argued before that learned judge. The case of Stevens v. Tillet (L. Rep. 6 C. P. 147) was also cited, where this court, after the abandonment of the claim to the seat at a trial before an election judge and the subsequent election of the claimant, held that the petitioners against him might give evidence of corrupt practices by himself and his agents at the previous election, although they might have been given in evidence in support of recriminating charges at the previous trial where the now sitting member was petitioner. It was further contended that although the court might not have jurisdiction to add new matters to a petition, it might expunge on proper grounds shown. It was contended contra that, without going the length of saying that the court or a judge might not have jurisdiction to allow the addition or withdrawal of certain allegations in an election petition, it could not permit the withdrawal of a distinct prayer, such as that claiming the seat; that this would be analogous to, if not within, the sections of the Act and the rules relating to the withdrawal of an election petition, and that such withdrawal, if permissible at all, should be guarded by similar provisions, and not allowed by the court on mere application and affidavits, and that the respondent ought not to have his right to adduce recriminatory evidence taken from him by such an application as this. We were of opinion that the arguments for the respondent were well founded, and that the application should be refused, and as the matter pressed, the trial being near at hand, we announced our decision to that effect, and we now proceed to state the main grounds on which it proceeded. It will be observed that the second section of the Act above alluded to states that the powers there given shall be subject to the provisions of the Act, and we think it clear that the jurisdiction conferred by the Act cannot be in all respects the same as that of the court in ordinary causes. Numerous provisions of the Act have reference not merely to the individual interests or rights of petitioners or respondents, but to rights of electors, of constituencies, and of the public in purity of election, and in having the member seated who is duly returned by a majority of proper votes. It appears to us also that the scope of the Act is that petitions should not be mere pleadings, nor framed for the purpose of intimidating or in any way inducing the respondent to abandon his seat, still less, of course, should they be collusive, but that they should be real, well considered, and not lightly to be withdrawn either in whole or in part. (See ss. 5, 6, 8, sect. 11, sub-sects. 14, 15, 16, ss. 20, 25 to 42, and other parts of the Act.) By sect. 5 of the Act a petition may be presented by a person who voted or had a right to vote at the election, or by a person claiming to have a right to be returned or elected. By sub-sect. 13 of sect. 11 the judge is to determine, not merely whether the member whose return or election is complained of, but whether any or what other person was duly returned or elected, and sect. 53 speaks of a petition complaining of an undue return and claiming the seat for some person. These sections show that not merely may the candidate who is not returned claim the seat, or in other words, claim to have been duly elected, but that any other voter might claim the seat for a candidate who has not been returned, and claims have been so made, as in Stevens v. Tillet (ubi sup.) and other cases. This right of petitioning shows that the Act contemplated in regard to petitions not merely the rights of candidates not returned, but the rights of the constituency, in order to insure that the person really elected should be their member, and this without the cost and disturbance of a new election, as the judge's decision in favour of such claim is final: (Taunton case, L. Rep. 4 C. P. 361.) It appears to us that it would be an infringement of this right if a petition having been presented by one person (in this case a candidate claiming the seat), the claim to the seat could be withdrawn by the mere motion of the person presenting it after the twenty-one days, when no other petition could be presented, and thus the voters be prevented from claiming the seat for one who may be the duly elected representative, or on the other hand from showing by means of the recriminative charges, which put in issue the claim, that the claimant is not a person entitled to the seat by that election, or that he is disqualified for future elections, such withdrawal not being accompanied by the power to substitute another person as petitioner, by means of which the inquiry might be gone into at the trial. A right to have an election petition proceeded with, though one object of it is obtained, is reopened, by sect. 18 of the statute, which provides that an election petition shall be proceeded with notwithstanding the acceptance by the respondent of an office of profit under the Crown. It appears to us that the withdrawal of this portion of the prayer of the petition is in pari materia with, even if it is not within, the provision of the Act relative to the withdrawal of a whole petition. We see no reason why the prayer claiming the seat for some one might not form the subject of a separate petition from that which is directed against the return of the sitting member, and if so, it would be within the provisions of sect. 35, and the rules XLV., et seq., carrying out those provisions, which provide inter alia for due notices to be given to the constituency, and for the substitution by leave of the judge of another person in place of the petitioner. If this be so, and these sections and rules apply to a petition simply claiming the seat for some person, we see no reason why they should not apply to such claim when the prayer including it is joined with another or other prayers, and if, in the latter case, by reason of the words "in whole or in part," not occurring in the provision of the Act as to withdrawal of petitions, applications such as the present do not fall within such provision, we see no reason why at all events the election judges may not under sect. 25 make rules for properly guarding the interest of the particular constituency and of the public in respect of such application. We, however, incline to think, although it is not necessary to decide this point in the present case, that an election petition under the Act (sect. 35) is not the less an election petition because it is joined in one document with another petition, and if so, the provisions as to withdrawal apply to the present case. By sect. 22, two candidates may be made respondents to the same petition, and this case may for the sake of convenience be tried at the same time, but "for all the purposes of this Act such petition shall be deemed a separate petition against each respondent;" this section shows that two petitions may be joined in one document and tried at one time. By sect. 26, it is provided that "so far as the rules framed under sect. 25 do not extend, the principles, practice, and rules on which committees of the House of Commons have heretofore acted in dealing with election petitions, shall be observed as far as may be by the court and judge in the case of election petitions under this Act." It therefore becomes desirable to see what has been the mode in which election committees have dealt with cases analogous to the present. In the Clare case (W. & B. 143), recriminatory evidence was allowed to be given against a candidate for whom the seat was claimed, though the claim to the seat was abandoned. So also in the Coventry case (1 Peck. 99) and other cases cited in Mr. Rogers' Law and Practice of Election Committees, edit. 1863, p. 470. The New Windsor case (2 Peck. 193), cited in the present case by the learned counsel for the petitioner, does not appear to conflict with the other decisions, as the committee there allowed recriminatory evidence to be given against a petitioner who had abandoned his claim to the seat. The Maldon case (2 P. R. & D. 143) was also relied on for the petitioner. In that case there were three petitions; the second petitioner, who charged bribery and treating against the sitting members, and claimed the seat for himself, wholly withdrew his petition, and what the committee decided was to decline to proceed upon the application of a third petitioner, which alleged corrupt practices against the second petitioner, the committee having unseated the sitting members on the first petition. This decision does not appear to us substantially to conflict with the other decisions of election committees, as tribunals of this description must have some discretion as to where inquiries are to stop. The practice of committees of the House of Commons appears to us, therefore, to be strongly in favour of not excluding recriminatory evidence by the sitting member, when the seat is claimed by the petitioner and the petitioner afterwards desires to abandon the claim, and the exclusion of such evidence appears to be the only object sought by this application, as if it were not desired to exclude this, or if it were known that no recriminatory evidence would be adduced, the alleged object, as to saving costs, could be obtained by giving the respondent notice that no evidence would be tendered in support of the claim to the seat, and that that claim would not be persisted in at the trial. The learned counsel for the petitioner fairly admitted the fact that frequently, if not universally, election petitions were presented on the last of the twenty-one days, and that if so, information was not given by them of which members of the constituency could avail themselves by presenting in due time another petition, if they found the requisite allegations and prayer in the petition presented were unsatisfactory to them. This may present a difficulty in remedying a defect if a prayer such as this joined with another prayer in one document is not within the clauses and rules as to withdrawal; but we do not see that it affords an independent argument in favour of granting this application, and it is a difficulty which may probably be lessened or removed by rules under sect. 25. It is also to be observed that, although petitions may be presented at the last moment, it is commonly known in the county or borough that such petitions are likely to be presented, and if any suspicion exists that they are sham petitions, means are taken by those who are in earnest to lodge petitions, and the entire withdrawal of collusive petitions is guarded against by the provisions of the Act to which we have alluded. In one point of view it is an argument against our allowing this prayer to be withdrawn, that if there be no power under the withdrawal clauses to substitute a person for the petitioner as to this prayer the constituency will be without means of proving either that the petitioner is the duly elected member, or to answer his allegation that he is elected, or to show that he is unfit to serve in a future Parliament, he himself having raised their issue by claiming the seat. We by no means decide that this court has no power to make amendments in petitions, provided it sees that no injurious or unjust result, or that a beneficial result will follow. In Pickering v. Startin (28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 111), the Court of Common Pleas allowed in the case of a municipal election petition an amendment by adding two paragraphs relating to matters discovered after the filing of the petition. On the other hand, in Maude v. Louley (L. Rep. 9 C. P. 165) an application for an amendment by addition of allegations as to the acts committed in other wards besides those named in the original petition was refused by this court. We do not enter into the arguments as to the question of the position of the sureties being altered, as the counsel for the petitioner agreed to make their consent to this amendment a condition in his leave to amend. We cannot discard the question of possible collusion in favour of particular individuals. The provisions giving protection against the chance of this must be of general application, and its possibility jealously watched by judges and the court.

Here, if the petitioner suffers in the result, he has brought it on himself, but if, as he states in his affidavit, he has no cause for apprehension, he can hardly suffer any damage, as, if he gave notice to the other side of not pressing his claim, and if in consequence of particulars furnished by the respondent he had to go to expense in defending the conduct of himself or his agents, and he does this successfully, the election judge will probably decide in his favour as to the costs of such defence. If otherwise, he can hardly complain of having to pay them. That the matter may be entirely open for the discretion of the learned judge at the trial, we, in refusing this application, leave the costs of it to be adjudicated upon by the judge who tries the case.

RHODES AND ANOTHER v. THE AIREDALE DRAINAGE COMMISSIONERS.

Arbitration under special Act incorporating the Lands Clauses Act 1845—Compensation—Actionable damage—Award—Evidence of umpire—Removal of shoals from bed of river—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845—Airedale Drainage Act (24 & 25 Vict. c. 160).

By the Airedale Drainage Act (24 & 25 Vict. c. 160) the defendants were empowered to execute certain works, and by that Act it was provided that "full compensation shall from time to time after the passing of this Act . . . be made by the defendants . . . to the owners, occupiers, and lessees for the time being sustaining any damage by reason, or in any way consequential upon, the exercise of any of the powers of this Act of the lands and hereditaments of F." . . . "and in case of dispute as to the amount of such compensation, the same shall be settled by arbitration in manner provided for the settling of questions of compensation in the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845."

*The plaintiffs were occupiers of lands of F., and the defendants executed works under the above Act, by reason of which the plaintiffs alleged they had, as such occupiers, sustained injury to the land of F. occupied by them. An umpire was appointed under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, in accordance with the above Act, who, by his award, awarded to the plaintiffs 110l. and costs as the "damages sustained by the plaintiffs by reason of and consequential upon the exercise by the commissioners of the powers of the Airedale Drainage Act." At the trial the plaintiffs only put in the award, which the judge then ruled was prima facie evidence requiring an answer from the defendants. The defendants pleaded, first, a plea denying the validity of the award; secondly, a plea setting out the award and a special case explaining it, drawn by the arbitrator, which plea was held bad upon demurrer; thirdly, that the umpire had awarded damages beyond his jurisdiction; fourthly, that the plaintiffs had sustained no damage. The judge having ruled as above, the defendants put in, as the evidence of the umpire, by consent, the* special case drawn by him explaining his award. The judge then directed a verdict for the plaintiffs. In this special case the works done by the defendants were described, inter alia, as the removal from the river side "of shoals formed therein by gravel soil and other materials, which from time to time had been brought down by tributaries of the said river near the confluence therewith of the said tributaries," and the umpire further stated therein "there was no sufficient evidence before me to enable me to determine one way or the other, whether the said works, exclusive of the removal of the said shoals and weir, caused the" damage complained of.

Held, that the defendants were entitled to keep the verdict; that it sufficiently appeared that the damage was actionable damage.

Per Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Archibald, J., on the ground that the award was prima facie evidence against the defendants of their liability, and that the award and findings of the umpire given in evidence at the trial, showed that the damage in respect of which compensation was awarded was actionable damage, though they were of opinion that even if the damage were not actionable damage, the award would, by reason of the special clauses of the Airedale Drainage Act, be valid.

Per Amphlett, B., on the ground that the award, taken in connection with the pleadings setting out in the special case, was prima facie evidence against the defendants of their liability, and that it sufficiently appeared that the damage was actionable damage, though if it had not so appeared the award would, in his opinion, be invalid.

THE facts and the arguments made use of by counsel in arguing the rule are so fully discussed in the judgments that it is unnecessary to repeat them.

Manisty, Q.C., Bidder, Q.C., and Cave, Q.C. showed cause (1st and 2nd Dec. 1875).

Herschell, Q.C. and K. Digby supported the rule.

Our adv. vult.

The following judgments were delivered on the 20th Jan. 1876.

LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—My brother Archibald concurs in this judgment which I am about to read. This was an action on an award made by Mr. Kemplay, who was appointed umpire under the Airedale Drainage Act, a private Act passed in 1861, and with which the Lands Clauses Acts 1845 and 1860 were incorporated, "save so far as any of the sections and provisions of those Acts were expressly excepted or varied" by the Act itself. The 45th section of the private Act enacted that the arbitration should be conducted "in the manner provided for the settling of questions by arbitration in the Lands Clauses Act 1845;" and the Court of Common Pleas held on demurrer in this very case that Mr. Kemplay was precluded from stating a special case as he wished to do, and indeed provisionally did, to obtain the opinion of the court on certain questions of law which arose in the course of the proceedings before him. Some of these questions are raised in a less convenient form, and must be determined in our judgment upon this rule. This action is brought upon Mr. Kemplay's award for the sum of 110*l.* and costs, which he found to be the amount of "damages sustained by the plaintiffs by reason of and consequential upon the exercise by the commissioners of the powers of the Airedale Drainage Act." It was tried before me at Guildhall, when the plaintiffs contented themselves with putting in the award of Mr. Kemplay, and then closed their case. The defendants had pleaded first in effect denying the validity of the award under the Airedale Drainage Act. Next they had set out the award and special case, and pleaded a plea which has been held bad upon demurrer. Thirdly, they had pleaded that the umpire had awarded damages in respect of matters beyond his jurisdiction. Fourthly, they had pleaded that the plaintiffs had not sustained any such damage as entitled them to compensation under the provisions of the Airedale Drainage Act. The fifth and sixth pleas are not necessary to be considered for the purposes of this judgment. On this state of pleadings and proof the defendants insisted that there was nothing to go to the jury, and that a nonsuit should have been directed. Mr. Kemplay was called by them, and it was agreed that, without being formally sworn and examined, it should be taken that he had repeated in the witness-box the statements made in the special case appended to his award. No further evidence was given by the defendants, except that a witness was called to establish the fact that the defendants had no funds in hand to meet the demands made on them by the plaintiffs; but the latter evidence became immaterial as the point to which it was directed was abandoned in the argument upon the rule. On this state of the pleadings and the proof, I directed a verdict for the plaintiffs for 244*l.* 19*s.* 8*d.*, the amount of the damages and the costs incurred in ascertaining them; and the defendants had leave to move to enter the verdict for them. The rule was obtained as a matter of convenience and by agreement to enter either a nonsuit or a verdict in the alternative, and we are now to determine whether that rule should be made absolute or discharged. It is necessary to determine first whether the evidence given by the plaintiffs, which was confined to the award, called upon the defendants for any answer; secondly, whether if it did, the statements in the special case, which are to be taken as the evidence of Mr. Kemplay, afford that answer. The solution of this latter question depends on, thirdly, whether the damage for which the plaintiffs are entitled to be compensated under the Airedale Drainage Act is such damage only as, without the Act, would have been actionable; and fourthly whether all the damage for which it appears the umpire awarded compensation to the plaintiffs was or was not such damage. It will tend to clearness, though it may at first sight appear illogical, if we consider the latter question before the former one. For if the damage giving a right to compensation under the Airedale Drainage Act be not merely actionable damage, but injury or harm, though not actionable; or if upon the whole case taken together there should be evidence that no damage but damage otherwise actionable was, in fact, taken into account by the umpire in ascertaining the amount of compensation, then there could be no question of nonsuit, and the verdict could not be entered for the defendants; and furthermore, the authority of the cases decided upon the Lands Clauses Acts, and on statutes containing equivalent provisions to the provisions of these Acts, would be materially weakened, because those cases would not then be in point. Now the Airedale Drainage Act was passed, as the preamble recites, for the public object of improving the drainage, and thereby the health of a large district in the West Riding. It authorised the execution by the defendants of considerable works according to deposited plans and sections; and these works, which are enumerated in the 36th section of the Act, include "the removing from the river Aire of shoals and other obstructions;" and after setting out a variety of works to be executed, and conferring on the commissioners a variety of powers for the purpose of executing them, the 43rd section enacts, in the first portion of it, as follows: "In the execution of this Act the commissioners shall do as little damage as may be, and subject to the provisions of this Act shall make, to all parties entitled, compensation for all damage or injury so done." It has already been mentioned that the Lands Clauses Acts are incorporated with the Special Act. Then follow two clauses in favour of two sets of properties, the language of which clauses is the same, except as to the properties affected by them. The 44th is in favour of the owners, lessees, and occupiers of the lands commonly known as the Riddlesden Hall Estate and Lenton Farm. The 45th, under which the present plaintiffs claim, is as follows: "Full compensation shall, from time to time, after the passing of this Act, but not beyond twenty years from and after the completion of the cuts, embankments, and works by this Act authorised, be made by the commissioners out of the rates to be levied under this Act to the owners, lessees, and occupiers for the time being, sustaining any damage by reason or in any way consequential upon the exercise of any of the powers of this Act of the lands and hereditaments of William Ferrand, Esq., situate, &c.; and in case of dispute as to the amount of compensation, the same shall be settled by arbitration in the manner provided for the settling of questions of compensation by arbitration in the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845." The plaintiffs are tenants of Mr. Ferrand, and claim under this section; and the question is, in respect of what have they a right to claim? In respect of actionable damage only, say the defendants. The Lands Clauses Acts are incorporated, and a long series of decisions, too numerous and uniform to be now disputed, has settled that the damage for which compensation can be recovered under the procedure enacted by the Act of 1845 is actionable damage only. The words of the 45th section of the Airedale Drainage Act are no wider than the words in the analogous sections in the Public Health Act and the Waterworks Clauses Act. They are substantially the same, and under these last-mentioned Acts the courts have uniformly confined the damage recoverable to actionable damages. The New River Company v. Johnson (2 E. & E. 435; 6 Jur. N. S. 374; 29 L. J. 93, M. C.; 8 W. Rep. 179), decided upon 10 & 11 Vict. c. 17, s. 12 (The Waterworks Clauses Act); Hall v. The Mayor, &c., of Bristol (15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 573; L. Rep. 2 O. P. 322; 36 L. J. 110, C. P.), decided on 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, s. 14 (The Public Health Act 1848), are, no doubt, authorities for this proposition. The Legislature, in using the word "damage," use a word to which a legal meaning had already been affixed by judicial decisions, and must be taken to have used it in the sense ascertained by those decisions, i.e., "actionable damage." Nor are the defendants driven to admit that the 44th and 45th sections do not give the persons in whose favour they are enacted any greater or better protection than they already had under the words of the 43rd. For under the 44th and 45th sections, the compensation for damage may be ascertained and awarded "from time to time," during a period of twenty years; whereas, under the 43rd, as to all other persons than those protected by the 44th and 45th sections, it can be ascertained and awarded only once for all. These considerations are, no doubt, of great weight, but there are considerations on the other side of equal weight, or greater. It is difficult, say the plaintiffs, to believe that the 44th and 45th sections would have been inserted in the Act in their present shape, merely to provide that compensation under them might be ascertained and awarded more than once. These sections appear to have intended to give the persons in whose favour they were passed, a remedy wider and larger than the Lands Clauses Act would give. They were the price paid for procuring the acquiescence of certain powerful persons in the passing of the Act, and it is to reduce the price almost to nothing to construe them as suggested by the defendants. For the permanent liability to injury is a permanent injury to the property, which might be taken into account on a single assessment of compensation. In the first words of the 43rd section, "the commissioners shall do as little damage as may be," it is plain that "damage" is used in the broad sense of harm or mischief. The interpretation of the public Acts already referred to is, indeed, now established; but it has been established not without resistance, and the acquiescence of the House of Lords in that interpretation has been by no means hearty or unqualified; and in such an Act as this there is good reason why compensation may have been given for damage not actionable; because the commissioners are clothed with large and varied powers to execute large and varied works, and may, and probably do, exercise these powers to do damage, in the sense of harm or mischief, which, although not actionable, it is plain no individual would be likely to do, and which very few individuals could do. If, therefore, the decision of this case turned upon this point, we should have been prepared to hold that these two sections did go, in their true meaning, beyond the sections of the Acts which have been referred to and decided on; and that compensation was intended to be given by them for damage other than actionable damage. The decision of the case, however, does not turn upon it; because we think that construing the award by the language of the special case, no damage except actionable damage has been included by the umpire in the subject-matter of his award of compensation. For this purpose we assume (what we have still to discuss) that the award is evidence, and that the statements of the umpire as to his findings are evidence also. The whole controversy as to this point between the plaintiffs and defendants, turned upon the true construction of his language, as to the removal of certain shoals, and upon the question, what kind of removal had taken place in point of fact, and how far that removal, assuming it to have been actionable in point of law, was found by the umpire to have caused any harm in point of fact. It is plain that if the umpire has admitted that he considered and awarded compensation for a matter not within the Act, his award is invalid. He has awarded a lump sum, and if part of the claims for which that lump sum has been given is bad, the whole award is bad also. The Duke of Buccleugh v. The Metropolitan Board of Works (L. Rep. 3 Ex. 306; L. Rep. 5 Ex. 221; Ex. Ch.); L. Rep. 5 H. of L. Cas. 418; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 906; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 255 (Ex. Ch.); 37 L. T. Rep. N. S. 1 (H. of L. Cas.), and the case of The Dare Valley Railway Company (L. Rep. 6 Eq. 429; 37 L. J. 719, Ch.) are conclusive as to this. It is important, therefore, to state with accuracy what it is which the umpire has done. He has described the acts of the defendants in respect to shoals; the removal from the river Ayre "of shoals formed therein by gravel soil and other materials, which from time to time had been brought down by tributaries of the said river, near the confluence therewith of the said tributaries." This is what the defendants did. Then he finds that the plaintiffs "sustained damage . . . by reason of, and consequential upon the execution by the commissioners (i.e., the defendants) of all the said works," including therein the removal of the shoals above-mentioned. He, however, complicates the question, it must be admitted, by immediately appending the following words: "There was no sufficient evidence before me to enable me to determine either one way or the other, whether the said works, exclusive of the removal of the said shoals and weir aforesaid, caused the farm, on the occurring of the said floodings, to be flooded to greater extents, or for longer periods of time, or to be more damaged than it otherwise would have been." The fair construction, however, of the umpire's language appears to us to be, that the removal of the shoals with other works, and as an appreciable ingredient in the whole result, did damage (we will here say it in the sense of harm or mischief) to the plaintiffs. We further think that the fair meaning of the umpire's description of the work as to the shoals is, that there was a dealing by the defendants with the bed of the stream, beyond that mere scouring which riparian proprietors would have a right to do, supposing, which we doubt, that what a riparian proprietor might do without liability to action could, as a matter of course, be done by the defendants without a liability. We understand the umpire also to describe the removal by the defendants of long standing accumulations, of which, although some portions may have been of recent accretion, the substance must be of great, though unascertained, age. Damage accruing from such acts is clearly, in our judgment, actionable damage. We acknowledge the authority of the cases quoted to us by the defendants' counsel, to the effect that cleansing and scouring of a river bed, so as to keep the stream in its accustomed course, and at its accustomed level, is not only permissible in, but obligatory upon, a riparian owner. This is the effect of the dictum of Lord Holt in The King v. Wharton (12 Mod. 510) of a passage in Bolle's Abridgement, Nusans, A., and of what is attributed to Lee, C.J., in Brown v. Best (1 Wil. 174), and we have no intention of questioning the law there laid down. But it is equally clear that a substantial interference with the bed of a stream so as to increase or diminish the flow of water to the detriment of other riparian owners is a thing actionable in itself, and that damage resulting therefrom is actionable damage. It was so held by Lord Thurlow in

Robinson v. Lord Byron (1 Brown's Ch. Cas. 588), quoted in Goddard on Easements 284, and by the House of Lords in Bicket v. Morris (L. Rep. Scotch App. 47; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 835), a case to which our attention was drawn with great minuteness by the plaintiffs' counsel. The words of the Airedale Drainage Act itself appear to contemplate such a substantial dealing with the bed of the river by the defendants, and we think that on the findings in the special case, their dealing must be taken to have been such a dealing in point of fact. We are, therefore, of opinion that even on the view of the language of the 45th section of the Airedale Drainage Act most favourable to the defendants, there has been no damage considered by the umpire in ascertaining the amount of compensation, except damage that is actionable. This, however, assumes that the award of the umpire is some evidence of the facts on which it is founded, and that the statements of the umpire, as to what entered into his consideration in ascertaining the amount of damage, are some evidence of the facts which he considered. Whether this is so or not is the only point which remains to be discussed. It is one point, because if the award of the amount of compensation for damage be prima facie evidence that the damage in respect of which the compensation was awarded was actionable, the findings of the umpire, which are in truth a mere explanation of his award, are prima facie evidence of the facts necessary to, or implied in the findings and of the award, is no evidence, neither are the findings. Now, the award is part of a proceeding under an Act of Parliament, in and by which the jurisdiction of the arbitrator is (for the purpose of this part of the discussion we must assume) confined to awarding compensation for actionable damage. In this respect it is strictly analogous to the proceedings taken before the under sheriff and a compensation jury, who can give compensation only for damage which is actionable. In such a case, if some claims made are in respect of damage, which is not the subject of compensation, it was said by Lord Cranworth in The Caledonian Railway Company v. Ogilvy (2 Macqueen, 229) that it is the duty of the sheriff or under-sheriff to point out to the jury which kind of damage is the subject of compensation and which is not. The award is good upon the face of it; the compensation is to be presumed to be according to the claim. (See Russell on Arbitrators, 433, 4th edit.) As to the umpire it is to be presumed, until the contrary appears, that he kept within his jurisdiction, and did not receive evidence of damage which was not the subject matter of compensation under the Act. As to the compensation the claim is made under the Act and for the compensation given by the Act, and it is to be presumed till the contrary appears that the compensation following the claim has only been given for damage within the Act under which it is claimed. In most of the decided cases the want of jurisdiction is apparent on the face of the awards set out in them. But in the case before us the claim is made, and the compensation is awarded for damages in general terms; and it must be presumed, until the contrary is shown, that the umpire did not make his award as to matters over which he had no jurisdiction. To hold the contrary, as we have been pressed to do, would lead to consequences of which the barest statement is very startling, and if the argument ab inconvenienti can ever have a legitimate place in legal reasoning, it surely should have place here. In this case an eminent lawyer has ascertained the fact of damage necessary in order to arrive at the amount of compensation after the most careful and prolonged inquiry, on the examination of the most skilful men of science on each side, and at an expense of more than 2000*l.* It is not denied that this is not conclusive. However eminent the umpire or expensive the inquiry, it is admitted that the defendants, as they may plead, so may prove that the umpire has been mistaken as to the extent of his jurisdiction, and that his award is invalid. What is contended for on the part of the defendants is that the award and evidence of the umpire is not even prima facie evidence against them, and that the plaintiffs must, apart altogether from the award, prove in an action upon it what has been variously called a shilling's worth of actionable damage or a cause of action. But in such a case as this, that means, it is manifest, that they must prove their whole case over again, for almost the whole of the evidence was directed to making out, and almost the whole of the expense was incurred in establishing, the fact of injury, rather than the amount of compensation to be paid for it; and the expense and time consumed in proving a shilling's worth might be as much as that consumed in proving 20,000*l.* worth of actionable damage. Such a view of the law needs authority to support it. If authority could be found we should have deferred to it, whatever our own opinion might be, and have left our judgment to be set right, if wrong, upon appeal. But as far as we are aware there is no such authority; certainly none of the cases cited to us warrant any such conclusion. There is no doubt that it has been determined that the powers of the compensation jury (and therefore of the arbitrator or umpire) are limited to determining the fact of damage and its amount, leaving the question of right to be determined, if it is disputed, in an action on the judgment or award. This was held in the case of the Queen v. London and North-Western Railway Company (3 E. & B. 443); in which Sir John Coleridge elaborately reviews the earlier cases, both at law and in equity, and especially the conflicting decisions of Lord Cottenham in the London and North-Western Railway Company v. Smith (1 Mac. & G. 216; 19 L. J. 193, Ch.) and of Lord Truro in the East and West India Docks v. Gatlke (3 Mac. & G. 155; 20 L. J. 217, Ch.). But it is nowhere suggested, either in the judgment or in argument, that though the finding of the jury might be impeached in the action, it was no evidence, whether impeached or not. Indeed, the proceeding in that case to bring the inquisition up and quash it, would have been useless: if unquashed it was not even a step in proof in an action brought upon it. The case of Bradby v. Southampton Local Board (4 E. & B. 1014; 24 L. J. 239, Q. B.) seems, though perhaps not directly in point, yet to lean strongly against the defendants. There had been an ex parte award against the Local Board. The Local Board admitted their liability if there had been damage, and the plaintiff's right to the land affected; but they denied that any actionable damage had been done, and unless it had been done, they contended that there was no dispute as to the amount of compensation, and that the award was without jurisdiction. The court held otherwise. They said that the only question at issue was the fact of damage and the amount, and that the arbitrator had jurisdiction. But this must have meant that the award ascertained the fact of actionable damage, till it was impeached, and that it cast upon the Local Board a prima facie liability to pay the sum awarded. The cases of Read v. Victoria Station, &c., Railway Co. (1 H. & C. 826; 32 L. J. 167, Ex.); and Barber v. Nottingham, &c., Railway Co. (15 C. B., N. S., 726; 33 L. J. 193, C. P.; 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 829), were both decided on demurrer, and established only that you may plead against the finding of a jury, or arbitrator, which is not here disputed. In the case of the Duke of Buccleugh v. The Metropolitan Board of Works questions of law arose. But so far as can be gathered from the report, the report and award of the arbitrator, in general terms and good upon the face of it, was taken as prima facie evidence that damage within the statute had been sustained. In Beckett v. The Midland Railway Co. (L. Rep. 3 C. P. 82; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 499; 37 L. J. 11, C. P.) other evidence besides the award seems to have been given. In that case, however, the award merely stated that a narrowing of a road had injuriously affected the plaintiffs' house, without going on to say whether the injury and depreciation was temporary or permanent, a permanent narrowing of a roadway being within the statute, whereas a temporary one is not. The last case which it is necessary to consider is Chapman v. Monmouth Railway and Canal Company (2 H. & N. 267; 27 L. J. 97, Ex.). This case is the only one in which, so far as I know, it has ever been suggested that an award of this sort was not evidence for a jury. In this case no doubt the point was taken. But there is no decision upon, or even allusion to, the point in the judgment of the court. At the trial of the case at Nisi Prius Mr. Justice Willes, as he expressly stated, intended deliberately to disregard and indeed overrule the decision of the Queen's Bench in the case of the Queen v. London and North-Western Railway Company (3 E. & B. 443), already referred to, and he held the finding of the jury conclusive upon the title as well as upon the fact and amount of damage, and refused to receive evidence to impeach it. The judgment of the Court of Exchequer is confined to this single point, and the rule was made absolute for a new trial on the short and single ground that the court held itself bound by the case which Willes, J., had proposed to overrule. This is the only case, so far as I am aware, in which the point now insisted on appears to have been taken. It cannot be said to have been at all favoured by the judgment. It appears to us, in the absence of authority to be untenable, and we are aware of no authority which gives it countenance. On the three important points, therefore, insisted on by the defendants we have come to a conclusion adverse to their contention—on the construction of the 45th section of the Aire-dale Drainage Act (a point perhaps not necessary to be decided), on the character of the works executed by the defendants, and on the quality of the damage resulting from them, and lastly on the effect of the award and findings of the umpire. For these reasons it follows that we are of opinion that this rule should be discharged.
